Paul Porter, OPA Administrator: "Let's look at the situation which would face a typical American family next year if the Congress were to take off all controls now, or if, as a result of weakening amendments, the whole structure of controls should collapse. Let us examine the budget of a family which is spending $2,500 a year and see what would happen to it if the inflation approached 40 percent in the next 12 months.

"At the year's end our typical family would have to spend at the rate of $250 more a year for food, $150 more for clothing, $250 more for rent, and $300 more for miscellaneous goods and services, if it were to maintain its standard of living. What had cost $2,500 when the year began would cost $3,450 at its close."

Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Commerce: "The larger businesses with their greater reserves can survive such a boom-and-bust longer, and even come through with a whole skin. But in the meantime, thousands of smaller enterprises are squeezed out. The net result is only to encourage monopoly with prices out of the reach of the American people.

"With prices rising rapidly, millions of small businessmen—including many thousands of veterans who are just getting new enterprises under way—will come out second best in the wild scramble for raw materials and finished goods. Their small reserves simply won't survive an inflation."

The Newspapers of France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROLLA C. McMILLEN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. McMILLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a copy of an article entitled "The Newspapers of France," written by Edward Lindsay, editor of the Decatur Herald and Review, the East St. Louis Journal, and the Champaign-Urbana Courier, who was one of eight editors of American regional newspapers invited by the Syndicate of Regional Dailies in France to visit France a few months ago.

The article contains valuable information concerning French newspapers prior to the United States entering the war and subsequently to March 23, 1946.

THE NEWSPAPERS OF FRANCE

PARIS, March 23.—Nobody owns the newspapers of France. The fact is confusing to Americans, who try to understand the French press, but it throws a little light, obliquely perhaps, upon freedom of the press as a world ideal.

Before 1940, when the Germans came, individuals and corporations owned the newspapers here. They were not quite free because all of them were required to get their news through Havas, the government-controlled news agency.

Few newspapers in France have ever been sufficiently prosperous to refuse gifts from political parties or industrial leaders wishing to temper the news for their purposes. Nevertheless, there were some good newspapers, either strictly reliable or with well-known biases that could be balanced against those with other well-known biases. They were private property.

The conquerors found it necessary to control the newspapers. This was done subtly, at first, by persuasion and censorship. A good many of the owners and editors felt there was no other way to keep their properties or their positions than to cooperate with the Nazi rulers. And, of course, this was true.

Publishers were given direct orders as to what to print and how to print it; if they did not get the idea quickly, they were removed and replaced with reliable collaborators when the overlords thought this step was necessary.

The Germans controlled the supply of newsprint and approved the list of newspaper workers.

The readers of the newspapers of France found no mention of Nazi excesses or United Nations virtues.

When the United States entered the war the French Resistance movement began to operate. The Resistance included intellectuals and fugitives—those who would not or could not get along with the Germans and those with courage enough to fight back against overwhelming odds. Many of the members of the Maquis were young men who took to the woods to evade shipment to Germany as forced laborers.

As the Resistance grew it became useful to publish clandestine newspapers. These were little sheets no bigger than a page from a stenographer's notebook, printed on both sides on portable presses that could be set up in a loft building or a farmhouse and moved every few days or weeks. A good many former newspapermen gravitated into the publication of Resistance papers.

Then came the Liberation. The Allied armies in the north and the Maquis in the south pushed the Germans back a little at a time. With the conquerors gone, the operation of the functions of city government were taken over by committees of citizens who had no legal status whatever.

The committees seized the instruments needed to start civic life in operation. The newspapers were among the first activities put into motion. The directors were usually clandestine publishers, and the staffs some of the bright young students of the Maquis.

In the flush of war every man with a gun was master over those who did not have them. The liberators had no time to go into fine points of property rights or the minute history of the attitude of the publishers who had kept their presses rolling when the Germans were here. The press was considered to be collaborationist if it had been operating and was taken over for the new democracy.

Gradually organized government was established, and the seizures of liberation day were recognized as accomplished facts, subject, of course, to regulation by the new government.

In the course of time an information ministry was established that controlled the operation of the press. The ministry, first, was and is responsible for providing the newsprint for the papers. This meant that the final decision as to whether or not a paper could grow or even continue to exist was made by the ministry.

With the development of organized government, political parties became active. If the first publisher were an M. R. P., the Socialists and the Communists, both representing large followings, felt they were entitled to have newspapers. They named directors, submitted the plans for the proposed papers to the ministry, and usually were approved. If there was no idle printing plant the new papers would be crowded into the same office with existing papers.

The ministry has been reluctant to refuse to approve the publication of any newspaper having serious sponsorship. At one time there were 40 Resistance newspapers in Paris. In Nice, where there were three newspapers before the war, there now are six.

The papers that were the most appealing to the readers, or these conducted by men closest to the ministry, if you wish to be suspicious, grew in importance at the expense of the others.

There are six major newspapers in Paris, all of which have national circulations. In the morning field they are Le Parisien Libere, 500,000; Figaro, 400,000; and Humanite, the Communist organ, 350,000.

The evening papers are: France Soir, 500,000; Ce Soir, the largest paper in France by a small margin, with 550,000 subscribers, recently moved very close to the Communist line; and Le Monde, with 200,000.

All of the Paris newspapers are strongly political in flavor, several receiving party funds and all of them are in the forefront of the political lines that are echoed through the French press.

The provincial press has grown in importance since the war. West France, published in Rennes, and distributing 19 separate editions a day, through Brittany and Normandy, has a half million subscribers. The Normandie, at Rouen, sells 150,000, Southwest France, at Bordeaux, has 23 editions reaching 300,000 families.

The publisher of the regional paper in Nancy, East Republican, is Dr. Pierre Lignac, vice president of the Federation Nationale de la Presse Française and in direct charge of the plans for entertaining the American editors in Paris. He is a prewar publisher who locked the door on his shop when the Germans came to France. His record is such that he is one of the few who have been able to resume the publication of their papers. His circulation is some 200,000, slightly more than before the war.

The Republic, published at Tours, has 240,000 subscribers, and at Lille there is Voice of the North with 350,000, the second largest regional paper in France.

The regional press is less politically conscious than the Paris press. Several of the major ones take an almost independent line. The Communist papers in the provinces are all small in circulation and are subsidized heavily by the party.

In Marseilles, where the largest provincial paper of prewar days was pubished—then Le Petit Marseillais with 400,000 readers—we met the granddaughter of the founder. She is Jacqueline Samat, well-educated in several languages and a personal friend of Anne Bullitt. She is now working as a reporter for the little Catholic paper, La France. She was a member of the committee from the Marseilles press that entertained us.

Grandfather Toussaint Samat founded the paper in 1870 with some financial assistance from an Algerian businessman. The son, Joseph Samat, published the paper for many years and retired. It was then operated by a relative of the early financial backer, one Jean Gaillard-Bourrageas, who was strongly pro-German. This was before the war.

When the war came the family, with the backing of public opinion, got Gaillard out of the paper and put in a cousin, Jean Savon-Perron. The paper was operated during the occupation. Marseille was in the free zone until after the Allies landed in north Africa.

The problem that M. Savon faced after that was to shut down the plant, releasing 600 employees who would have been taken to Germany, or try to go on under German direction. He chose the latter course and got himself under a cloud.

He has been tried and found not guilty although he had served a 6-month jail sentence while the trial was being conducted.

Although there is no charge pending against any member of the family, the newspaper plant is in the hands of the Resistance press. Three papers are published in the Le Petit Marseillais plant, the largest, Provencal, with 200,000 subscribers. The Samat family has received no payment of any kind and does not expect to receive any.

In Rouen, the prewar publisher has been convicted for collaborating with the Germans and condemned to death.

A new press law has been written but is not yet before the Chamber of Deputies.

The pattern that is expected by most of the informed members of the press is that there will be a trial in each of the communities, in local courts, to determine the innocence or guilt of the former publishers. In effect this is a trial to determine whether or not the newspaper was operated in the public interest.

It is not expected the newspapers will be returned to the former owners in many, if any, instances, no matter how the trials come out. The best deal that any may expect, some say, will be payment for their properties that will continue to be operated by the Resistance men.

Will the present operators be able to own their newspapers? There are confusing answers to that. Some think that the employees will be able to form an organization to buy their papers.

In any case there is likely to continue to be a strong directing-hand from the Government. Now, of course, paper rationing makes this necessary. When we asked if there is any thought of less government supervision after rationing we were told by one observer that there is not. The papers require licensing now and he thinks licensing will continue.

The news agency that supplies the news is a government-controlled organization. It is called Agence Français de Press. In addition the papers take the services of American news agencies on a skeleton basis. The American stories are telephoned. This is not surprising because of the shortage of machines of all sorts. The Associated Press has been able to get some surplus machines from the United States Government and has installed them in a few papers.

There appears to be a strong professional pride in freedom of expression among the newspapermen in spite of the government controls. They insist that they may, and often do, criticize the government, including the Ministry of Information itself.

The writers have a great spiritual leader in the president of the Federation Nationale de la Presse Française. He is Albert Bayet, a well-known professor at the Sorbonne who has the affection and respect of all of the writers for the newspapers of France.

Hamilton Fish—Red Baiter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent granted me I deem it a privilege and an honor to insert in the RECORD an excellent and interesting article by Frank Waldrop, main editor and assistant to the publisher of the Times-Herald, which has the largest newspaper circulation in the city of Washington, which appeared in the Times-Herald of July 9, 1946.

Mr. Fish, the author of "The Challenge of World Communism," served with distinction in the House of Representatives for 24 years—until he was redistricted. He never would have been defeated in his old congressional district, which he so ably represented. He was a distinguished, fearless, and experienced legislator, a brave officer in World War I, and one of the foremost Americans in the Nation, who always put the interest of his own country first—in peace and in war.

Every Member of Congress interested in knowing the facts about the dangers and evils of world communism, and the activities and propaganda of the Red Fascists in America should read "The Challenge of World Communism," by Mr. Fish, and so should all Americans who love freedom and want to preserve their own free institutions and constitutional form of government:

RED BAITER

(By Frank C. Waldrop)

On December 6, 1920, a young veteran of World War I was sworn in as a Member of Congress who was to become in time not only a proved patriot but also a shrewd forecaster of big events, indeed the biggest event of this postwar era.

This veteran was the holder of the American Silver Star and the French Croix de Guerre for gallantry which he had won as an infantryman.

He was also a Harvard man who had graduated in three years at the age of 20 with a degree cum laude. He had also been captain of the football team and was selected by Walter Camp as an alltime All-American.

In politics he was a Progressive Republican follower of Theodore Roosevelt and as such had served three terms in the New York assembly.

Before he came to Congress he wrote the preamble to the constitution of the American Legion and then and there set himself on a line and policy which has never since changed.

The name of this young Congressman of 1920 was Hamilton Fish, Republican, of Newburgh, N. Y. He stayed in Congress from 1920 until 1944 when the concerted efforts of the President of the United States and the entire generalship of the Democratic National Committee with the aid of assorted Communists, CIO-PAC agents, crackpots, and practical politicians who had gerrymandered his District, finally got him out of office by a narrow margin.

But they didn't succeed without a fight and, in fact, they didn't succeed at all. For now that he is out of Congress, Ham Fish at last has been able to do something he had been promising all along, but never found time for before, concerning which see below:

In 1930, he was assigned by the late Nicholas Longworth, then Speaker of the House, as chairman of a Special Committee To Investigate Communist Activities in the United States. He did his job so well that he earned the undying hatred of all Communists everywhere. He also deserves for this performance the undying thanks of all good Americans everywhere.

His work as chairman of that committee also earned for Ham Fish the honorable title of "red baiter," because he forecast world trouble to come out of communism.

And in his new book, The Challenge of World Communism, price $2.50, 224 pages, the Bruce Publishing Co., Ham has a couple of words to say on red baiting, as follows:

"Since 1930, when Speaker Longworth appointed me chairman of a special House Committee To Investigate Communist Activities and Propaganda in the United States, I have read, studied, and kept in close touch with the various phases, the spread, and the significance of communism in America and throughout the world

"If I can help arouse the liberty-loving people of this country to a realization of the aims and objectives of world communism, or world revolution, which Communist agitators in America and in all other nations are frantically organizing and setting in motion, while our own loyal citizens are lulled to sleep—I shall consider that I have rendered a worth-while service to my country.

"I have been called a 'Red baiter.' If that term means an American who challenges every principle of communism, and who will expose and resist it on every occasion, then I concede the charge.

"I am not asking for drastic measures—nor for further foreign wars. The surest and the best way to combat the spread of communism in a free America is to present the facts and to inform our people about its fundamental principles and its program.

"Once these facts are known and digested, there need be no fear of their corrupting and subverting the free institutions and the republican form of government guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States."

In times past it has been tough going for anybody who tried to get through the heads of the easy-going people of this country that communism is at war with the rest of the world.

All Communists everywhere are dedicated to the bloody overthrow—and that means with blood—of every government outside their holy land, Russia.

Such is their stated and unchanging purpose. But it is difficult for most people with good hearts to realize, in ordinary times, that the Communists are that way.

Now and then comes along somebody like Ham Fish who is able to see the facts of the Communist purpose plain and clear no matter whatever else is going on in the world.

That Ham did in 1930 when he began the project that won him the just and honorable title of "Red baiter."

Yet, not until now, after a terrible World War and the passage of 16 years, have most other Americans begun to realize that what Ham has been preaching is no joke.

The Communists are at war with the rest of the world. They do mean to destroy all other governments. And they will do all these things if the rest of us let them win through default.

If you are in doubt, just take a look at the record. Have a look in on Bulgaria, Romania, Greece, Hungary, Austria, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Finland, France, Italy, China, Korea, just to mention a few in which Communist policy has come out from under cover.

Take note of the accomplishments of J. Stalin at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam.

Think over the performances of his man Gromyko before the United Nations security council and add to all this the gradually toughening words of Britain's Foreign Minister Bevin and our own Secretary of State, Jimmy Byrnes.

Just why do you suppose the sweetness and light has so quickly faded from the postwar world now that Russian communism has become increasingly powerful in world politics?

No, communism is not a joke in 1946, nor was it a joke in 1930, and that is why we earnestly recommend that you read Ham Fish's The Challenge of World Communism.

There he outlines the facts in a fashion that cannot be denied at all by any honest mind. It will pay you to look up these facts now, rather than be sorry later that you didn't.

Mr. Baruch Poses the Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, as we begin the debate on our domestic control of atomic energy, it will be most profitable to read the following article on Mr. Baruch's proposal for international control, written by the distinguished editor, essayist, and educator, Felix Morley, and reprinted from his weekly analyses Human Events:

MR. BARUCH POSES THE ISSUE

(By Felix Morley)

There are moments in world history when the least discerning can see that mankind has reached the parting of the ways. Such an instance is found in the "choice between the quick and the dead" which Bernard M. Baruch, speaking for the Government of the United States, on June 14, laid before the Atomic Energy Commission of the United Nations. "We cannot escape history", said the American representative on this Commission, paraphrasing Lincoln. "We know how to save peace. We * * * hold the power and have the responsibility."

Precisely for that reason the Baruch recommendations must be considered against the stark backdrop of the present world picture, and not for themselves alone. Our Government "proposes the creation of an International Atomic Development Authority, to which should be entrusted all phases of the development and use of atomic energy, starting with the raw material. * * *" This IADA would have licensing, managerial, inspection and research control over all laboratory and manufacturing activities in the field of atomic energy. It would be an outright superstate organization, completely overriding national sovereignty in the broad field of its mandate. Nominally, IADA would be a part of the United Nations Organization. Actually, it would be largely autonomous.

The reason for the sweeping powers projected for IADA are not far to seek. For decades now national governments have been establishing courts, and adopting conventions, treaties, covenants and charters designed to secure international peace. Continuously these efforts have broken down because of the refusal of independent sovereignties to be subordinated to any central authority. Everyone now realizes what was pointed out by Human Events on July 4, 1945—that the Charter of the United Nations contains all the seeds of failure included in the Covenant of the defunct League, together with some wholly original defects of its own.

Belated realization of fatal deficiencies in the United Nations set-up explains the present emphasis on making the international control of atomic energy really effective. And the American plan is very ingenious. It would not yield any of the advantages possessed by the United States in this field until the projected central authority, with power to apply "immediate, swift, and sure punishment" for any violation of its controls, has received universal and unequivocal acceptance.

II

Wartime propaganda, often dishonest and always devised for short-range ends, has thoroughly confused the American people as to the problem which prevents the building of a stable peace. Yet the picture is essentially simple.

As a materialistic and unphilosophical people, we find it difficult to realize that the postwar struggle for supremacy is not so much in terms of material power as in the vitality of ideas. The old rivalries between nations are giving way to a more exacting contest of ideologies. Nations are no longer arrayed against nations as such, for very few nations competent to assert their independence effectively now remain. There are, as human events described it on July 19, 1944, "only two great powers"—the United States and Soviet Russia.

Until the fiction became obviously preposterous it was customary to speak of these two powers as natural allies, between which mutually helpful cooperation could be expected in one world happily dedicated to four freedoms. Actually, of course, Communist Russia and capitalist America are not natural allies, but natural—and mortal—enemies. As Lenin said: "Eventually an obituary will be sung either over the death of world capitalism or over the death of the Soviet Republic." And the obituary of world capitalism, already sick and weakening daily, would be the beginning of obsequies for the American Republic. The demogogy which our people have swallowed in recent years gives little reason to believe that we can preserve free enterprise in a world of totalitarian socialism.

This country and Soviet Russia are not natural enemies as nations; less so, certainly, then are the British and Russian imperialisms. But this democracy and the Soviet dictatorship are now much more than nations in the conventional sense of the word. They are protagonists of mutually irreconcilable ideas on the nature of God; the character of man; the role of religion; the function of the State; the purpose of life and almost every other really fundamental issue that can be identified. To assert that a cleavage so profound can be reconciled by empty chatter about cooperation is merely silly, or would be if it did not happen to suit the Russian book.

From the viewpoint of world history the accomplishment of the recent war can be condensed into a single paragraph. It has eliminated not merely the tinsel dictatorship of Mussolini and the more formidable Nazi regime, but also the German and Italian nations and therewith all effective check to Asiatic domination of Europe. Simultaneously Japan, so far as it was a block to Soviet expansion in the Far East, has been destroyed and efficient fifth columns for communism have been developed throughout the Western Hemisphere, especially in our colleges, labor unions, periodicals, radio comment, and even in administrative offices of the Federal Government.

III

It is at this critical juncture that the Baruch proposals are made; it is against this settling that they ought to be examined.

As Mr. Baruch, himself, would be the first to admit, the proposals which he submitted to the United Nations last week were not originated by him. They are based on the report of a highly competent Board of Consultants, presented as far back as March 16 to the State Department's special Committee on Atomic Energy.

That committee, established by Secretary Byrnes on January 7, 1946, was composed of Vannevar Bush, President Conant of Harvard, Major General Groves, and former Assistant Secretary of War McCloy, with Under Secretary of State Acheson as chairman. The techincal Board of Consultants, headed by David E. Lilienthal, chairman of TVA, made its report in the first instance to the Acheson committee, which in turn reported to Secretary Byrnes. These studies, collectively known as the Acheson-Lilienthal report, from the names of the two chairman, are conveniently obtainable, in summarized form, in the Department of State Bulletin for April 7, 1946 (vol. XIV, No. 353).

What Mr. Baruch has done, as United States representative on the Atomic Energy Commission of UN, is to improve, approve, and submit for international consideration a far-reaching proposal based upon the most careful American thinking in the industrial and scientific, as well as in the military and diplomatic spheres. The Baruch proposals are firmly grounded on the stipulation of the Board of Consultants that if the plan fails, "or the whole international situation collapses," the United States "will still be in a relatively secure position, compared to any other nation."

On the other hand, failure is not envisaged, either in the preliminary reports or in the definitive Baruch proposals, provided the projected IADA is given the necessary powers of inspection, oversight, and control by all members of UN.

IV

Mr. Baruch, however, has laid down one new principle, necessitated by Russia's obstructive policy on the Security Council, in stating that under IADA:

"There must be no veto to protect those who violate their solemn agreements not to develop or use atomic energy for destructive purposes."

It is in this elimination of the veto, and in the wide power of inspection and of freedom of access "for all qualified representatives of the Authority," that an acid test of Soviet Russia's political intentions is laid down. If the plan is rejected, or if unreasonable reservations are applied to these stipulations, then the depth of the developing cleavage between the two great powers will be made plain to all. Is our knowledge of atomic fission, under controls which would prevent its use for destruction, worth loss of the veto to Russia? For while abolition of the veto would currently apply only to IADA, it must, if that succeeds, be extended to all the work of the Security Council.

Undue optimism as to the outcome would only be a continuation of the egregious folly of President Roosevelt, who was so consistently hoodwinked by Stalin. But the issue should not be prejudged. The point to watch is the Russian reaction to the proposal that international officials shall be allowed to move freely, and to inspect thoroughly, behind the iron curtain. That reaction will tell the story.

And, incidentally, the American offer to destroy and cease the manufacture of atomic weapons, to share the Government's "know-how" with other nations under a workable scheme of international control, should end a lot of fifth-column nonsense. Even Harold Laski must now cease to argue—in his syndicated column for the American press—that Russian aggressiveness is fully explained by the withholding from that country of certain information on the atomic bomb.

The attitude of Communist apologists and appeasers, however, is relatively unimportant. It is the official Russian reaction which will count. That will decide whether we can still speak hopefully of one world or where—and much more seriously for America than in 1939—it is again a case of we or they.

Government Controls, Surplus of Federal Employees, and the OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 15 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD three recent editorials from the Wichita (Kans.) Eagle, dealing with the subjects of Government controls, surplus of Federal employees, and the OPA.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAVE US

These must be troublesome days for that institution we have come to know as Government. Whether it be the executive or the legislative branch, problems are mounting until there seems to be no way out, no chance for a return to the orderly administration of public affairs. From the length and breadth of the land there come continual and insistent cries for lower prices and more profits, higher wages, less taxes. We continue to look to Washington to manage an economy which by rights is ours to do with as best we can.

Wrangle over OPA is a striking example. When price control was about to expire Chester Bowles and others went on the air to sing a song of fear and inflation. The public responded with millions of letters and telegrams urging continuance. When it appeared that the end of OPA would be to the Nation's advantage, millions demanded doing away with that body. When price control passed out, because the President vetoed an amended and fairer law, the deluge was resumed.

A dozen years under bureaucratic government seems to have lessened the will of the American people to manage their own affairs. One by one we have surrendered our personal liberties until now we are fearful of our own weakness. We continue to cry to the Government: "Save us; save us." At first sweet and soothing, Government control has become the nemesis of a once free people. We are becoming the subjects of a rule so un-American it abrogates the Constitution and the bill of rights. The spirit of 1776 is dying.

NO DEFENSE FOR IT

Intimation that the thousands of OPA employees would hold their jobs, even if the bureau itself was canceled out, because they are under civil service, again recalls to the public mind the fact that the all-time high record of 3,649,769 Federal employees is still being largely maintained. Some 756,000 emergency employees of the War and Navy Departments have been dismissed, but a part of this constructive move has been blotted out by expansion of the other bureaus of the Government.

A joint committee of Congress has held a survey with the finding that 2,000,000 employees of the Federal Government should be lopped off, reducing the total to around one and a half million, which is 75 percent more than the Government had before the war. Surely that is enough expansion in National Government for anybody.

There is not an iota of defense for having more than 3,000,000 people on the Federal pay roll a year after the close of the war. It is a drain on the taxpayer, it defeats efforts to reduce the national debt, and it is a part of the bumbling process of Federal controls which is keeping things messed up in this country. The quicker Congress can legislate some of these bureaus out of existence and see that there is no appropriation for those legislated out of their do-nothing jobs the sooner this country will begin recovering its strength.

HASTEN THE DAY

Spokesmen for the packing industry report there will be more meat for American tables within a matter of a week or 10 days. Fresh pork will be the first to appear in increased quantity, with beef, because of the need for aging, coming later. Ham and bacon, requiring processing, will be the last to start moving. A survey of 12 principal livestock markets shows receipts of live animals at five times the volume, under OPA, and this is expected to increase rapidly unless revival of price-control again puts an end to the movement.

During the last days of OPA there were no supplies of meat available outside of black markets. Packing-house coolers were empty. When price-control ended the packers were left in a position of uncertainty. Price of live animals was unusually high. Packers could not afford to take a chance and fill their refrigerators with expensive meat, and then have Congress restore OPA and leave them holding the bag. Such meat as has been available came from smaller concerns, which killed a few head today and sold them tomorrow.

Meat prices are generally higher than under OPA. This is admitted. But prices are net yet to the black-market levels, nor will they reach that point. Once it is known meat is not to be controlled supplies will increase rapidly, and prices will level off. Then there will be steak for dinner, and the Sunday roast once more a family institution. Hasten the day.

Price Control and the Law of Supply and Demand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 15 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able article appearing in the Palm Beach Post, entitled "Law of Supply and Demand Found Theoretical Rather Than Practical." The article is in relation to the continuation of price control.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAW OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND FOUND THEORETICAL RATHER THAN PRACTICAL

(By Charles M. Meister)

This needs to be somewhat personal, because only a peculiar combination of circumstances would lead a reporter to write a feature article on the law of supply and demand.

But that law, ladies and gentlemen, is what you are supposed to be living under since the death of OPA, or until it rises from its tomb. You might as well learn something about it.

After months of hearing the phrase echoing from the dome of the National Capitol, repeated in speeches here, and trotted forth in sidewalk conversations, idle curiosity prompted me to look up in a small encyclopedia some time ago.

It was presented there as a theory forming part of the ideology of the laissez faire, or "let things alone, they'll take care of themselves", school of economics.

Then OPA died, and we were told again on every hand that the LOSAD would take care of things nicely. The straw that broke the camel's back came when a person who dabbles in politics pulled the hoary phrase on me.

"When was this law passed?" I asked.

"Why, it's a law of nature," he said. "It was passed at the same time as the law of gravity."

That was it. People who make a fetish of the LOSAD believed that it meant "what goes up must come down." You know. An atom bomb goes up. What comes down?

At this point I overcame lethargy enough to turn to the most authoritive of all encyclopedias.

The LOSAD was not listed, so I thought well, it's an economic law, if anything. So I read through the five big pages on economics.

If you've heard as much about the LOSAD as I have, you won't believe it, but the whole long article on economics never used the phrase.

"One of the things which a newer generation of economists set for themselves was the careful examination of the mechanism of supply and demand."

In this way, the professor continues, "many an ingenious theory of value was built up."

The next quotation is going to be tough, and I hate to do this to you, but remember, the LOSAD is what is going to make everything come out all right, even if prices are going up now. You may have read the sentence over three times, as I did before I realized that it is the way a real economist gives due weight to what remains of the "law":

"The general theory of economic equilibrium, which includes an analysis of how exchange values and distributive shares 'tend' to be determined under the operation of the forces which make for a general balancing of supply and demand, retains its importance in economics."

There's your expert statement and if this be a law make the most of it!

"But in recent years," the learned writer continues, "economists have come to give increased attention to the factors which make for economic change, and to the persistence of maladjustments in the mechanism of production and trade."

Aping the Supreme Court, and following the election returns, no doubt.

But here is something else for the "everything will level off" boys to put in their pipes and smoke:

"The recurring phenomena known as industrial fluctuations or business cycles, with their attendant costs and wastes, are receiving a very much larger amount of study than was formerly given them."

What the professor is talking about there, girls, is the depression, which came at a time when, if the LOSAD was not exactly operating, there at least was no OPA.

With that thought in mind let us turn to the separate article on economic man, in which I finally found the LOSAD mentioned in so many words:

"According to pure economy, any price, any wage is just if it has been determined by the interplay of supply and demand under conditions of unrestricted competition."

Note that well and consider whether any prices shortly after the world's greatest hostilities ceased are determined under conditions of unrestricted competition.

"This is the tenet," the professor continues, "of the hedonist school, and they are right, if the word 'just' be taken as meaning 'exact,' as when one says that a weight just balances when the scales are in exact equilibrium. But what sort of political economy is that which is determining prices and wages eliminates 'justice' in its true, ethical sense, and how can it give any solutions to the problem of high prices or the remuneration of labor? * * *

"When the governments of every country endeavor to limit the rise of prices and lower the cost of living, this is because they believe that there is a conception of a just price which stands above that evolved from the blind caprice of the law of supply and demand, and that this higher law ought to prevail."

If Congress does revive OPA, maybe that will be why.

If you turn to the unabridged dictionary, you find some 60 definitions beginning "law of," running alphabetically from "law of absorption" to "law of Weber-Fechner." But nothing about "law or supply and demand."

Under "demand," however, you find this specialized economic definition:

"The quantity of an article demanded at a given price. It will obviously tend to increase as the price diminishes. The competition of buyers and sellers tends to make such changes of price that the demand for any article in a given market will become equal to the supply. This process is known as 'equation of supply and demand.' "

As here used, "demand" is defined as "desire to purchase a commodity, accompanied by means of payment."

This means that if your means of payment is not equal to the price you are x-ed out of the equation, no matter how great your desire to purchase.

Such an equation makes sense, in that it would be equally valid in normal times, in booms, and depressions.

But if there were a LOSAD which automatically solved problems, you would have to assume that it was suspended during booms and depressions.

If all this seems complicated you have gained something. Like the "binder boys," the "LOBAD boys" are trying to sell you a bill of goods—that everything is just as simple as apple pie, or would be were it not for the bureaucrats.

Address by Peter J. Schardt at Convention of National Association of Postal Supervisors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Peter J. Schardt, Chief, Postal Section, United States Military Government of Germany, at the convention of the National Association of Postal Supervisors, at Chicago, Ill., on May 29, 1946. The Public Printer estimates that the manuscript will take 2½ pages of the RECORD, and will cost $150.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and friends, first of all, it is a grand and glorious feeling to be home again but especially to be privileged to be associated again with a group of men of real affability. When I say this, I mean it takes a lot of tact, patience, and determination to sustain a healthy and pleasurable degree of affability when associated with men whose languages are different; whose ways of life and outlook upon life are different, whose ideologies and objectives are sometimes very far apart. Here I feel relieved from the tension of having to feel my way, of having to guard against errors of approach and the hazard of embarrassing and damaging reactions. Here we speak and understand the same language; here we know each others' aims and purposes, and can quickly find a common ground upon which to resolve our common and mutual problems.

There were many times during my stay in Europe when the possibility of resolving definite differences and clashes of opinions between two or more of the four powers seemed discouraging, and even hopeless. However, I found that by calling upon our latent spirit of indulgence, tolerance, and patience, and exercising control over feelings of irritation or resentment, it was usually possible to avert head-on collisions that might have caused irreparable damage. A quadripartite meeting is no place for a nervous or hot-headed individual or one given to fast, unguarded speech.

I owe it to you to warn you in advance that the talk I am about to make will probably not contribute anything toward maintaining the present tempo of the evening's enjoyment, but I am hopeful that you may find enough elements of interest in my remarks to excuse this intrusion upon an otherwise happy occasion.

Having inflicted upon my secretary, and through him upon many of you, my occasional so-called experience letters, most of you already have a fairly good idea as to my mission in Europe, my activities and experiences, my travels, and the gradual progress developed in the rehabilitation of the German reichpost (in our language the German civilian postal service). I will assume, therefore, that anything I might say now bearing upon my sphere of activities during my absence from the United States might prove boring, as repetitions of old stories usually do. I shall, therefore, not challenge your patience or your sympathetic indulgence to listen to an encore performance. Since the German reichpost is again functioning and is expanding as fast as conditions permit in the United States and British zones of occupation and is operating, though on a less extensive scale, in the other zones of occupation, there is not much excuse for dwelling upon this subject now.

In the United States and British zones all of the postal services operated prior to the war, except air-mail service, have been resumed under controls and safeguards set up through censorship and protective directives to prevent the transmission of any subversive communications or documents or of transactional communications that might accommodate the flight of German assets which the occupying powers must control for reparations purposes.

Interzonal services between the United States, British, French, and Russian zones have been resumed to the extent permitted by the restrictions and limitations imposed by the authorities in these zones and within the competence of facilities and personnel to take on the gradual expansion of the services.

You probably know that the German communications system was one of the most efficient in the world. The operation and control of all types of communications were centered in the reichpost, one of the largest and most far-reaching departments in the German Government. The reichpost provided the regular public postal, telephone, and telegraph services, maintained extensive postal fiscal and banking facilities, insurance and welfare operations, operated a fleet of busses for passengers and mail, in addition to other vehicles, and was responsible for the technical standards and personnel of all radio and television stations.

This vast organization was headed by a cabinet minister who was generally a careerist in the postal service. He was assisted by a secretary of state, who was second in command, and a ministry consisting of nine divisions. Directly responsible to the ministry, but not within it, were the central office, the public press, the research institute, the construction office, and the social welfare office. The postal savings office, although it had its headquarters in Vienna, was also directly responsible to the ministry. The minister performed staff functions and directives and orders were channeled from the ministry directly to the presidents of the postal districts. There were 47 of these postal districts and each of them contained an indefinite number of various classes of postal and telegraph offices, branch post offices, postal check offices, postal savings offices, and so forth, which constituted the public's contact with the reichpost.

The German mail service was frequent and fast. All classes of mail services known in the United States were also operated in Germany but in addition certain special services were included, such as newspaper subscription service, collection of insurance fees, premiums for welfare and protective associations, employee housing on a socialized basis, collection of bills, and so forth.

The German telephone service was, in terms of station equipment and personnel, one of the best in the world. Local operation was almost completely automatic, and some long-distance dialing was possible. The use of teletypewriters was expanding fast and was connected nationally by automatic exchanges. German radio and television was quite advanced beyond that in other countries.

After Germany's complete collapse the country was left without a centralized government with which the Allied Military Government could deal. True, Admiral Doenitz announced upon the news of Hitler's death early in May 1945 that the mantle of the Fuehrer's authority had fallen upon his shoulders and that therefore he was assuming government control in accordance with the wishes of the Fuehrer, who, he said, had entrusted to him the responsibility of carrying on for the German Reich. However, at that time conditions had become so chaotic and out of control that the Allied military authorities could not recognize Admiral Doenitz or any other self-appointed leader or any German administrative authority. There was no responsible German governmental authority with which the Allies could negotiate on a national basis. Hitler and his clique were the German Government. With Hitler and some of his gang dead and the others scattered to the four corners of Germany, the machinery of government was nonexistent and it was necessary for the Allies to take over as quickly as occupation of area by area progressed. That meant that regional governmental authority had to be set up to administer legislative, judicial, political, economic, and security controls by the three powers originally concerned—the United States, the British, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It naturally followed that regional policies were sometimes at considerable variance. Under such conditions it was inevitable that the problem of remolding policies and administrative procedure to implement the aims of the Allies projected many very serious difficulties.

While the Atlantic Charter and other understandings on record between the Big Three served as general guides toward common objectives and policies, as well as uniformity of procedure to implement these policies and objectives, it was not until after the Potsdam Conference in July 1945, that basic formulae were promulgated for the Allied military government.

The Potsdam Conference declared that if Germany were to be given the opportunity to reestablish her way of life on basic democratic principles and to reconstruct her national economy to exist without external support it would be necessary to treat Germany as an economic unit. The Potsdam Conference specifically declared that central administrative departments should be established as early as possible to administer the departments of communications, transportation, finance, industry, and international trade. Consonant with that pronouncement, plans were developed for the establishment of a central German department of communications and posts.

The French Provisional Government was invited to join the other three powers of occupation on a quadripartite basis and on a footing of equality and with jurisdictional spheres of authority over territory or zone assignments in western Germany and over a district of Berlin. However, France, not having participated in the Potsdam Conference, did not deem herself bound or committed by the agreements or commitments of the other three powers. Fearful of a possible rebirth of a strong central German Government and stressing the two devastating invasions of France within a short span of 32 years, and three invasions within a period of 68 years, she has uncompromisingly opposed every effort or policy toward the establishment of any form of centralized authority or governmental structure for Germany.

Perhaps it was a mistake to invite France to join the three victorious powers on a footing of equality so soon for, after all, it would not have been unreasonable to have treated her on equality with Belgium, Holland, Poland, or any other liberated country that also fought to the limit of its strength and resources but was forced to succumb and to become a part of that world dominated by the Nazi oligarchy. No doubt, the action of the three occupying powers was motivated by a strong bond of sympathy and friendship for France as a former stanch ally and as one of the former great powers of the world. However, the France of today is not the France of pre-World War I. Two devastating wars within 32 years have done something to France. She has been left weakened industrially and commercially, she is torn by political strife and without the strong leadership of World War I to guide her through these difficult times. With the sharp disagreements between her numerous political parties and blocs she finds it difficult to achieve unity as to policies or a constructive program to bring order out of chaos and to rehabilitate her economic life.

I do not share the feeling of relief and satisfaction expressed by political writers and commentators on the results of the recent election in France. While it is true that the Popular Republican Movement (M. R. P.) emerged as the leading party in France, it must be remembered that the Communist Party came through as the second strongest party with the Socialists third and the others trailing. The vote was: Popular Republican Movement 5,491,180; Communists 5,136,334; Socialists 4,165,813. A Communist victory would have meant that France too would have joined the group of nations now associated with Russia and her ideologies. As it is, there will have to be a coalition government for France in which the Communists will play a dominant role. A victory for communism would have naturally strengthened the Soviet drive to expand her orbit of influence.

I submit that if the Communist Party were the second party in voting power and influence in the United States we should have real cause to feel concerned about the enduring stability of our constitutional system of Government.

I derived this encouragement out of the victory of the Popular Republican Movement and that is that it may be regarded as evidence that the French people are rousing themselves out of an attitude described to me by a high French official as one of indifference and self-pity, resigned to the untenable proposition that they have a right to expect that their more prosperous allies shall supply their needs, with glances directed especially toward the United States. There have been many indications that a considerable portion of the people instead of being grateful to the United States for what the latter has done for France show an attitude of disappointment and unfriendliness because the importation and distribution of food and supplies is, according to their viewpoint, too restrictively controlled.

In this situation it is perhaps a little difficut for all of us to understand why our Government and people have been so tolerant with the haughty and sometimes arrogant attitude of the former De Gaulle provisional government and with the attitude of the present government in obstructing some of the policies and commitments of the Potsdam Conference. The only explanation that seems at all plausible is that there is a wholehearted desire on the part of our Government and of the Allied Control Council and its subordinate agencies to solve all international problems and issues, no matter how seemingly difficult, in some amicable way and to surmount every obstacle that might tend to defeat the compelling objective of international accord so necessary to achieve the enduring peace of the world. However, this goal cannot be achieved if any of the powers seek advantages that cannot be justified in terms of equity or fair play or if any of the powers subordinate the objective of world accord to nationalistic aims.

There comes a time when patience ceases to be a virtue, and I believe the time has come when we must take a very definite stand against any attitude of noncooperation on the part of any of the Allies and against tactics of obstruction of the policies and commitments that have been agreed upon for the purpose of restoring order and peace. Our Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, has given the American people a vivid picture of our international negotiations and the necessity forced upon us to take a firm stand against the nationalistic aims of some of our allies, under which they try to extend their spheres not only politically but territorially as well.

Some way must be found to change attitudes that have become disturbingly noncooperative in the negotiations intended to lead the way to unity of action and peace.

The military victory of the Allies unfortunately did not carry with it an easy solution of the old problem of the balance of power, nor did it decide under which political regime Europe shall live, or how the control of commerce and international trade shall be adjusted by the interested nations. It may seem difficult for Great Britain to recognize that the absolute dominance she formerly held in the areas of the Mediterranean and the Red Seas can no longer be maintained if the rights of the other nations concerned are to be given proper recognition. Progress toward the early solution of our international problems is not promoted by her insistence upon control over most of the Italian colonies in the Mediterranean and African areas, and by keeping her troops in those areas in the furtherance of her plans.

It is hoped that before too much time is lost, the same fine cooperation that enabled the Allies to win the war shall also prevail to win the peace.

May I digress here long enough to voice the opinion that there are many political symptoms indicating that we are afflicted with an excess of democracy. How much longer will democracies like the United States, France, and Great Britain regard with patronizing tolerance the arrogant efforts of foreign-dominated political groups to incite internal economic strife and unrest to further their very obvious purposes and, yes, even dare to go so far as to flaunt their disloyalty in their support of the foreign policies of the country of their allegiance and in the disparagement and condemnation of the foreign policies and aims of the country in which they choose to live and under the flag of which they seek protection and immunity?

How much longer will we permit these foreign-controlled groups, as well as our home-front, Government-defying pressure groups, to push our Government around in the ruthless promotion of their selfish and unpatriotic ends? Respect for the sovereignty of our Government and its laws must not be permitted to deteriorate to the point where it is all but nonexistent. It is high time that we take steps to reeducate our people to understand the difference between liberty and license under our Constitution and the Bill of Rights. We prefer this course to the course of liquidation which is the answer for subversive behavior when attempted in countries dominated by totalitarianism.

Getting back to the problems of the civilian postal service, it was generally understood that to delay the establishment of essential central German agencies was to delay the rehabilitation of the German economy under which she can be made self-supporting. The plans for a central department of communications and posts were prepared by the American representatives, under the direction of Brig. Gen. Frank C. Meade, as early as last August, but when presented for quadripartite agreement, the French representative stated that his Government could not subscribe to such a plan, and, therefore, he could not join his colleagues on the committee to effectuate the necessary unanimous agreement required under the Charter to validate any proposal. Repeated efforts to bring the French in line have met with firm resistance. The result has been a serious slowing down of organizational progress and consequent delays in the orderly resumption of the German civilian postal and telecommunications services.

It was made necessary to establish zonal administrative organizations for each zone with no central control as to policies, directives, budgeting, accounting, etc., and only such uniformity in operational procedure as could be mutually agreed upon in quadripartite meetings of the Allied Communications and Post Committee. Obviously in this situation there were many inherent complications that required most careful and tactful handling. Each zone set up its services for the time being as far as practicable under the established reichpost directorates (six in the United States zone) with plans looking toward bringing their operations under a central authority, a senior directorate, for each zone to supervise and control the operations of the several reichpost directorates within each zone. As a matter of policy the United States military authorities deemed it advisable not to be too quick to give even inferential support to any lurking plan for the dismemberment of Germany or to give impetus to such a plan by setting up in each zone separate and independent governing agencies. The United States effort was therefore directed toward obtaining quadripartite agreement on the American proposals for a central German Department of Communications and Posts in accordance with the Potsdam agreement and it was not until all efforts in that direction seemed doomed to fail in its purpose that we were given the green light to proceed with the organization of a senior directorate.

It is necessary for the communications branch of the I. and A. C. Divisions to supervise and control the postal and telecommunications activities within the United States zone. During the period of the drive for a central German Department of Communications and Posts our demilitarization and denazification program had eliminated from the field of availability practically all former executives and supervisors of the German Reichpost leaving only the lower-grade supervisors and workers from which to draw material for executive and supervisory positions.

Our policy of German demilitarization and denazification, under extreme pressure from home, has been carried very aggressively to virtual completion. In our denazification drive we have probably been more zealous than practical. By purging practically every person who held any position of trust or responsibility, either in Government departments or in industry or commerce, on the broad assumption that he was more than a nominal Nazi just because he held a supervisory or managerial position, the United States military government was left without competent German leadership to give much-needed assistance in the program of reorganization and rehabilitation of the German economy in the United States zone. We were reduced to a choice from a field of a very limited number of old supervisors and managers who dared to resist the Nazi control and therefore spent most of the 12 years of the Nazi regime in prison camps or in hiding, completely without contact with their former jobs, or else we had to try to draw on the field of younger men with no previous executive or supervisory experience.

The late Gen. George S. Patton recognized that our policy was extreme and wished to keep our program on a par with the more practical plan of the British, the French, and the Russians. He saw that our extreme purge left us without constructive German leadership to help us implement our plans and directives. It is to be regretted that for his sensible and practical attitude he was cruelly criticized and condemned in the United States and forced to the humiliation of being transferred to another assignment.

This purge, as applied to the German civilian postal service, resulted in the elimination of between 75 and 85 percent of the officials and supervisors of the German Reichpost and the weeding out is still going on as new information is revealed as to former connections with Nazi or Nazi-affiliated organizations.

This system of purging also reaches into the strata of civil-service employees such as clerks and letter carriers, also non-civil-service employees, so-called workers. As illustrative of the result of our extremely rigid denazification purges, the experience of the Munich Reichpost Directorate may be cited. Here the purge eliminated 85 percent of the top officials, 65 percent of the minor officials, 35 percent of the civil-service employees (clerks and carriers), and 14 percent of the non-civil-service employees. Here approximately 12,000 employees and officials out of a total of 34,000 in the Munich Reichpost Directorate, or 35 percent were purged.

Now visualize, if you will, what such a raid on the official staff and personnel of the Post Office Department, on the postal service of the Washington, D. C., post office or Chicago, Boston, or San Francisco would do to Uncle Sam's postal service, or what it would do to any other well-organized public, commercial, or industrial institution. Yet experience proves over and over again that when there is an important job to be done and there is a deep impelling realization of the importance of doing that job well, no difficulties seem to be insurmountable, and so in spite of the handicap of a decimated German postal and telecommunications personnel, of destroyed or damaged postal buildings, equipment and facilities and of disrupted transportation, the German civilian postal service, thanks to the fine cooperation we received from the Army, has resumed operations and is functioning on a level adequate to meet, in the order of priority, the needs of the occupation forces, the military government units, the German governmental agencies, the welfare organizations, and essential civilian services.

Having reestablished domestic postal service for all of Germany our next aim was to establish international postal service. We set our target date for April 1 for the inauguration of this service and I am pleased to say that this service was actually started April 1 as planned. This proposal had the support of our British colleague from the start but was accomplished only after wearing down many objections by our Russian and French colleagues in our quadripartite meetings.

This service was initially limited to correspondence of a purely private or family nature of nonillustrated post cards and letters up to 20 grams. This service is to be expanded to include nontransactional and transactional communications when the State, Treasury, War, and Post Office Departments may agree upon the advisability of such further expansion, subject to approval on a quadripartite basis for all of Germany or, if no agreement, then on a unilateral basis for the United States zone. This also applies to parcel post.

In the light of our experience, may I say, parenthetically, that we found it a little difficult to understand a seeming attitude of aloofness on the part of the Post Office Department toward the rehabilitation of the German communications system which after all is a part of our Government's solemn commitment and common bond with our Allies to reconstruct the economic life of Germany, out of a realm of devastation and chaos.

The Post Office Department did not seem to see its way clear to release any qualified supervisory officials or post office inspectors from its organization, on the explanation that they could not be spared. The seven post office inspectors and one railway mail service official released by the Army Postal Service for transfer to the postal section of the United States military government had no encouragement from the Post Office Department as to their reemployment and seniority rights in the postal service if they chose to remain with our organization in Germany.

However, the Executive order of April 11, it is good to know, now gives them the assurance they have been waiting for.

Fortunately, several very good officials who have retired from the postal service joined our organization and are doing a splendid job in the postal section of the United States military government, Germany. You know them well—Frank Ellis, Steve Cisler, and Tom Randles. I am sure they would wish me to extend their cordial greetings to all of you.

Because of the very high regard I entertain for the soundness and stability of the United States postal service it is inconceivable that this organization of considerably more than a quarter of a million of high-type employees with thousands of supervisory officials, postmasters, assistant postmasters, and inspectors would have faltered or suffered in reputation for efficiency if from that organization 12 to 20 men would have been temporarily assigned with the United States military government in Germany as a part of an organization that is charged with carrying out one of the most serious and responsible commitments ever undertaken by the United States Government—that is to insure the stability of Europe and the enduring peace of the world.

Many of the international issues have in them the germs of distrust, suspicion, fear, prejudice, or even hatred. These issues must be resolved if we are to have international accord and a just and enduring peace. I feel that our Government has never associated itself with a more serious or profound responsibility. People here at home, perhaps too far removed personally from contact with the seriousness of world conditions as observed in Europe, I am afraid do not fully realize or wish to acknowledge definite obligations to support and back up the United States military government in Germany, so that our commitments as expressed in various charters but especially in the Potsdam Conference, shall not be scandalized either through failure to hold steadfast to the objectives to which we are committed or through our failure to give proper support and strength to the American organizations in Europe charged with carrying the ball for Uncle Sam.

Authorities in Washington, therefore, cannot afford to be indifferent to their responsibilities toward our solemn commitments to attain our goal of restoring order in a war-weary world and to promote international accord and enduring peace. There must be provided such organizational strength, staffed by officials and personnel of such character, integrity, ability, and experience as shall measure up to the job to be done and as shall be equal in skill and capacity with the representatives of the other great powers in dealing with the economic, political, and diplomatic problems to be resolved on an international basis.

I wish that I had the persuasive influence to impress this important phase of our overseas problem upon the responsible administrative authorities. I would have them understand that whether we like it or not we, as the most potential stabilizing influence among the major nations, cannot escape behind the transparent curtain that we are not concerned with the affairs of the world beyond our own shores.

Modern developments in the field of communications, transportation, and economic relations, as well as the interdependence of nations make the old idea of aloofness and snug security as obsolete and as out-moded as the transoceanic sailing vessels.

That being so, we cannot afford to be hesitant in encouraging high-grade men and women to accept with the United States military government in Germany assignments for which they are especially qualified and trained.

We, as a world power, have too much at stake to send amateurs to deal with skilled professionals in the great game of international relations. Without a keen realization of the seriousness of this problem there is grave danger that men and women will be placed in assignments in the European theater for which they have no adequate training, qualifications, or aptitude, and therefore not able to properly represent and protect our interests in dealing with their opposites in international negotiations. I regret to have to make this observation, that through the hysterical pressure brought upon the War Department to speed up the demobilization of the American Army and Navy, a condition was created in the United States military government in Germany that made it very difficult to maintain orderly and efficient operations. The replacement of Army and Navy personnel, and especially of officers in very responsible positions, imposed such a heavy turn-over that continuity of authority and functional procedure was almost completely disrupted. Replacements, if and when received, had to start from scratch without benefit of having understudied the job and many times without experience or knowledge of the serious problems pending when their predecessors were relieved to return to the States. This, of course, is gradually leveling itself off, but, because of this yielding to pressure, our military government in Germany has been deprived of many able executives and administrative officers whose experience and knowledge is sorely needed.

The danger now is that unless the Government is very careful in the selection of replacements, men and women will find their way into responsible assignments not so much because of their qualifications but because they sense an opportunity for self-advantage such as an opportunity to see Europe at Government expense or other forms of exploitation that may seem tempting to them. It should not be enough for the applicants to indicate that they are willing to accept assignments with the United States military government in Europe but a closer investigation should be made into antecedents, special reasons for desiring to accept a European assignment and special qualifications to meet the requirements of the job to which assignment is to be made. Believe me, the British, French, and Russians are not indifferent in their selection of officials to represent their respective governments in the field of international relations, nor are they constantly changing their staff officers. Changes are made only when the best interest of their respective governments make that seem expedient or advisable. Our Government cannot afford to be less careful or firm in the exercise of its control over this very important phase of our mission in Europe.

No one who has had the opportunity to see and brush against the devastation, the poverty, and the economic distortions of Europe can escape a feeling first of dismay and discouragement and then a feeling of revulsion and bitterness toward those responsible for this awful and terrifying world catastrophe and then a sense of pity for the innocent victims of the events of the past 7 years and finally a firm resolve that no matter how difficult, how hopeless, how impossible it may seem to rescue the world from its suffering, sorrow, fear, distrust, prejudices, and selfish nationalistic aims, the challenge must be met no matter how great the sacrifice. This challenge, in the very nature of the circumstances, is leveled more especially at the nations and people whose blessing of liberty and freedom of action have been preserved in spite of the cataclysm of a war unprecedented in the destruction of life, property, and resources, as well as in the shattering of cherished ideals, faith, and hope.

In the renewal of our faith in the justice of a divine providence, we shall find the inspiration, the guidance, and the charity to discharge the responsibilities of a favored people to God and to humanity.

Withholding United States Aid to Satellites Urged To Oppose Soviet Expansion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I include the following article by Constantine Brown from the Washington Sunday Star of July 14, 1946:

WITHHOLDING UNITED STATES AID TO SATELLITES URGED TO OPPOSE SOVIET EXPANSION

(By Constantine Brown)

Important domestic, political, and economic matters which affect the American people more immediately and directly than foreign situations have shoved somewhat into the background recent developments in Paris and other parts of the world. However, these are more telling on the future of price controls, congressional elections, and other important domestic issues than it appears to the average citizen.

The tension between the western powers on the one hand and the Soviet empire on the other which developed within a few weeks after VJ-day continues and there are no indications that it will subside in the near future.

This tension extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific and embraces in one form or another the whole globe. In Europe it has taken an acute form in spite of the apparent occasional conciliatory attitude of Foreign Minister Molotov. In Asia it has taken the shape of bitter opposition by the Yenan Communists to any lasting peace formula presented by Gen. George C. Marshall, President Truman's special envoy to China, and in accentuated military preparations of the Russian forces in northern Korea. These latter give much food for thought to General MacArthur, who is responsible for the safety of the American force under Lieutenant General Hodges which is in southern Korea as a police force until some final decision regarding the fate of that country has been reached.

COMPROMISE CONSIDERED WEAKNESS

In South America the Moscow sympathizers are shouting at the top of their voices against American imperialism and are denouncing Washington policies as aimed at subjugation of the Southern Hemisphere. Short-wave broadcasts from Moscow which reach that continent for 3 to 4 hours every day are helping along the anti-American propaganda of the local Moscow-subsidized units.

All efforts of the administration to find a modus vivendi with Russia have so far failed lamentably. At first President Truman and Secretary of State Byrnes went on the theory that kindness and cooperation would pay better dividends than harsh talk. This explained the American appeasement policies during the first few months after VJ-day. The Kremlin did not interpret the American patience and willingness to reach compromises at the expense of this country's prestige and principles as goodwill gestures. The willingness of the American Government to give in to most of Russia's demands was regarded as an indication of weakness and impotence.

The eastern mind believes in and respects physical rather than moral power. The concessions offered the U. S. S. R. until the first Paris conference last April coincided with rapid demobilization of the American military, air, and naval forces, with a chain of spectacular strikes and with mutinies in the armed forces. It is not surprising that the 11 men who control the destinies of the Russian Empire believed that the developments in the United States indicate the beginning of the social revolution in the United States.

THOUSANDS OF AGENTS HERE

There are thousands of Russian agents in the United States. Politbureal relies on their reports when it formulates policies. These men are able and astute observers, but have closed minds. Their training does not permit them to see the various facets of life in a country as different from the U. S. S. R. as the United States. The dissatisfaction of the soldiers, the large number of workers in key industries who went on strike, and other squabbles inevitable in a free country were interpreted by Kremlin "ears" as an indication that the old-fashioned form of American democracy was on the way out.

These reports, together with the fact that the American military forces all over the world were being drastically pruned encouraged Moscow in its belief that the American Government's appeasing policy was forced on it by the weakness of the American political system. Hence there was no reason why the Russian diplomats should not press their demands and try to obtain every possible gain in the four corners of the globe.

When the second Paris conference met in June the Soviet representatives discovered that Mr. Byrnes was not in a particularly yielding mood. The Soviet foreign policy can at times gives the impression of flexibility. And Mr. Molotov made concessions. In fact, however, neither the agreement that the question, of the Italian colonies be postponed for another year nor the decision to internationalize Trieste and the adjacent territories represented a solution to the problem. They were mere palliatives to give Russia more time to press her demands at a more opportune moment. The internationalization of the Trieste areas is recognized as a mere makeshift arrangement which in all likelihood will last only a few weeks after the last American and British forces which are garrisoning the Morgan line have been withdrawn.

HAS NO ILLUSIONS

If some of Mr. Byrnes' associates in Paris report him correctly, the Secretary of State has no illusions about Russia's intention in regard to Europe. Not only is he convinced that the Muscovites intend to stay in all the encroached territory, but he is said to believe that they intend to expand their zone of influence as far west toward the Channel as possible. Britain's actual weakness and America's apparent impotence are playing an important role in Moscow's well-defined program.

There is an American military force in Europe today. This force is too small to oppose by force a further Soviet expansion westward and too large to keep out of trouble in the event minor incidents occur. The American contingents have been left in Germany, in Austria, and on the disputed Italian-Yugoslav line in accordance with commitments made during the war.

President Roosevelt envisaged during the Yalta conference that the United States would be able to maintain some 1,500,000 men across the Atlantic for a number of years. The suggestion of his military advisers that as soon as an armistice was concluded the men themselves and public opinion at home would not allow the maintenance of such a large force remained unheeded. Today the American contingent represents less than 5 percent of the number regarded necessary by Mr. Roosevelt to bring about a just peace.

TRIESTE COMPROMISE EXPLAINED

Because of the size of this army and dangers to which it may be exposed, particularly from some of Russia's satellites, Secretary Byrnes is attempting to bring about the signature of peace treaties which would justify the immediate withdrawal of the American forces located in danger spots.

This also will explain in the near future whatever concessions the Secretary of State may be willing to make in regard to Austria where the 11,000 men under the command of Lt. Gen. Mark Clark are considered by competent military authorities as mere hostages.

The acceptance of Russia's demands in Europe and other parts of the world where we are facing overwhelming Red armies is not, however, the answer to our desire for a lasting peace. Thirst for territorial expansion and domination of other peoples' territories is like an illness which spreads and destroys all the tissues unless it is stopped by medical or surgical intervention. None of the western powers have any desire to "operate" or to stop by force Russian penetrations all over the world. But some of Mr. Byrnes' advisers believe there still is a possibility of isolating the microbe, by a stern refusal to indorse her encroachments and by a policy of refraining from any kind of assistance to the Soviet satellites.

Prevention of Unwarranted Price Increases

REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, at this hour no one can predict what the future of the OPA is going to be in the next few months. It may well be that Congress will approve a bill providing for the decontrol of certain items, and it is certain that if OPA is properly administered in the next year, in case it is extended, that it should remove controls from commodities where the supply becomes reasonably equal with the demand.

I do, however, know that the time will come in the not far distant future when there will not be any controls to prevent increases in the cost of living. In any event, it is of more fundamental importance than the OPA can ever be for the people of the Nation to be prepared by their own efforts to resist unwarranted and unjustified increases in the prices of certain commodities.

Furthermore, to the extent that the people are able to take effective action to discourage such unwarranted and unjustified increases, they will be acting to the benefit of those producers and distributors who do not take advantage of opportunities to raise their prices beyond a fair economic level.

For all these reasons I have felt it important at the present time to introduce legislation which would provide the people of the Nation with the necessary information which would enable them in an effective and discriminating fashion to withhold their purchases from specific commodities, the prices of which have sharply increased.

I have accordingly prepared and introduced today a bill which will provide at much more frequent and regular intervals, of not longer than 1 week, information on changes in prices on the select list of goods and services which are significant components of the cost of living. The bill provides specifically for an expansion of the services of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in this field. The text of the bill follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Labor, acting through the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor, is hereby authorized and directed to secure information not less frequently than once each week on changes in retail prices for a selected list of goods and services determined by the Secretary of Labor to be significant components of the cost of living. The Bureau shall make such information widely available to the public generally at least once each week. The date published shall contain information on changes in retail prices of the individual items in various localities and on a Nation-wide basis. The Bureau shall maintain mailing lists for prompt service to any organization or individual in the United States requesting such information on the movement of prices.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. This authorization shall be in addition to sums for cost-of-living studies and reports provided for in the Labor-Federal Security Appropriation Act, 1947.

Thus the passage of my bill will make it possible for the consumers of America to know from week to week what items in their living costs have advanced most sharply and which ones on the other hand have been held at a reasonably stable level. It is obviously impractical for the people to resist a general upward trend in prices by not buying anything at all. Neither would such action be equitable on their part, since we can reasonably expect that in fields where competition is strong, production vigorous, and where wise counsels prevail, prices will be held at fair economic levels.

The thing that really is needed is to enable the people to select specific cases where unwarranted price increases have taken place and to withhold their purchases as to those particular things. The central purpose of my bill is to make this possible in all the communities of the country.

Clason's Tax Proposal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. CLASON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, recently I brought to the attention of the Members of the House the need for a reduction in Federal income taxes if and when subsidies are removed from farm and other products. In the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1946, these subsidies were at least $2,644,380,000—much more if Government grants indirectly helping various groups of people were included. Some of these subsidies, terminated by the Senate-passed OPA bill, are: Butter, $34,444,000; flour, $208,000,000; livestock, $684,000,000; dairy products, $496,500,000; beef, $40,000,000; sheep, $36,000,000; oil seeds, $61,000,000; and petroleum, $112,522,000.

As the ending of butter subsidies is credited with increasing the price of butter 11 cents a pound, of dairy subsidies increasing milk 3 cents a quart on the average, and of various cuts of meats by several cents a pound it is obvious that American housewives are entitled to keep in their pocketbooks the money collected from them by the United States Treasury to pay for these subsidies which will no longer be paid.

My remarks have brought many comments of approval. Immediate action is necessary. I believe my colleagues will agree with the following editorial from the Springfield (Mass.) Evening Union of July 12, 1946:

CLASON'S TAX PROPOSAL

With the removal of Federal subsidies on food, Representative CHARLES R. CLASON, of the Second Massachusetts District, proposes that the Government cut the withholding tax on pay rolls by an amount equal to the amount of the subsidies. The Springfield Congressman said that the anticipated saving to the Government of about $2,500,000,000 should be passed along to the taxpayers. He declared:

"That will permit our people to pay increased prices insofar as they represent terminated subsidies. Since the Government collected taxes to make the subsidy payments, it is only fair that the taxes be cut as the subsidies end."

It is such devices as Mr. CLASON suggested that will serve to counterbalance any bulge toward inflation that may appear before the traditional laws of competition restore a balanced market and a balanced price structure. Subsidy payments have amounted to about a quarter of the withholding tax, roughly speaking, and restoration of that amount to the income of the taxpayer should compensate for increased food prices, perhaps with something left over to act as a shock absorber for rises in other commodities in the next few months.

People on the whole are too likely to disregard the implications of tax-advances and the disbursements from tax revenues. The average man may believe that there is no alternative to his paying more money for food than to settle his grocery and meat bill at higher prices, without a chance of compensating for his loss.

Representative CLASON forcefully brings to mind the direct relation between expensive Government programs and the taxpayer's dollar in his current proposal. The Government itself, no doubt, has other plans for diverting the amount saved on subsidies to other projects. It is notable that taxes once enacted have only a slight chance of being rescinded. Temporary taxes have a way of becoming permanent. Yet in this case, logic points to the advisability of using the subsidy taxes in a direct effort to combat even transient inflation by subsidizing the buyer, instead of the seller—and doing it with the buyer's own hard-earned money.

There are, of course, many millions of Americans who are not taxed by the withholding method. Mr. CLASON asked the House to consider immediately methods of aiding those in this category who are not subject to the withholding tax, as part of his over-all plan to offset rising prices resulting from the end of the food subsidies. He placed special emphasis on those with small fixed incomes who will find advances in the price of their food a serious additional drain on their pocketbooks.

The tendency to increase food prices is evident, though not in the degree that was anticipated by those who fought for the retention of OPA. A newspaper survey of the Nation's principal cities indicates a general hold-the-line attitude, in spite of steep price increases in some instances and continuing scarcities in some lines. The survey shows that meat and dairy prices are up substantially, though supplies of meat are increasing. This exception to holding the line points up the necessity of helping the consumer of food, whose needs are constant and great.

The Clason plan, if adopted by Congress, would result in a strategic stop-gap that would tide consumers over until food supplies are again in normal abundance, with prices responsive to the law of supply and demand. In fact, it seems the most logical step the Government can take to help the greatest number of people at a cost that is wholly discountable, since it would be represented by an amount already being paid out in the form of subsidies which would no longer be in effect.

Can Congress Cure Itself?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMILY TAFT DOUGLAS
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks, I wish to include two editorials which illustrate the need of machinery for promoting better teamwork between Congress and the President, such as the legislative reorganization bill provides for in the proposed Policy Committee and the Joint Legislative-Executive Council:

[From the Minneapolis Star Journal of July 3, 1946]

CONGRESS ON STRIKE

President Truman strongly implied in his Saturday speech to the Nation that Congress had stalled on an OPA decision. The President was right. Congress has dallied not only on OPA, but on the draft, the loan to Britain, and almost every other important question which has come before it in recent months. The country had a right to know, long before price controls expired, what the future was to hold in that respect.

These same Congressmen shout vengeance when labor stoppages halt production, but they have been on a virtual strike since VJ-day.

Many of them, of course, are away from Washington for the primary election campaigns, though the do-nothingness and discord were apparent long before that necessity arose.

Congress could help get itself out of the doldrums by passing the La Follette-Monroney reorganization bill. That measure provides for majority and minority policy committees, also a legislative-executive council to maintain relations with the administration. It overhauls the whole system of standing committees, some of which now are overworked and some of which do virtually nothing. Unfortunately, the bill does little to correct filibusters and other time-wasters.

The bill provides for $15,000 congressional salaries, in place of the present $10,000. Such a raise long has been needed and would obviate the $2,500 expense account subterfuge, in which the Senate finally has joined the House. The expense of holding congressional office comes high and the larger salary should attract talented men.

Indeed, Congress might add a sound pension system. Surely men like Senator SHIPSTEAD, who have given their prime years to public service, should be able to retire under some sort of social security.

Let Congress get busy. An orderly dispatch of legislative matters would be a splendid example to a nation which needs primarily to get down to business.

[From the Houston Post of July 3, 1946]

CAN CONGRESS CURE ITSELF?

The present cleavage between the two Houses of Congress on price control extension clearly demonstrates the need for just the kind of streamlining provided for in the modernizing bill now before the legislative bodies.

The House of Representatives has passed a stop-gap OPA extension measure by a vote of 283 to 61. But the Senate appears to be in no mood to agree on what, if anything, should be done about interim or permanent price legislation. Sentiment in the upper House ranges all the way between that of Senator WAGNER, for OPA extension, to that of Senator O'DANIEL, whose opposition to price control is even more vigorous than Senator TAFT'S.

The current indecision argues for congressional streamlining in still another way. The legislative branch should have determined the fate of price control months ago, if only for the sake of the public's nerves and the businessman's blood pressure. If producers and consumers could have looked ahead with full knowledge that price control was going to be continued for a year past June 30, or even that it was going to end for good on that date, then we could at least have faced the future with resignation or certainty.

The bill to modernize Congress may not guarantee that conditions like the present one will not arise again, but it would do a great deal to enable both houses to work faster and more efficiently. First, it would reduce the number of congressional committees, but it also would provide each committee with a group of appointed experts to do the greater part of the spadework on facts and figures.

The bill further provides for a joint Senate-House committee to coordinate the efforts of the Houses and make for better teamwork on legislation. There would be another joint council to improve liaison between the legislative and executive branches.

There is, we regret to say, no indication that action on the streamlining proposals is certain to be taken at the present session of Congress. The provisions of the bill are complicated, and to some minds they may seem revolutionary. Furthermore, the elimination of certain committees is sure to be opposed by some of those Members of Congress who would lose prestige thereby.

The general attitude toward the bill is such that one wonders whether Congress actually has the temerity to streamline itself. Certain Members of the House and the Senate do have the requisite honesty and courage, for they have worked hard to frame the streamliner bill. And it is time these Members had the whole-hearted support of the public.

Need for Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AIME J. FORAND
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, the rising cost of food and other commodities since the price-control law expired on June 30 has already made itself felt to the point where the American people are disturbed. They are disturbed because they realize that the value of their dollar has already depreciated by anywhere from 20 to 25 percent insofar as the purchase of the necessities of life go.

The city of Providence, R. I., has taken official cognizance of the fact and has adopted a resolution calling upon the Congress of the United States to speedily reenact legislation designed to prevent the spiral of inflation which seems about to engulf our Nation; and, under leave already granted me, I include in my remarks the following resolution adopted by the City Council of the City of Providence, R. I.:

Whereas the President of these United States has deemed it advisable to veto that act passed by Congress continuing in force controls over commodities and services necessary to preserve the economic stabilization of our country, because said act would not in fact keep down prices; and

Whereas in consequence whereof, the Office of Price Administration terminated on June 30, 1946, and all price controls have come to an end; and

Whereas there are still not enough materials or available housing to satisfy the pent-up demand of the people and especially the returning war veterans for such goods and housing; and

Whereas failure to restore price controls over commodities, manufactured goods, and rents will lead to wild inflation, to be followed by economic disorder; and

Whereas the public welfare of this country requires and demands a continuance of necessary controls through the reconversion period to forestall such "boom and bust" era: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this City Council of the City of Providence in the State of Rhode Island calls upon the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate to speedily reenact legislation designed to prevent the spiral of inflation which seems about to engulf our Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That engrossed copies of this resolution be sent to the Rhode Island Members of the National Congress, namely, Senators PETER G. GERRY and THEODORE F. GREEN and Congressmen JOHN E. FOGARTY and AIME J. FORAND.

New Price Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Sunday Star of July 14, 1946:

NEW PRICE BILL

When he vetoed the OPA extension bill last month, President Truman said he had chosen an alternative which enabled him "to call upon the Congress to give the American people a real, workable price control law." And in his radio talk that evening he urged the people of the country to join with him in making this demand upon the Congress.

It is a fair inference that the President has been disappointed in both respects. For a few days after the veto the congressional mail ran heavily in support of Mr. Truman. But the volume dwindled quickly, and in recent days some Senators have found their mail about evenly divided between those opposing and those favoring OPA. Certainly there has not been forthcoming the widespread and sustained public pressure on Congress for which the President must have hoped. And this lack of pressure for a real, workable price-control law is reflected in the new bill which the Senate has passed.

This bill may prove less objectionable to the President than its predecessor in that it does not contain the Taft and Wherry amendments to which he had taken particular exception in his veto message. Nevertheless, it is so loaded with exemptions, many of which are designed to promote the interests of special groups, that it falls far short of meeting the standards laid down by Mr. Truman.

Because of this it is freely predicted that the President will also veto this bill if it finally emerges from Congress in substantially its present form. Perhaps he will do so, but the fact remains that Mr. Truman would be amply justified in taking the other course. He brought the deficiencies of the earlier bill, as he saw them, to the attention of the people. He sought their support. And he gave Congress an opportunity to reconsider its earlier action in the light of the objections he had raised. On the basis of these facts, the President may conclude that he has done all that he properly could do, and that it would be better to sign the new bill, with such controls as it may include after the House acts, than to write another veto and run the grave risk of getting no legislation.

Common Sense and OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL STEFAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a talk on price control by William K. Jackson:

For the first time in 5 years we as a Nation have had opportunity to watch markets and business function without Government price control. The President's veto of the OPA extension bill restored—temporarily at least—the greatest measure of freedom the market place and business enterprise have known since the imposition of wartime regulations.

Now the natural forces are at work in the market place. These forces are operating to bring about the countless readjustments necessary to balance supply and demand, return trade to its usual channels, expand production, and to counteract the inflationary trend.

The inflationary pressure for higher prices, it must be borne in mind, springs basically from the tremendous expenditures for war and Federal borrowing to finance the Government's deficits. That is the root of the inflation problem. Under the wisest administration, OPA can operate only as a secondary control over prices. An end to Federal deficit spending and removal of obstacles to full production over the long run would be far more effective than OPA controls in stabilizing prices.

Whether or not Congress revives OPA, this period of freedom from price control is a valuable experience for every one of us. It gives us a chance to look at the facts and do our own thinking. For weeks this country has been bombarded with frightening predictions of what would happen if OPA expired. These "scare" forecasts naturally came mostly from those who want Congress to continue price control without change.

Now we face the realities in which we live—worker, farmer, clerk, businessman, wife, and family. We can read the black headlines, the excited prediction of soaring prices, the endless discussions of price control—and then go to the butcher, the baker, and the department store and see for ourselves.

One lesson we learn in periods like this is that news mostly dwells on abnormalities. News, as the saying goes, is the man biting the dog. For every price mark-up which made the headlines lately, there were thousands of prices maintained unchanged after OPA expired June 30.

The proof of price-control theory will be in the experiences of millions of consumers who have opportunity to observe on their own what happens in a relatively free market.

Once again in the past fortnight we have seen something we all know but occasionally forget. That one thing is the common sense of the average American citizen. I have seen that common sense go to work any number of times. So have you.

The last and most dramatic occasion was on a December afternoon nearly 5 years ago. Do you remember the national tailspin we went into on the day of Pearl Harbor? Do you remember the rumors that followed—that our fleet was gone; the Japs would land in California; that air raids would smash our cities? It took us more than a week to calm down, to go to work, to use our common sense—but we did, and we won our war because we had faith in ourselves and in each other.

We have another war on our hands right now against a more insidious enemy than human beings from some other land. This war is against the forces of inflation, of boom and bust, and of economic disintegration.

We shall win that war, too—and in the same fashion as we defeated the Japanese. Our weapons will be production—this time the production of goods for our own consumption; another will be our faith in each other and our willingness to work; the strongest weapon of all will be our ability to face reality—to use American common sense.

What is the first reality? Just this: Forget whether Congress or the President ended price control. Price control was over before a Congressman voted, and before the President had written a line of his veto message.

You, the average consumer, could see from day to day that it was over. You saw it in the black market, in the tie-in sale, in the under-the-counter goods only a few could buy. You saw it in the distress buying of real estate at high prices—people were no longer buying houses; they were buying housing, and thus escaping rent controls.

You could see that price control was over by a glance at empty shelves—no merchandise, but with an OPA price tag on the ledge. You could see it in the decline of quality in clothing, in furniture, in service, in portions of restaurant food.

Common sense told you that price control was gone, and that all the talk of continuance was a bureaucratic din covering up the crash.

There's a second reality we should face in the same manner. That is that no one group was responsible for the sudden death of OPA. The Government official was not to blame—even angels could not make such a distortion really work. There is no law that could be written or amended that could control the complexity of the daily lives of 140,000,000 free citizens.

The businessman was not to blame for the death of OPA. Every tradition in the field of business was violated by that act—the tradition of service, of competition, of finding a way to a bigger share of the market by doing a better selling or producing or servicing job.

The consumer was not to blame for the passing of OPA. He had the need, and he had the money for goods that are part of the American way of living. He believed in the policy of "work hard, spend hard, save what's left for a rainy day." Everyone may not like that policy, but it's a reality through which Americans have more telephones, more automobiles, more machines, and more zest out of life.

What about the realities that lie ahead? They are even more important than those we have just recognized. Let's take a look at a few of them.

First of all, we ought to get out of our minds that without OPA the consumer is at the mercy of the merchant, the manufacturer, or the farmer. We still have the strongest law of all to protect us, and, believe me, it is working now and will go on working.

It's the law of supply and demand. It's the law that works when you need a suit and I have a suit to sell. Unless your house has burned down in the night and left you nothing but your night clothes, you can wait a few days or even a few weeks for that new suit. The longer you wait, the more I begin to think that I could take a little less for the suit, to get you to buy it now.

That process will go on now, tomorrow, and forever—and it's a sure cure for unfair prices, so long as everyone does his part. Your part may be making the suit, and my part the selling of it. We both have our parts to do.

So, common sense tells us that there always has been and always will be a natural and automatic regulator between buyer and seller, and that no one has to make it work. It has both a self-starter and good brakes.

Our next reality is this: You can't be gouged by some vague thing called "business," or "distribution," or by just "retailers" or "manufacturers."

Let's forget labels and abstractions and just think in terms of people. Take your grocer, for example. He's a real person. You know his name and he knows yours. He has been serving you for 10 years, possibly, and he has had to worry and hustle to keep your patronage. Isn't it just common sense to realize that there's more profit for him in keeping you as a customer for another 10 years than in squeezing a few unfair dollars out of you in the next few months and losing you for good?

Or let's look at the auto dealer in your town. He will want to make a profit on the next car he sells to you, but there are also other profits he will keep in mind—the profit from servicing your car so long as you have it, and the profit on repair parts and on the next car you buy.

Then, again, there's the department store where you have a charge account. There is no more competitive business anywhere than in the department store field. Is it reasonable to think that with hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in buildings, equipment, and merchandise, that the department store owner will let you build up a life-time grudge for a few weeks' extra profits?

Wherever you go to spend a hard-earned dollar, you will be dealing with people—decent people, smart people, who can be counted on to see a little beyond the end of their noses.

One other thing along this line of common sense: All these people are not only sellers, but buyers. The grocer sells to you but he buys from the manufacturer. The manufacturer sells to the grocer but he buys from the producer. And the producer, who sells to the manufacturer has to go out and replace the thing he sells. He will be buying just as closely as you. He's a person, just like you. The same things that you like, he likes, too. The same things you worry about, worry him.

Finally, let us use common sense on one other point: Each one of us is like a coin with two sides. On one side we are consumers and like to buy cheaply. On the other side we are producers—of something or other, corn or wheat, shoes or tires, medical or legal service, if we are professional people. We like to get a high price for that side of us.

Some of us have not had high enough prices for our production. The costs have been hidden by Government subsidies or by roll-backs by OPA decrees. Now these costs come out in the open. They will show in the cost of goods. So, too, will recent wage increases.

In a market where supply and demand are free to achieve their own balance, through the medium of prices, you would see the change come gradually—more competition in business, better goods on the shelves, more choice in the things you need.

Meanwhile, remember that there are some who believe in permanent price control. They are the advocates of a controlled economy as a permanent national policy. They will be busy searching out the spots where things go wrong, where there is an occasional chiseler.

We who operate America's business establishments must take our chances on their ability to talk you out of a common-sense analysis of the situation.

I, for one, am happy to take that chance—so long as you think of me not as a businessman but as a person, as one of a lot of other people, as an American with faith in common sense.

Whatever happens to OPA, the real balance wheel in our economy will be the common sense of the American people.

The Farm Implement Dealers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REID F. MURRAY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the farm-implement dealers of Wisconsin were subjected to an arbitrary ruling by the OPA wherein their historical margin of profit was reduced. In the first place, the OPA had no authority of law to make this ruling. It operates under a Presidential order. The Congress never intended to delegate such powers to any bureau. It is regrettable that these implement dealers have been caused the harassment and expense they have in trying to correct this wrong. It is also regrettable that Members of Congress are compelled to petition and bow down to such an agency.

The following letters indicate the position of Wisconsin implement dealers and Wisconsin Members of Congress:

NATIONAL RETAIL FARM EQUIPMENT ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., May 29, 1946.

Hon. REID F. MURRAY,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MURRAY: In accordance with our conversation, I am enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Russell Smith, legislative secretary, National Farmers Union, which is self-explanatory.

I am also enclosing a copy of a letter from Mr. Fred Bailey, legislative counsel for the National Grange, addressed to Mr. Paul M. Mulliken, executive secretary of the National Retail Farm Equipment Association. I am sure these letters will be of interest to you.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM R. NOBLE,
Washington Representative.

THE NATIONAL GRANGE.

Mr. PAUL M. MULLIKEN,
Executive Secretary, National Retail Farm Equipment Association,
St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR MR. MULLIKEN: Your letter to Mr. Goss arrived after he had departed for London to be gone about 2 weeks. I am sure that he will want to answer it personally when he returns.

The action of the OPA on farm machinery prices apparently fails to recognize that wages and other costs of implement dealers have gone up along with costs of manufacturers. I am not sufficiently familiar with the dealer's business to know whether this works an unfair hardship on them, but I assume that the competition previously did not permit them unreasonable margins as apparently, the OPA has assumed.

Sincerely yours,

FRED BAILEY,
Legislative Counsel.

FARMERS EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
May 22, 1946.

Mr. WILLIAM R. NOBLE,
Washington Representative, National Retail Farm Equipment Association,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. NOBLE: Your letter regarding the OPA's action on farm implement prices and dealer margins was of very great interest to me. Perhaps you know that Kenneth Hones, chairman of our Farmers Union Committee on the Farm Equipment Emergency, has strongly opposed such action as that taken by OPA. Accordingly, I am wondering if it would be all right with you for us to issue a statement critical of the OPA action in which we would quote from your letter to me. If you will let me know, we will plan on getting out such a statement from Mr. Hones sometime next week.

Sincerely yours,

RUSSELL SMITH,
Legislative Secretary.

MAY 27, 1946.

Hon. PAUL A. PORTER
Administrator, Office of Price Administration,
Washington D. C.

DEAR MR. PORTER: I am enclosing a statement from the Wisconsin Implement Dealers concerning the OPA order of May 10, 1946, affecting dealers' margins on farm implements.

I do not have the information or facilities to make a detailed appraisal of the merits of this issue but the information that I have received from reputable and fair-minded dealers whom I know raises several questions in my mind concerning both the justification of the reduced discounts for the dealers and possible adverse effects resulting therefrom.

To date, the Wisconsin implement dealers have abided scrupulously with all price regulations and Government orders. As far as I know, there have been practically no black-market operations. However, it is feared that this order will force many marginal dealers out of business for lack of sufficient operating income, and encourage a black market.

As I understand the situation, the order was based on the premise that dealers can afford to take reduced margins because of increased volume of sales due to accumulated demand. However, the facts are, insofar as most of the Wisconsin dealers are concerned, their present volume is far below normal and their prospects for the immediate future are not very bright. In addition, the Wisconsin dealers have some special problems as outlined in the dealers' statement.

An additional effect of forcing some dealers out of business will be an impairment of the agricultural facilities for food production; for these dealers will be able no longer to service the old farm machinery, much of which is near the breaking point from intensive use, and all of which is so sorely needed for current production needs.

Because I am apprehensive of the probable effects of this order, I respectfully request that further consideration be given to the problems of the Wisconsin implement dealers. I understand that other members of the Wisconsin congressional delegation are joining in this or similar requests.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.
ALEXANDER WILEY.

Others of the Wisconsin congressional delegation concurring are JOHN W. BYRNES, REID F. MURRAY, WILLIAM H. STEVENSON, MERLIN HULL, ROBERT K. HENRY, ALVIN E. O'KONSKI, LAWRENCE H. SMITH, THAD F. WASIELEWSKI, ANDREW J. BIEMILLER, FRANK B. KEEFE.

Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen

REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, Wall Street and the present administration are unwitting partners in a gigantic conspiracy to destroy the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. The howling henchmen around the President have drowned out the cries for adjustment of the brotherhood's grievances against the railroads. Some of these grievance cases, involving safety measures for the workers, have been pending for 10 years.

The railroad financiers, with their new-found ally, now hope to achieve what their slush fund of millions of dollars failed to accomplish in many years. The ruthless tactics of these forces should be exposed.

Target of this combine is Mr. A. F. Whitney, courageous president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. By smashing the progressive leadership of Mr. Whitney, Wall Street and the Truman administration hope to confuse the workers and split the brotherhood and eventually destroy it. The conspirators have borrowed the Hitler technique of divide and conquer.

Mr. Truman began his public abuse of Mr. Whitney late in May of this year. He has not let up since. The vicious attacks on Mr. Whitney are now coming out into the open. The attacks cannot go further unchallenged. Simple decency and honesty require an answer.

Mr. Truman became peeved at Mr. Whitney because the brotherhood president refused to kowtow to the White House and call off the threatened railroad strike. Mr. Truman had to have an out or an alibi for the strike, which was called because the workers were tired of being pushed around by the Wall Street-White House combine, and he chose Mr. Whitney for his scapegoat.

It is quite evident now, in the light of those hectic developments in May that Mr. Truman's labor advisers were Wall Street attorneys or associates. While Mr. Truman publicly denounced Mr. Whitney, he failed to mention the real issues in the strike. He did not tell the public about the kicking around the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen has been getting for half a century. They had reached the point where they were fed up with White House procrastination and unwelcome and not desired strike was their only weapon of defense.

Mr. Truman, then, touted by members of his party as a liberal, assumed the role of strikebreaker by his strong and loud denunciations of Mr. Whitney.

But the combine did not stop with this. When Wall Street felt that perhaps Mr. Whitney and his Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen had been softened up by the White House blasts they moved in for the kill. Here was an opportunity they for 50 years had been awaiting.

Here, they believed, was a chance utterly to smash Mr. Whitney's leadership and hence the workers' organization.

Specifically, the new line of Wall Street is that Mr. Whitney and his Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen are dangerously big. This is the new cry of Wall Street mouthpieces which includes some newspapers and radios. This is a bold and desperate attempt to mold public opinion into the belief that the brotherhood is an antisocial organization in American life. The conclusion of such phony propaganda is, of course, that Mr. Whitney and his brotherhood should be curbed and ultimately smashed. On the other hand, we who have been watching the labor movement see in Mr. Whitney and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, a bulwark against the insidious infiltration of foreign radical elements into a few other unions and into Government bureaus and departments.

In a recent series of articles in the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Mr. Chads O. Skinner, states his thesis in these words:

> Big labor today is bigger than big business ever was.
> Big labor today is monopolistic in its power to control this Nation's economy in a greater sense than any of the old-fashioned corporate trusts, at which Teddy Roosevelt shook his big stick, ever was.
> Big labor's leaders are political and economic potentates who can exert much vaster control over the lives of the citizens of the United States than was ever exerted by a Gould, Astor, Hill, or Morgan.

Mr. Skinner singles out Mr. Whitney and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen as an example of dangerously big organizations.

Now what are the facts and how can these misrepresentations be answered?

To begin with, all organized labor unions in the country are not worth more than $150,000,000. This figure excludes, of course, insurance reserves carried by some of the unions which is not cash on hand but rather financial obligations due to union policyholders.

The net working capital of American industries has reached the staggering sum of more than $52,000,000,000. To attempt to draw any parallel in the economic strength between labor unions and American industry is, therefore, a downright misrepresentation of the facts.

There is a failure to point out to the American public that the net working capital of American corporations increased more than $6,000,000,000 in 1945 and that the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, with Mr. Whitney as its spokesman, was merely trying to get a tiny slice of this lush melon. With this tremendous backlog of capital, American corporations could afford to engage in prolonged strikes. The American public and the workers themselves do not want strikes.

Wall Street investments in American railroads total $27,000,000,000. The real value of the railroads is nothing like this figure, although Wall Street insists that dividends be paid on this amount. On a show-down between paying dividends on this bloated stock and installing new and modern safety devices for railroad workers, some American financial leaders see to it that the dividends are paid first. Mr. Truman now apparently goes along with the Wall Street belief that property rights are more sacred than human rights and lives. He certainly played the Wall Street game in the railroad strike issue.

Is it any wonder that Mr. Whitney and the members of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen are tired of this disregard of their appeals for better working conditions?

American finance is not satisfied with its reserves of capital. It has succeeded in concentrating the ownership of this capital, and here lies the real danger to the Nation's economy.

Two hundred and fifty giant corporations own two-thirds of the country's manufacturing facilities, and the bulk of this ownership is controlled by a relatively small number of investors.

While Mr. Truman was aiding in the public crucifixion of Mr. Whitney, he forgot to point out that the American railroads in the 16-year period between 1920 and 1936 spent $182,000,000 on propaganda and lobby activities, virtually all designed to destroy the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. I have no authoritative figure on the amount the Railroad Trust has spent since 1936 on anti-union activities. The amount is conservatively estimated at $100,000,000.

In short, the Railroad Trust was allowed by the Government to spend the taxpayers' money simultaneously to brag about its patriotism and to help wreck the unions.

The public attacks on Mr. Whitney and his Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen undoubtedly will continue. The public should be warned against the sources of these attacks. Then will the American people understand that these attacks are the mouthings of a conspiracy born in a union of politics and financial greed.

Civil Rights in a Postwar Era

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 15 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very dynamic and far-sighted address entitled "The Outlook For Liberty—Civil Rights in a Postwar Era," delivered on July 6, 1946, by Robert W. Kenny, attorney general of California, and president of the National Lawyers Guild, at the seventh convention of the National Lawyers Guild, at Cleveland Ohio.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE OUTLOOK FOR LIBERTY—CIVIL RIGHTS IN A POSTWAR ERA

The guns have been silent for less than a year. The scars of battle are still fresh, the victory still new. Yet already there is an alarming tendency throughout our country to forget the kind of war it was, its extent, its untold cost in human agony, what it was fought for. Already there is a tendency to forget the nature of our enemy, the ends we sought to achieve, the very fact that there was a war at all.

This is indeed a fantastic situation. For never before in all history did a group of nations enter a war with their purposes more clearly set forth, with the issue between them and their enemies more clearly defined. The cancer of the Nazi-Fascist ideology, its origin, its nature, its processes, its propaganda, its methods, its development, its inevitable culmination in war was laid bare before the whole world like the organs of a man probed by a surgeon's scalpel.

While we were fighting fascism we had no difficulty in recognizing it for what it was. We knew then that it meant the degradation of human beings. It meant slavery, oppression. It meant racial and religious intolerance, Jew-baiting, labor-baiting, Red-baiting. It was the doctrine of racial supremacy and national arrogance. It was the idea that one people or one nation had the supreme intelligence to rule the entire world. It was human misery. It was concentration camps. It was torture. It was bestiality.

It was because we understood so well the nature of the enemy and the basis of the issue between us that we fought so well, with such daring and determination. It was because the outcome of the struggle was so vital to humanity that men willingly gave their lives to secure our victory.

It must be remembered that the recognition of the truth about fascism did not come easily or at once. It was brought home to us slowly, painfully, in spite of a lingering unwillingness to face the horror of its actuality. And our delay in isolating the deadly germ was not at all accidental. On the contrary, that delay was deliberately induced as an essential prerequisite to the success of the Fascist plan.

Those who fostered this terror and degradation upon people with normal, decent feelings, people who loved freedom, realized that if its true nature were exposed it would be destroyed at its very inception. The instigators of fascism understood well that if their design were to succeed it had to be concealed in a thick fog of falsehood. An integral part of the Fascist ideology therefore, a part, without which the rest could never come into being, was that the people of the world must be deliberately confused as to its real nature, that it must be shielded by what its chief exponent himself called the big lie.

This lie which set the people of the world groping in the dark, separate and alone, powerless to defend their liberty, their freedom, their very lives, is now as familiar as it is monstrous. It is simply that facts shall not be described for what they are, leaving to the people to pass judgment upon them, but that they shall be labeled as communism; and that all the evils committed by fascism were necessary to ward off the menace of communism. Once this basic notion was accepted, it was easily embellished. The fight for peace was a Communist idea. Therefore it had to be suppressed. The exercise of labor's rights was a Marxist notion. Therefore it had to be eliminated. Insistence upon democracy was a Red slogan. Those who uttered it had to be destroyed. International cooperation was a foundation of Communist theory. Therefore it could not be tolerated.

This lie so embellished was dinned into the ears of the multitude. To accomplish this purpose the most tremendous propaganda barrage in all history was unleashed. Its propagators denied to the people anything else. They so distorted the capacity of the people to understand what was actually happening that the people were intellectually and emotionally disarmed for the defense of their liberty.

And this barrage was not limited to the people of Germany, Italy, and Japan. From those countries falsehood was beamed all over the world. Those who saw personal gain from the advancement of that ideology in our own country and in other democratic nations assisted in this campaign. And for a long time we accepted the lie.

Because we accepted it we were, for the time being, rendered powerless to resist all of the depredations of fascism. We were rendered powerless to protect liberty anywhere in the world. We were rendered almost powerless to save our very existence as a nation. It was only at the last moment that we saw through the big lie, that we saw fascism for what it really was. We saw this in time to save our country from the extinction as a free nation, but too late to save the lives of millions of human beings who perished under the cloak of the falsehood.

This technique is not really so strange to us members of the bar. We have always been aware that one of the cornerstones of justice is a fair trial. Without the assurance of a fair trial, liberty itself cannot survive; and a fair trial involves nothing more nor less than the determination of an issue of fact upon the basis of the fullest opportunity for the presentation and consideration of all positions, all allegations, on each side. Any artificial disability placed upon the power of one side to present its case, any prejudice toward or against either party because of what they said or who they are would destroy the fairness of the trial. It does so because the tribunal is then less likely to render a judgment based on fact and in accordance with truth.

This same principle applies with equal validity beyond the courtroom to the larger tribunal of political life. It was said long ago that in a free and open encounter between truth and falsehood, truth must always be the victor. It is the function of democracy to provide the fundamental guaranty that such an encounter will always be free and open. Only so will men be truly enabled to act in their own interest to protect their liberties and advance their welfare.

The promotion of prejudice, the exclusive propagation of a lie, and the outlawing of truth represent precisely the denial of liberty at its very source.

Certainly it was to be expected that once the war was won we would eliminate the vestiges of that hateful ideology wherever they might remain. The late President Roosevelt and many other world democratic leaders frequently reiterated the determination not only to free the world of the misery and privation which fascism had brought in its train but to see to it that never again could its seed be planted on fertile soil.

A new dawn of freedom was proclaimed as our postwar aim, a new prosperity beyond the wildest dreams of man, an opening of the door to friendship and cooperation among the nations, to trust and confidence among people, to equality among men, so that the condition under which fascism found it possible to flourish could never again recur. Fear and want and oppression and cynicism was the air in which the Fascist germ flourished. So freedom from fear and freedom from want, the freedom of expression and the freedom of faith became our cardinal aims.

Is it not strange then that when we examine the world so shortly after the firing has ceased that all of our organs of expression, our radio, our motion pictures, are filled not with a history of the realization of these aims but, on the contrary, with a macaber return to the very condition which gave rise to the nightmare of the past decade? Again the minds of men are being shut to the impact of truth. Again that right which is fundamental to all other rights—the right to have truth and falsehood meet in free and open encounter, an encounter in which truth must always be the victor—is being denied them. Once more the minds of men are being placed in a shroud designed by the same forces which once before plunged the world into fascism and war. And again the technique and the lie are the same.

We see in our own country a violent attack upon the organization of labor, a plethora of proposals to curb those rights of workingmen to organize, to bargain collectively, and to strike for the betterment of their economic condition. And the basis for this attack is the allegation that labor is communistic and is seeking to dominate the country. Conventional economic struggles, the exercise of recognized rights, are transformed into the bogeyman of the subversion of government itself so that the ranks of labor may be split and the laboring classes alienated.

The need of the people for social-security legislation is converted into a call for socialism. In this way it is hoped again that the battle against the bug-a-boo will paralyze the determination of the people to advance their proper interests. The need for the control of prices and the distribution of commodities to prevent disastrous inflation is perverted into an attack upon the freedom of enterprise and, under these false colors, it is hoped to rally the people to support a descent into an enormous depression. And a program for the regulation of our economy and the insurance of full production and full employment is termed "a call for full-blown communism," and so-called it is hoped that the people's determination to secure freedom from want will be fully blacked out.

On the international scene the pattern is repeated. Once more every conceivable effort is bent to convince us that a dire threat to our Nation and to the peace of the world is being engendered by some "Red imperialism." This, as we have seen, is the very idea from which fascism drew its strength and out of which the anti-Comintern Axis grew. It is the very idea which we at length learned to reject. Surely there is no more truth to it now than when Hitler first uttered it. The Soviet Union which sacrificed 20,000,000 lives yesterday to destroy fascism cannot be equated into fascism itself or present a menace to our security and peace.

Yet this synthetic trinket, made in Germany, is once more being peddled in a monopoly market among the minds of men so that they may be paralyzed to defend the peace against those who have designs for another war.

Yes, it is as though we had all gone mad. The very talk, the very lie which Hitler used to enslave the minds of men so that he might enslave the entire world—the very talk and the very lie which resulted in the catastrophe of the past 6 years is being urged upon us all over again. Is man's ability to reason once more to be so beclouded that liberty will become an easy sacrifice to greed and despotism?

It was with the greatest misgivings that I read a recent speech delivered on June 21 in Chicago by the Attorney General of the United States. Using the forum of another bar association, he expressed the alarming conviction that civil rights in the United States could not be adequately protected. He declared that because of the Slaughter House cases decided after the Civil War, his Department of Justice could not remedy 2,700 instances of the denial of civil rights in the United States recently brought to its attention. He insisted that because of those decisions, and congressional amendments, the Government was powerless to do anything to insure liberty in the overwhelming majority of the cases brought to its attention.

Now the Slaughter House cases represented interpretations of the civil-rights laws passed after the Civil War which sharply restricted the scope of those laws and assisted in denying to the Negro people the fruits of victory in that war. Even if we are to assume that the restrictive interpretation of the Slaughter House cases of 80 years ago is to be accepted today, all that is required is new legislation which will effectively combat the evils against which the original civil-rights laws were aimed. But nowhere did the Attorney General call for more legislation. Nowhere does he suggest that the remedy for at least a part of his inability at present to protect American civil rights is an insistence that Congress pass more effective laws for that purpose.

Recently, while I was engaged in a successful legal proceeding to outlaw the Ku Klux Klan in California, a responsibile newspaper, pooh-poohed the outbreak of fiery crosses in the community, and expressed the preposterous belief that some of them were set by the oppressed minority groups themselves.

Therefore, I was most unhappy to hear the Attorney General of the United States say, "We must be alert as officers of the court to see the difference between sincere and honest protests of groups of our citizens against injustice and the effort of these outside ideologists to stir up trouble according to the old plan of 'divide and rule'." Does that not have a familiar ring? Is that anything but an effort to submerge the protestation against injustice into an inquisition against those who are raising it? Who was it in the past 4 years who sought to "divide and rule?"

He says again, "We know that there is an international conspiracy to divide our people, to discredit our institutions and to bring about disrespect for our Government." What forces seek to do this? Clearly the forces who deny labor its democratic rights, who deny Negroes equality, who insist upon discrimination and segregation. And what has the Attorney General done to check those forces?

Instead, in a speech which was supposed to have been about civil rights, the Attorney General lashed out at trade-unions, labor leaders, Communists, and "revolutionary lawyers." He submitted no proof, no facts to make the attack understandable. And as might be expected, where facts are absent, epithets took their place.

In his address, while he seeks to create doubt in the minds of the people about the motives of labor and freedom of labor unions, the Attorney General said not one word about several of the real threats to our civil liberties, which today concern progressives throughout the country. Not one word in condemnation of those lawless gangsters who attacked an AFL organizer in the South the other day. Not one word in defense of the Negro victims of officialdom in Columbia, Tenn. Not one word to tell us what the Attorney General thinks about the murder of Negro soldiers and veterans protesting against the very discrimination which they fought to extinguish.

Instead, the Attorney General proclaimed a crusade against "Communists." "I say to you that they are driving law enforcement in this country to the end of its patience," he says. What does this presage? Does it mean a new series of Herndon cases, another De Jonge against Oregon, another Whitney against California? Does it mean another return to the raids of another Attorney General?

The Attorney General should be the first in our ranks leading the armies of the bar in the unceasing war against enemies of liberty in and outside government. He should call us to carry on a great offensive—ever to expand the area of civil rights, so that the peoples may have the true freedom, the real liberty to achieve peace and security; so that freedom of speech and press and worship can become the instruments of truth, not the confusion of truth. He should use the power of his office and the prestige of position to lead his comrades in law in relentless battle against those who promote anti-Semitism, prevent labor organization, discriminate against Negroes, intimidate the foreign born and, above all, against those who use the power of monopoly and enormous concentration of wealth to deprive the people of their primary civil rights—the right to strive for a securer economic life, for a freer political life, for a fuller spiritual life.

Finally, the Attorney General in his speech went so far as to attack those lawyers who fight most actively for the liberty of the people, and expressed the conviction "that our bar associations with a strong hand should take those too brilliant brothers of ours to the legal woodshed for a definite and well-deserved admonition."

This is, indeed, a call for legal vigilantism. Who are these men in his own profession thus threatened by their colleague in Washington? These are the lawyers who follow in the footsteps of Thomas Jefferson and Franklin Roosevelt to make the law a living instrument of social progress, not rotten stagnation. These are the men who follow in the footsteps of Clarence Darrow and Oliver W. Holmes, who believed that human rights are more important than property rights in the life of our Nation. These are the men who follow in the footsteps of Brandeis and of Frank P. Walsh, the Guild's founder and first president, who fought on the side of the workers and farmers, the poor and the oppressed peoples in the never-ending battle against greedy monopolies and the power of great wealth. These are the men who follow in the footsteps of Wendell Willkie, who was not afraid to defend a Communist in the fullest exercise of his civil rights as an American citizen.

These are the lawyers who protect the rights of those who oppose the status quo in an effort to eliminate poverty and oppression and discrimination and war, and here I mean not only Communists but Democrats and Republicans as well. People have the basic civil right to protest not only to but against their Government, and to rally their fellow citizens for that purpose. They have the right to exercise these rights, without fear of repression or attack, and without the threat of being called Communist, revolutionist, or other epithets by a Government official. I say that on the other hand it is the affirmative duty of Government to defend them in the exercise of those rights.

And I can say to the 175,000 lawyers of the Nation of this tenth anniversary of our organization that no honest attorney fears the threat of the "woodpile" as long as the Guild exists. The National Lawyers Guild, all its chapters, and everyone of its members hereby serves notice that it will use the last ounce of its resources in defense of any lawyer or any section of the bar so victimized, and will ceaselessly fight against those who seek to turn the legal profession into a degraded tool of Fascist ideology.

Conscientious Objectors in Nutrition Experiments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, during the war some of the most interesting experiments ever held in the field of human nutrition were conducted by the Laboratory of Physiological Hygiene at the University of Minnesota under the direction of Dr. Ancel Keys. The experiments were carried out with volunteers from conscientious objectors in the Civilian Public Service camps.

Under leave to extend my remarks I am including a report by Dr. Keys which is particularly valuable because of the recommendations he makes, based on his long experience and intimate knowledge of these men and their problems, for better handling in the future of these individuals whose consciences will not permit them to engage in war, but who are loyal to our country and desire to render to it and to humanity every contribution they can that does not involve bearing arms and engaging in warfare:

A REPORT ON THE ROLE OF THE CAMP OPERATIONS DIVISION, SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM, IN SCIENTIFIC AND MEDICAL RESEARCH, 1943–46

LABORATORY OF PHYSIOLOGICAL HYGIENE, UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA,
Minneapolis, Minn., June 15, 1946.

CIVILIAN PUBLIC SERVICE PERSONNEL

I. INTRODUCTION

Civilian Public Service (CPS) played an important role in the work of this laboratory from the beginning of 1943 until the end of June 1946. On June 10, 1946, the following letter was received:

"Dr. Chester S. Keefer has received a letter from Lewis F. Kosch, Assistant Director, Camp Operations, Selective Service System, which reads, in part, as follows: 'It is felt that the Camp Operations report will not be complete without a section devoted to the Office of Scientific Research and Development part of our operations from the point of view of the technical and supervisory personnel in charge of the various units. While we have statistical summaries of man-days used and work accomplished, we do not have an evaluation of the program based on the experiences and observations of the people who actually worked with the units. What we would like are frank and candid statements from these men covering defects in organization or administration as well as the value of the work performed.'

"It would be much appreciated by this office if you could supply us with any of the requested information.

"Very truly yours,
"FRANCES R. MONTGOMERY, Administrative Officer, CMR."

The present report is to comply with the foregoing request.

II. HISTORICAL SKETCH

CPS volunteers began service in this laboratory with a unit of eight subjects (guinea pigs) and one technical assistant early in 1943. They were assigned for transfer here to facilitate the operations of a contract with the Office of Scientific Research and Development (Contract No. OEMcmr-27). The unit here expanded with the needs of the program and the initiation of new contracts (Nos. OEMcmr-220 and OEMcmr-413). Besides OSRD sponsorship the several programs were sponsored or endorsed by the Office of the Quartermaster General, United States Army, the Office of the Surgeon General, United States Army, the Matériel Command, United States Army Air Forces, and the Division of Medical Sciences, National Research Council.

The major items of study included:

1. Design and testing of United States Army combat rations (ration K, ration C, and ration B—10 in 1).
2. Study of stability and keeping qualities of food items in military rations.
3. Human requirements for vitamins of the B complex.
4. Human metabolism of thiamine and its relation to physical strains.
5. Excretion of 17-ketosteroids as related to fatigue and physical strains.
6. Adaptation processes in hot climates.
7. Physical and mental responses to hard work for several days without food and the effect of the previous diet on this.
8. Liver function in experimental malaria.
9. Water and food requirements for emergency subsistence in shipwreck and air crashes.
10. Estimation of physical fitness.
11. Bed rest and the physical activity regimen effects on rate of convalescence after injury or disease.
12. Methods for the analytical estimation of the nutritional value of foodstuffs.
13. Effects of prolonged subsistence at a semistarvation level.
14. Rehabilitation after semistarvation and the effects on this of various relief diets.

Results of these studies have been reported to the Office of Scientific Research and Development and the various military and other governmental agencies interested.

III. PERSONNEL, HOUSING, ETC.

A total of 75 CPS men have served in this unit, some as long as three years and the majority for one or more years each. The largest size of the unit at any one time was 65 men; this group was here for 12 months.

The total staff personnel who worked with the men here was 128, with an average staff at any one time of about 30. During these years the principal supervisory staff personnel included besides the laboratory director, Dr. Ancel Keys, the following persons: Drs. Olaf Michelsen, Austin Henschel, Josef Brozek, Henry Longstreet Taylor, Ernst Simonson, and Samuel Wells. Physicians associated with the work or acting as consultants included Drs. Frederick Hoffbauer, Cecil J. Watson, Leo Rigler, C. A. McKinlay, B. C. Schiele, Rodney Kendall, Russell M. Wilder, and J. C. McKinley.

At all times the CPS men were housed directly in this laboratory and received all their meals here as well. A recreational and educational program was operated for a year when the unit was at its maximum size.

Cordial cooperation was provided at all times by the National Service Board for Religious Objectors, and by the service committees of the Brethren, Friends, and Mennonites. These last three agencies, as well as various foundations, industries, and the Unitarian Society, all contributed funds to aid the program, particularly the large project on semistarvation and nutritional rehabilitation.

IV. PUBLICATIONS AND PUBLICITY

Besides the restricted and confidential reports mentioned above, many of the results of this work have been or will be incorporated in scientific and medical publications. More than 40 technical papers have been published so far and this number will be considerably expanded in the next year or two. A large monograph on starvation, to appear in book form, is now in course of preparation.

Considerable publicity has been given to some phases of the work here, notably that on starvation. Besides frequent items in the newspapers, articles in the Reader's Digest, Life, Time, Liberty, and other magazines have discussed and described some of the work. This publicity was not sought and all of it was authorized or ordered by governmental agencies involved. It is considered that all this publicity has been favorable to the unit and to the Selective Service System.

V. CONTRIBUTION OF THE CPS PERSONNEL

The CPS men assigned to this unit have made a very valuable contribution to the Nation and to general scientific knowledge. Many of the requirements of the subject work involved conditions which were disagreeable, tedious, painful, exhausting, and even dangerous. This laboratory made every effort to reduce or ameliorate these features but the actual tasks were still such as would hardly be borne by any other group of men. With rare exceptions the cooperation of the men was exemplary. Not only were disciplinary problems minimal; the men actively devoted much effort of mind and body to aid the program in many ways. There was throughout the highest cooperation between staff and CPS personnel.

Besides subject duties, CPS personnel assisted in the maintenance of the laboratory and their own quarters and in various aspects of the research program. Work in recording, transcribing, and calculating of data and chemical analysis was done by many of the men. Several men assisted on a relatively advanced technical plane in statistics, psychological testing, physical and chemical measurements, and machine shop and apparatus construction work.

It is desired here to make special commendation to these men for their self-sacrifice, devotion to duty, and wholehearted participation in the research program. This work could not have been done without these men.

VI. RECOMMENDATIONS

From the experience of the operations here, and study of similar operations elsewhere, it is concluded that the research and "guinea pig" projects under Civilian Public Service have been highly useful and the contribution to the public good has been of extraordinary value. The proved utility of such projects is so great that definite provisions for similar operations in the future should be made at the earliest moment. In these provisions, however, it is desirable to secure some modifications and clarifications of arrangements. These are indicated below.

The following recommendations are made:

1. In any draft or selective-service law which may be passed, efforts should be made to secure definite provisions for the use of conscientious-objector volunteers in research projects. Failing this, such provisions should be incorporated, in the clearest manner, in the rules and regulations of the Selective Service System or whater counterpart for this System is provided in the new Draft Act.
2. No highly restricted quota for volunteers to be used in such research projects should be set. The number of men should be adjusted to the requirements of the research projects and the number of men willing to volunteer. In the past the quota set for research projects was far lower than would provide for the meritorious projects waiting to use them. This may not be true in the future but in any case the prosecution of really important projects should not be prevented or hindered by an unnecessary and arbitrary limit.
3. A suitable advisory body should be created to pass on the merit of proposed projects and to ensure the responsibility of the institutions and investigators in charge. Prior to the creation of a national science foundation a committee of the National Research Council, including representation from the offices of the Surgeons General, would be appropriate.
4. The rate of pay of volunteers who would serve in such research projects should be definitely fixed. The principle of bargaining and competition on payments between projects, which was definitely operative in 1945-46, should not be allowed to continue. The provisions for pay should properly include allowances for dependency.
5. The responsibility of the Government for (minimal) subsistence and maintenance of all men in civilian public service, including those in research projects, should be recognized. To ignore this basic necessity means that these men are, in effect, forced to depend on private charity if they are not to starve. The delegation of this responsibility to a church or other group is not merely shirking the most elementary decency but also means an unwarrantable delegation of authority. Violators (i. e., economic noncooperators) of the Draft Act are imprisoned and their maintenance assumed by the Federal Government. It would seem outrageous that the support of those who would cooperate in all but purely military demands should be turned over to private agencies.
6. Transportation costs of volunteers who are assigned to research projects have been handled unsatisfactorily. The distinction which has been made between research projects and other projects such as forest-fire work, State hospitals, and so on, is indefensible. If the principle is admitted that accepted research projects are for the public goods, then these projects should not be penalized in contrast to other projects which are certainly not of superior utility.
7. Definite provisions should be made regarding work clothes. All sorts of expedients have been resorted to because Selective Service apparently simply did not consider this necessity. Obviously the man must be clothed. How and with what and at whose cost must be decided. It would be easily possible to cover these questions without resorting to a regulation for distinctive uniforms.
8. Proper insurance provisions should be provided and these should be specific. The blanket general statements contained in Selective Service regulations at present are far too vague for practical legal application.
9. Provision should be made for the issuance of a detailed and accurate prospectus in recruiting volunteers for each authorized project. The prospectus should indicate rate of pay, provisions for maintenance and housing, duties and responsibilities, purpose and general value of the project, possible dangers and health hazards, and term of service.

Removal of Displaced Jews to Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, a new attempt is being initiated today in London to reach an agreement between the British and American Governments to find ways and means of moving 100,000 displaced Jews from Europe to Palestine.

It is imperative that a plan be worked out promptly to implement the unanimous decision of the Anglo-American committee that 100,000 persons be admitted to the Jewish homeland.

The speech of Foreign Minister Bevin at Bournemouth was insulting and uncalled for. The actions of the British Government in Palestine during recent weeks are shocking and reprehensible. Repressive measures will not halt the legitimate aspirations of the Jewish patriots. I call upon the British to immediately cease their Gestapo-like tactics. They are alienating many of their American friends by their present policy.

The American Government has promised to assist in all possible ways to get into the cherished homeland 100,000 of the pitifully small number of Jews left in Europe as a result of Hitler's purges. I trust that our Government will bring all possible pressure to bear on the British so that this dream may become a reality. And at the same time we must protest British brutality and let the people of England know we have no sympathy with the present policies of the Colonial Office.

What the New York Times Says About Hotel Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS A. JENKINS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am asking to have printed in the RECORD the following article from the New York Times of July 13, 1946:

MEAT FOR SUNDAY DINNERS ASSURED AS SUPPLY CLIMBS—RETAILERS' REFUSAL TO PAY HIGH PRICES SEEN AS HAPPY AUGURY—RESTAURANTS, HOTELS DENY RISES ARE CONTEMPLATED

With the heaviest meat supplies in months pouring into the city's wholesale markets, housewives were assured yesterday of a break in their previous ersatz Sunday dinners. New York hotels also denied reports that any immediate increase in the price of meals was contemplated, their watchword, according to James A. McCarthy, executive secretary of the Hotel Association of New York, being "hold the line."

"There has been no definite action taken by the hotels on increasing prices," Mr. McCarthy said. "There may be some hotels that initiated increases under the last OPA order but our policy is still 'hold the line.'"

Restaurants are following a similar line, explaining that they are now able to buy cheaper in the legitimate open market than they were in the black market that existed during the days of Office of Price Administration ceilings.

Paul Henkel, president of the Society of Restaurateurs, said there was no necessity for increasing menu prices. He declared that OPA ceilings were purely fictional prices and that while they looked good on paper they meant nothing, as meat and other foodstuffs could not be purchased at listed prices.

"Speaking for the 250 members of our association," Mr. Henkel said, "I feel sure that in a short while the meat situation will right itself, and prices paid in the legitimate market will be much less than those heretofore paid in the black market.

"If meat prices should get out of control, our members simply will not handle the better grades until they revert to normal. Housewives will also profit under the present set-up. Up until now they have been buying without asking the weight of the purchase if they expected to be served again. Now they will be able to see their meat purchases weighed as was customary before the shortage."

He said that bacon, which had become more or less extinct on menus, was reappearing and that shell-loin, listed under OPA ceilings at 72 cents a pound, had jumped only to 75 cents. This and other increases, he said, can be traced to the elimination of Government subsidies.

With the influx of beef in the local market trading dropped off sharply yesterday, with retailers shopping around and refusing to pay high prices until they dispose of their accumulated stocks. This was the wholesale market picture drawn by C. F. House, market news analysist of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. House said that the meat supply was better than it had been for a long time and the outlook for plenty of meat next week was good. He indicated that refusal of retailers to pay top prices augured well for sharp reductions in consumer prices.

BUTTER AT 79 CENTS

In many midtown stores butter was down to 79 cents a pound, compared to black-market quotations of $1 or more. The Farm Crest Food Store, 748 Third Avenue, had 500 pounds of newly received beef and 100 pounds of pork yesterday, which was described as a 60 percent better delivery than on recent days. Pork chops were 59 cents a pound and chopped beef 55 cents, prices described as 4 or 5 cents over OPA ceilings.

The Department of Agriculture in charting shifting prices showed that sirloin steak tabbed at 40 to 45 cents a pound under OPA and 75 to $1.25 in the black market has dropped to legitimate prices ranging from 53 to 75 cents a pound. The same check showed that loin pork listed under the OPA at 33 to 36 cents a pound is now selling at 45 to 54 cents a pound, compared to black-market quotations of 90 cents to $1.10.

The Shades of Washington, Lincoln, and Jackson Gather at the Hermitage Near Nashville, Tenn.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I am inserting an editorial entitled "Past and Present", written by Mr. Carlos W. Huntington, which appeared in the Portland Homebildor, published in Portland, Oreg., on July 13, 1946:

PAST AND PRESENT

Jackson: "Welcome, gentlemen, to my old home; now maintained by the State of Tennessee as a symbol of the hospitality and kindliness of the South."

Washington: "Thank you, Andy, it is indeed refreshing to rest here where life was so joyous and abundant B. B. (before bureaucrats). In our day the truth prevailed in Government circles as well as in private life but now I see an ominous trend in the opposite direction."

Lincoln: "I know just what you are going to say, George, and it bothers me a lot. We have just witnessed the battle in regard to OPA. (What would the bureaucrats do without the alphabet? If they keep on multiplying, they will have to borrow additional characters from the Chinese, who have thousands of characters as compared to our 26 letters.) The news that was given to the public, in print and over the radio, in relation to that agency, seemed to have a biased slant all in favor of the OPA. The Government officials who were attempting, with the use of Government money, to continue their jobs, their control, and their regimentation, set up a tremendous propaganda machine which invaded the press columns and the air lanes in a manner never before witnessed in our history and they are continuing so to do even after their agency has ceased to exist. Remember, Hitler used the same tactics."

Jackson: "I have been painfully aware of the insidious and cunning methods used to channel the thinking of our people. The deluge of fear and alarm propaganda that was fed to our citizens was based on untruths and was false in conception and presentation. They even induced school children to sign cards, addressed to the Congress, asking that their unholy agency be permitted to dominate American life and business unhampered and unrestricted. It was the most brazen, immoral and wicked use of public funds and position that this Nation has ever experienced. The system of misrepresentation still prevails."

Washington: "I have noted that isolated cases of price raises are magnified by the bureaucrats and given top billing, while the earnest endeavor of private industry to make the tried and proven law of supply and demand work is relegated to inconspicuous places in the news. The country should have truth and honesty, not falsification and subterfuge."

Lincoln: "I don't blame the newspapers and the radio companies—they print and broadcast the news as it is given them; what I am alarmed about is the control and "slanting" of the news at its source. We want freedom of the press and the air lanes but we want the news they receive to be honest news not twisted, distorted, and emphasized to serve the power-mad groups, who are striving to make this great free Nation a fear-ridden, subservient, dependent-upon-Government mass of cringing, spineless individuals."

Jackson: "Gentlemen, the hour grows late but before we leave, I must remind you that this is our last meeting for a while. Congress will shortly adjourn and after they return we will again gather and make known our thoughts to our Senators and Representatives. In them is our hope for the freedom of America."

CARLOS W. HUNTINGTON.

Foreign Service Board

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of July 15, 1946:

FOREIGN SERVICE BOARD

In reporting out H. R. 6967, to be known as the Foreign Service Act of 1946, the House Foreign Affairs Committee wisely broadened the basis of representation on the new Board of the Foreign Service. The board is charged with making recommendations to the Secretary of State concerning the policies and procedures to govern the administration and personnel management of the Foreign Service. In addition to including three Assistant Secretaries of State and one representative each of the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture—who made up the old Board of Foreign Service Personnel—the new bill wisely provides that the President may give representation on the board to any other Government agency. Members from outside the State Department, however, would sit only when matters of interest to their respective agencies are under consideration.

The provision to include members from other Government departments recognizes the new status occupied by the Foreign Service in its duty to the many interrelated branches of Government. This is important if the Foreign Service is to be the agent of the Government as a whole rather than merely the State Department. Several departments and executive agencies other than State, Agriculture and Commerce depend on our representatives abroad to gather data on foreign conditions. Indeed, our close relations with instrumentalities of the United Nations in such matters as education, health and monetary policy will greatly expand the demands on the Foreign Service for work of a departmentalized nature.

This being the case, we believe that the limitation on attendance of members of the Board of the Foreign Service from outside the State Department is unrealistic. The plain truth is that, in the complexity of modern government, operations of the Foreign Service are of continual interest to many departments. H. R. 6967 in effect accepts this fact by creating a broad Advisory Interdepartmental Committee of the Foreign Service. A simpler and more satisfactory plan, we believe, would be to do away with this added and unnecessary body and to make membership on the Board of the Foreign Service a permanent affair, at the same time giving the Board the duty of making recommendations on all matters affecting the Foreign Service, except the purely political concerns of the State Department. Thus, while primary responsibility for central administration would be retained in the State Department, the service rendered would be improved by giving other agencies which depend on the foreign arm the continuing voice they logically should have in its affairs. This is a desirable adjunct to the improved pay rates and no other laudable features of H. R. 6967, which we have already commended, in attaining the strong, high-caliber Foreign Service we need.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. GLENN BEALL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. BEALL. Mr. Speaker, in considering the proposed loan of $3,750,000,000 to Great Britain I want to remember that I am representing the people of my district and all of the United States. I must do as I would if I were a bank official and the custodian of a trust fund. The money we are asked to lend is not mine. It is the money to be taken from the American taxpayers.

In order to make a loan to Britain we must collect taxes from all people subject to taxation. Our Government will then take the taxpayers' money and make an extension of credit or a gift to Britain. What power or authority does Congress have to tax the people and raise money for the purpose of extending credit, giving or loaning money to a foreign country? Such power is not vested in Congress under the Constitution or by any law.

In the first place, the United States Government does not have $3,750,000,000. We can get it only by creating fiat money or by selling our bonds to our own people, and if we do we must pay interest on those bonds. Great Britain pays us no interest for 5 years under the terms of this agreement and after 5 years she does not pay interest unless she feels like she is able to pay it. It is all optional with her. For the first time in the history of the world, the debtor is to sit in the driver's seat and hold the whip hand. Up until now I have always heard that "beggars should not be choosers."

England is putting up no security—not even turning over any island defense bases. England can post collateral and the loan should be made on a business basis. With between three and four billion dollars in gilt edge securities she holds in this country, her railroad and other holdings in South America, her gold and diamond mines in South Africa and other investments all over the world, there is no reason why collateral cannot be posted.

In making the gift to England, we will be obligated to open our American markets to low-wage foreign products in competition with our own laborers—agriculture and industry.

I do not see how the proposed loan would help stop England's socialistic trend. The chairman of the British Labor Party, now in power, the Honorable Harold Laski, was recently quoted in the New York Times:

> To those who say we have to choose, as I do not believe we have to choose, between the Soviet Union and the United States, with its passion for free enterprise which is not free and is not enterprise, we, the Labor Party, stand foursquare behind the Soviet Union.

This same Laski talks about what he calls our "rotten, decadent, capitalistic system," even though it has twice saved the British Empire.

Unemployment is not severe in England—at the present time being down to less than 400,000 men and women, whereas her prewar average unemployment ran close to 2,000,000. As late as April 4, 1946, the London Times reported that the increase in unemployment which occurred last fall was beginning to slacken. England would use the loan to extend social benefits and security to her own people with our money when we have not done a good job for our own veterans and old-age pensioners.

It has been claimed that the loan was necessary to reestablish England's export business. Statistics will show that during the first 3 months of 1946 exports exceeded the same period in 1938. The month of May 1946 exceeded the same month in 1938 which was her biggest year in exports.

England is applying to us for a loan at the same time she is negotiating loans to other countries. Greece is getting $40,000,000 and Great Britain in return is receiving valuable commercial and political advantages. France recently borrowed $440,000,000 from Britain. If England herself is lending money, why must she borrow from us?

It does not seem plausible that Great Britain would have to borrow $3,750,000,000 in addition to help given her in a loan from Canada of $1,125,000,000 and the $450,000,000 she has borrowed from the RFC—an American concern financed by American taxpayers.

England defaulted on previous loans from us in the amount of more than $6,500,000,000. She has defaulted in lend-lease repayments of some $25,000,000,000. There is no reason to believe that the proposed loan will be repaid.

Such a gift to England would be the opening wedge into our pocketbooks for all nations wanting to ask for a gift from the United States. England will neither pay the principal nor the interest and refusal to lend other countries would incur ill will.

How could I vote for a loan of $3,750,000,000 to Britain and face the citizens of this country, the farmer, the home owner, the veterans who, when they borrow money from the Government or with Government aid must give a mortgage on their farms or homes in order to secure the payment of the loan and interest? We do not have the money to lend. We must borrow the money from our own people. Our national debt is now approximately $275,000,000,000.

I feel that any money we have to give away should go to our own people—our veterans and the aged. In doing that our money and goods would stay in the United States.

I am proud of the fact that I am of Scotch-English ancestry. I admire British people and statesmen and their loyalty to their own country. They place the welfare of Britain and her people ahead of any nation and any people, and that is exactly what I am doing for our country in opposing this agreement.

The United States Foreign Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the July issue of Fortune:

THE UNITED STATES FOREIGN SERVICE

American diplomats, with an air of virtue like that of military men perfecting their plans for a previous war, are going before Congress this summer to ask for the kind of Foreign Service the United States needed in 1939, if not before. Congress took its last close look at the Foreign Service—its recruitment, organization, and performance—in the age of Coolidge. Out of that scrutiny emerged the Rogers Act of 1924, still the basic charter of United States diplomacy. The Service is ripe for another inspection.

It consisted (on May 1) of 55 ambassadors and ministers; 818 Foreign Service officers; 640 wartime auxiliary officers; 240 vice consuls (not of career); some 3,600 American couriers, code clerks, administrative, fiscal, and clerical employees; and about 3,000 alien clerks, typists, telephone and radio operators, janitors, guards, dragomans, porters, interpreters, prison keepers, translators, archive collators, Chinese writers, messengers, couriers. The Foreign Service inherited nearly 2,500 employees from the old Office of War Information (whose numbers are being rapidly reduced) and a few survivors of the Foreign Economic Administration. In all, there were nearly 11,000 people on its pay roll. It was running 303 embassies, legations, and consulates in 68 countries. It operated on a budget of $36,000,000 in the 12 months ending June 30, and asked Congress for $53,000,000 for fiscal 1947.

The Foreign Service is an independent arm of the Government. Its internal administration is supervised by an Assistant Secretary of State, and most of its work passes through the Department. But the Service, under law, is the Foreign Service of the United States, not merely a field division of State. In theory, its mission is to report the world to the United States Government and represent the United States Government throughout the world.

As a reporter, the Service is expected to keep Washington posted on the strength of Franco's domestic opposition, the temper of the Swedish press, the influence of the Arab League, the health of Joseph Stalin, the Peruvian reaction to Peron's victory in Argentina, the market for United States refrigerators in India. As spokesman for the United States, the Service is supposed to announce and interpret to foreign governments the policies laid down in Washington; to bluster, wheedle, or stall, as the occasion may demand; to negotiate treaties or spring an American seaman from the Antwerp jail; to protect United States property abroad; to handle applications for American visas; to give foreign peoples a favorable picture of American life and institutions; to entertain visiting Congressmen and throw good parties on the Fourth of July.

The Service is at once more important and less important than a textbook definition of its functions would suggest. As the announcer and interpreter of United States policy to the chancelleries of the world, it is frequently scooped by the press and radio. In its role as negotiator, it can be bypassed by the President and Secretary of State dealing directly with their opposite numbers abroad; by other officers of the State Department (as in the case of the British loan, negotiated by Will Clayton's economists and lawyers); by other Government departments (Treasury, War); or by the United States delegetes to international bodies (United Nations, UNRRA, World Bank, and so on). This is not to say that the Service has been shouldered out of United States diplomacy, but it has a number of competitors.

Although it has been forced to share the role of executor, the Foreign Service plays a much greater part in shaping United States policy than is generally known. Its reports from the field inevitably color the decisions taken in Washington. When the reporting is sloppy, or slanted, the chances are that the United States Government will soon make a fool of itself.

The dispatches sent home by the Foreign Service are digested in the political offices of the State Department, where the Foreign Service keeps a tight grip on the key jobs. Foreign Service officers head the four political offices in the Department—for the Far East, Near East and Africa, Europe, and Latin America. Below them most of the regional divisions and about half of the subdivisions, or "desks," are run by Foreign Service officers. The job of these officers is to evaluate information from the field and recommend appropriate action to the Secretary of State. Their recommendations can be overruled by the Secretary, the President, or Congress, but day in and day out, especially in the multitude of small decisions that can eventually lead to major stands on major issues, these 58 Foreign Service officers are manufacturing United States foreign policy.

How well the Foreign Service measures up to its high responsibilities is a question that disturbs the Service itself. Its own answer is a 53-page document laying down detailed plans for bringing in better men, making better use of its good men, and getting rid of the deadwood. These plans have been drafted in the form of legislation and may have been introduced in Congress by the time this article appears.

PEOPLE AND PLUMBING

The shortcomings of the Service can be laid at many doors. The weird performances of some of America's Ambassadors and Ministers must be charged up against the President who appointed them. Congress and the public, indifferent to their own Foreign Service and vaguely suspicious of diplomacy in general, must take much of the blame for the pitifully small appropriations with which the United States attempts to defend its interests abroad. (The salaries of Ambassadors and Ministers, for example, have not been raised in 90 years.) Finally, the State Department itself has much to answer for. Its Secretaries, Under Secretaries, and Assistant Secretaries have had little time, and in most cases little talent, for administration. Despite the Foreign Service's semiautonomous status, it cannot rise much above the general level of efficiency in the Department.

It is temptingly convenient to blame everybody but the Foreign Service for the defects in United States representation abroad. But the issue is not that simple. The Service has not made the most effective use of the money and manpower at its disposal. Until work began on the new bill it had done little to sell the Department, Congress, and the country on its real requirements.

The Foreign Service made virtually no preparation for the problems that World War II thrust upon it, although the brewing of the war had been well reported in its own dispatches from the field. To be sure one may doubt that it would have gotten anywhere with the prewar Congress even if it had asked for enough money to build the organization it needed. But the Service was too complacent to put the question to the test.

Against this background of tangled responsibilities—shared by the Service, the State Department, the President, Congress, and the voters—the foreign representation of the United States must be judged. In the paragraphs that follow, the weakness of this representation is deliberately stressed. There are, to be sure, many items to be entered on the other side of the ledger, but here are some shocking things that can and do happen in the Foreign Service of the United States:

In Poland last winter a United States correspondent was told by our Ambassador, Arthur Bliss Lane, and his counselor of embassy that it was impossible to maintain business or social relations of any kind with the Soviet diplomats in Warsaw, so we just ignore them. Two days later the correspondent was invited to lunch by the first secretary of the British Embassy and found that his fellow guests were two secretaries of the Soviet Embassy.

At the request of a local firm the consulate in Kingston, Jamaica, sent a dispatch to the State Department inquiring about the tariff schedules on a certain commodity. The reply was received 95 days later. In Johannesburg, during an acute shortage of clerical help, the consul general cabled the department to report the resignation of a clerk and ask permission to hire a replacement at $1,440. Seventeen days later he jogged the Department with another message. Forty-four days after the original cable the Department answered.

In Dakar last year the economic analyst of the United States consulate general, who was handling our procurement program in French West Africa and dealing with high officials and business leaders, was living in a single rented room in the medina, the native quarter.

In many of the big American missions there is an unhappy junior officer known to his colleagues as the "stableboy." In the Paris Embassy last fall a Congressman and half a dozen other visitors, including several Army officers, were waiting to see a third secretary about air-travel priorities. The secretary was tied up for 30 minutes in telephone negotiations over the repair of a fender on Ambassador Jefferson Caffery's car.

In the United States consulate at Aden, Arabia, a third-floor walk-up that also serves as the consul's home, the toilet consists of an enameled pot standing in a wooden box. It is emptied by a native woman summoned up from the street.

At a Latin-American post not long ago, the United States was represented by a chief of mission (a political appointee) who walked about his house naked, followed by a native girl carrying a trayful of Scotch and soda.

At one time during the war the two Foreign Service officers assigned to duty in the Belgian Congo were forced to spend more than two-thirds of their time coding, decoding, filing, and typing. Because of the shortage of clerical help throughout the service, it is not uncommon to find a consul general typing out his own mail on Saturdays and Sundays.

Last February General Franco hoped to entertain the American cardinals on their way home from the consistory in Rome. The invitation was eventually declined and arrangements were made for the cardinals' plane to stop in Madrid only long enough to let off two Spanish prelates. When the plane landed, however, it was found that the United States Embassy in Madrid had arranged a reception and dinner for the American cardinals and was insistent that they remain for the afternoon and evening. Had the cardinals done so, they again would have been put in the position of accepting or declining courtesies from the Spanish Government. The Embassy apparently failed to see any embarrassment in this position, even though it knew the State Department was about to issue a blast against Franco.

In a tropical post of high importance to the United States during the war, a new consul general told his staff as soon as he arrived that his one ambition was to get out of the place as fast as possible. Although the post was seriously understaffed, he would not report the fact to the department for fear it would jeopardize his chances of a transfer.

The Foreign Service Journal reports the comings and goings of Ambassadors in the hushed tones of a court circular. At the same time it permits itself a good many sedate cracks of the frailties of the Service and the State Department. From the issue of March 1946:

A Foreign Service officer, summoned to Washington for consultation, met a friend in the department corridors and was asked, "What brings you here?"

"I came back to draft replies to the telegrams I've been sending in for the last three months."

FRANKLIN TO ROGERS

The United States Foreign Service, it becomes abundantly clear, is not nearly good enough to defend United States interests in the world of 1946. The tragedy of the Service is that it is usually prepared to do a workmanlike job in the world as it was a generation before. Ironically enough, it was in the infancy of the Republic that American diplomacy was most nearly adjusted to the contemporary facts of international life. From the beginning of the Revolution through the War of 1812, the American cause was brilliantly served by the foreign negotiations of men like Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, James Monroe, and John Quincy Adams. The first forty years of American independence, were in fact, the golden age of United States diplomacy.

The next hundred years makes less inspiring reading. Spoilsmen moved in on the consular service. The prestige of the best diplomatic posts attracted a drab succession of politicians, merchants, bankers, and industrialists who belonged to the right party and could afford to represent the United States at foreign courts. Their missions were staffed, for the most part, by well-connected young men whose fathers were willing to foot the bill for a few years' exposure to European society. More or less accidentally, good men turned up from time to time, like Charles Francis Adams, our Minister to London during the Civil War, and Townsend Harris, the first American diplomat accredited to Japan.

It was not until after the Spanish-American War, when the United States was becoming a world power, that thoughtful citizens took alarm at the quality of their diplomatic and consular services. Under Theodore Roosevelt and Taft, modest reforms were initiated; yet the diplomatic service remained a club for rich men's sons. World War I (which took the State Department by surprise) brought an abrupt broadening of United States interests and responsibilities beyond the seas, a merging of political and economic issues, and a transformation in the techniques of diplomacy.

The Rogers Act of 1924 combined the diplomatic and consular services into the Foreign Service of the United States. The backbone of the new agency was the corps of "Foreign Service officers," available for assignment to diplomatic or consular duties anywhere in the world. The law raised officers' salaries (up to $9,000 for Class I) and provided for open, competitive entrance examinations (Ambassadors and Ministers excepted, of course). It gave the United States a foreign service as nearly immune to political influence as statute could make it, and reduced, but did not eliminate, the advantage of private means in pursuit of a diplomatic career.

The Rogers Act recognized the fact that for some time the United States had been a world power and needed a professional foreign service. It did not create such a service at one stroke. It relied mainly on the working of time—the death and retirement of incompetents, and strict control over the admission of new officers. Time has worked slowly. In 1946, when Foreign Service officers are confronted with criticism of a colleague 50 or older, they often pass it off in these words: "He's pre-Rogers."

EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY

Congressman ROGERS did not try to tamper with the President's ancient privilege of appointing anyone he pleases as ambassador or minister. But the Rogers Act, by increasing the prestige and efficiency of the career Foreign Service, put its members in line for a bigger share of these appointments. Presidents Cleveland, Theodore Roosevelt, and Wilson had occasionally chosen men from the career—or what passed for the career in those days—to serve as chiefs of mission. After 1924 the practice became much more common.

Of our 55 chiefs of mission today 35 are career officers. Technically they lose their status as Foreign Service officers when they accept the President's appointment to serve as ambassadors or ministers at his pleasure. But in fact they are still regarded as career men; they may be shifted to another embassy or legation (in accordance with their qualifications or the domestic political necessities of the President), given a job in the State Department, or assigned to some international commission. Unless they are close to retirement age, they are not likely to be let out on the street after one tour of duty as chief of mission. After service as a chief of mission, a career man may even revert to the status of Foreign Service officer, class 1. This happened a few months ago to Monnett B. Davis, who was Minister to Denmark. To make room for a deserving Democrat from Delaware, Josiah W. Marvel, Davis was sent to serve as consul general in Shanghai "with the personal rank of minister."

Career men hold about two-thirds of the most important posts. (Career: Berlin—political adviser to the military command—Buenos Aires, Mexico City, Ottawa, Paris, Rome. Political: London, Moscow, Rio de Janeiro.) It is no longer possible, of course, to distinguish the big diplomatic jobs from the lesser ones by checking to see whether the United States mission is an embassy or legation. In a splurge of good neighborliness, President Roosevelt raised all our Latin-American legations to the rank of embassies. European countries that excited American admiration during the war—the Netherlands, Norway, Greece, and Yugoslavia—were likewise honored. Today there are only 16 American ministers left. Some of the legations, like those in Australia and Egypt, are unquestionably more significant than our embassy in Honduras.

Of the career men who are now ambassadors or ministers, all but one entered the service before the Rogers Act reforms. They are presumably the best of the men who went into the diplomatic service during the last 10 or 15 years of the period when a comfortable legacy or a rich wife were indispensable. As a whole the group is marked by an amiable sort of mediocrity. There are some brilliant exceptions and some that fall just short of scandal.

The 20 political appointees are not easily typed. Several have no partisan connections and are political figures only in the sense that they were chosen from outside the career. One of these is Stanley Hornbeck, Ambassador to the Netherlands after 25 years' work in the State Department; he was Secretary Hull's chief adviser on the Far East in the pre-Pearl Harbor period. Another is Lt. Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, former chief of staff to Eisenhower, now Ambassador to Russia. Retired officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps represent the United States in Panama, Belgium, and the Union of South Africa. Another species of diplomat is known in the service as the Roosevelt career man; he may have been appointed originally for political reasons but has now been abroad long enough to be treated as a semipro (Bowers in Chile, Harriman in Britain, Steinhardt in Czechoslovakia, MacVeagh in Greece). Then there are "political" appointments, like that of Bernie Baruch's gay brother Herman, Ambassador to Portugal, and Prentice Cooper, former Governor of Tennessee, friend of Boss Crump, of Memphis, and now Ambassador to Peru. The most flagrantly political appointment of recent years did not get through the Senate—President Roosevelt's nomination of Ed Flynn, of the Bronx, to serve as Minister to Australia.

Foreign Service officers do not argue that all chiefs of mission should be career men. By diplomatic tradition, still honored in protocol, the ambassador is the personal emissary from the head of one state to the head of another. In a ceremonial sense, the chief of a United States mission abroad is an extension of the person to the President. Mr. Roosevelt, to the annoyance of Judge Hull, took this concept quite literally in some instances and dealt directly with ambassadors, notably Bullitt in Paris and Kennedy in London. Not only political appointees but career ambassadors as well have felt free to take their problems directly to the President. George Messersmith, now Ambassador to Argentina, used to fly up from Havana or Mexico City to see Mr. Roosevelt when he felt he was not getting anywhere through regular channels, i. e., the political offices of the Department and the Secretary of State. The Service accepts such short circuiting philosophically.

The Service is not reconciled, however, to the fact that independent wealth is still a prerequisite for the chief of mission in London, Paris, Rome, Havana, Rio, Buenos Aires, and other choice capitals. These posts go to the more affluent of the pre-Rogers diplomats, not necessarily the more able, or to political appointees with private means. The inequities of this system are only now about to to felt to the full, because the post-Rogers Foreign Service officers, many of them without a penny outside their salaries, are just approaching the age at which they might be in line for legations or embassies.

An American ambassador's pay is $17,500, and a minister gets $10,000; these salaries were fixed by law in 1856. Various allowances have since been added, but they are not nearly big enough to balance the budget of an envoy who tries to live in reasonable dignity in an expensive capital and entertain on the same scale as his opposite numbers. A United States ambassador's pay and allowances, after taxes, work out at about $18,000. The British Ambassador to Washington gets $70,000, tax free. Several of the Latin-American ambassadors to the United States get about $40,000. Soviet ambassadors seem to have unlimited funds for entertaining, when they feel like entertaining.

The new legislation drawn up by the Foreign Service sets a salary scale of $15,000 to $25,000 for ambassadors and ministers, depending on the importance of the post, plus "representation" allowances of $5,000 to $25,000 and miscellaneous allowances already provided by law. Under these schedules the United States Ambassador to London would get about $60,000, more than half of it tax-free. Meanwhile fortunes made in the Union Pacific (Harriman), Fairy Soap (Alexander Kirk), and the Cleveland Plain Dealer (Norweb, by marriage) help finance the representation of the United States in London, Rome, and Habana.

THE MESSERSMITH FACTORY

The professional body that trains the Messersmith and Cafferys—and hopes for the best with the Baruchs and the Coopers—is one of the smallest of America's licensed trades. The average size of the corps, during the war and since, has hovered around 800 men.

Recruiting of career officers was stopped after Pearl Harbor. The President did not want the State Department put in the position of competing with the Army and Navy for manpower. This short-sighted view of the importance of the Foreign Service found its most absurd expression in 1944 when, after some newspaper smears of "draft dodging diplomats," the Service was forced to turn over about 25 of its younger men to the induction boards. Since VJ-day, overseas and in the United States, the Service has been giving special examination to veterans of the armed forces and men about to be discharged. About 75 men have passed these exams, but only a few have yet received assignments in the field.

A freshly commissioned Foreign Service officer starts as a vice consul or third secretary. For 2 years he is on probation. Ahead are the ranks of consul and consul general and, in the diplomatic line, second secretary, first secretary, and counselor of embassy. It is not necessary to touch all bases, but most officers get both consular and diplomatic duties during their first 10 years in the service. The titles that control salary and seniority are less impressive. The beginning officer is designated unclassified (C), works through B and A, and then starts up the ladder of classes VIII through I. The salaries (slightly improved since the passage of the Rogers Act) range from $2,870 to $10,000. Allowances, varying with the size of an officer's family and the cost of living at his post, usually amount to 25 to 35 percent of his salary. Allowing for occasional "freezes" on promotion and for some double jumps during the war, the most highly regarded officers have been stepping up one class about every alternate year. Thus the first of the post-Rogers officers are just reaching the top.

The officer corps can be broken down into half a dozen distinct groups, according to the date and circumstances of admission to the career:

1. Officers of the pre-Rogers diplomatic service. There are 30 of these, contemporaries of the career men who are now ambassadors and ministers. Ninety-nine percent of these officers, according to Selden Chapin, Director of the Office of Foreign Service, have some private income.

2. Officers of the pre-Rogers consular service, of whom 175 are still in the Foreign Service, Chapin thinks not more than 25 percent of these have private income.

3. There are 123 officers up from the ranks. These originally entered the service as clerks or vice consuls not of career (a special status similar to that of warrant officers in the Army and Navy), and later became career officers. Notable alumni of this group are Robert Murphy, of the North African deal, now head of our diplomatic mission in Germany with the personal rank of Ambassador, and Walter Thurston, the new Ambassador to Mexico.

4. Post-Rogers officers who entered the career, without previous foreign service, between 1924 and 1929. This group of 106 men was recruited in competition with the salaries paid by private industry during the great boom, and did not fully meet the expectations aroused by the Rogers Act.

5. Officers who entered the career, without previous foreign service, between 1930 and 1941. As a group these 289 officers are the ablest yet attracted to the service. The entrance examinations were tightened up in 1931. Moreover, competition was particularly keen during those depression years when the pay and allowances of a third secretary were much higher than the going rates for young college graduates in private industry, and the prestige of Government service and the general interest in foreign affairs were mounting.

6. Under the Reorganization Act of 1939 the Foreign Service took over the independent reporting services that had been operated abroad by the Commerce and Agriculture Departments. Of the present foreign service officers, 95 are legacies of this merger.

E PLURIBUS UNUM

The most striking talent of the Foreign Service, and in some respects the most dangerous, is its proven ability to take men from so widely disparate sources and fit them into a fairly sharp pattern of thought and conduct. The pattern cannot be traced back to any uniformity in the home or college backgrounds of the officers. Although the Service includes 176 alumni of Harvard, Yale, and Princeton, as well as a Cambridge graduate named Outerbridge Horsey, it has drawn on 144 other colleges and universities, including such unlikely places as the Southwest Missouri State Teachers College and the Case School of Applied Science. Eight Foreign Service officers are women. A break-down of the corps by home States shows that the eastern seaboard, from Massachusetts to Virginia, and the west coast have turned out more officers per capita than the rest of the country, though all regions of the United States are represented in reasonably close ratio to population. The Negro population is represented by three officers, now stationed in Liberia and the Azores.

It is after an officer has spent 10 to 15 years in the Service that he is likely to have been squeezed into a certain mold. At the very point in his career when he should be ready for assignments of great responsibility, he has usually lost any dynamic qualities he may have had when he entered the Service. Thus the United States often sends a bureaucrat to do a diplomat's job.

The most potent of the pressures applied to the new officers is built up by the promotion system. A young third secretary soon learns, as Under Secretary of State Dean Acheson recently put it, that the way to get promoted is to live long enough and stay out of trouble. In the field the senior officers signing the annual efficiency ratings that largely determine the younger men's chances of advancement are, in most cases, living proofs of the success of this formula. They are likely to be pre-Rogers officers with a limited appreciation of the changes that have taken place in the world and of the requirements of a modern foreign service. The post-Rogers officer gets the impression that he must conform to this pattern or get out of the Service (as some of the best of them have done).

At the same time this idea is sinking in, the young officer is subjected to an appalling load of routine and humdrum duties, of which the greater part could be handled by a competent clerk. Curiosity, imagination, and initiative are deadened. The paper work keeps the officer so busy that he sees only a narrow segment of the life in the country where he is working. He moves in an inbred society and he loses touch with his own country. Unless he is called to Washington for duty or consultation, the Service can pay his fare back to the United States only once every 3 years; it often lacks the funds to bring him back for 5 years or more. If, like 90 percent of the corps, he was unmarried when he entered the Service, he will remain a bachelor unless he finds a wife on one of his brief trips home, or marries a foreigner (in which case he must submit his resignation and wait for the department, if it approves the girl, to decline the resignation). Married, he finds that his wife's talents as a hostess and her rating with the Ambassador's wife have a good deal to do with his own chances of promotion.

Out of all these influences emerge the stereotyped career officers, overawed by their superiors, haunted by the rules of the General Accounting Office,[1] slow to assess the force of new ideas in politics, economics, or the techniques of their own trade. They are short of the earthy but useful qualities usually associated with the policy reporter; they are, as a rule, too nice.

To this last generalization, and to all the others, some notable exceptions can be made. A case in point is the Foreign Service officer who was transferred to Brazil after duty in Berlin, where he had made a close study of Nazi police methods. He was assigned to liaison work with the Brazilian police and helped them capture a German agent who had organized a network to gather information on Allied ship movements. The Queen Elizabeth was in Rio with a division of British troops aboard, and it was plain that the spies still at large would try to broadcast the time of her departure. The captured agent refused to name his confederates until the American Foreign Service officer got the Brazilians to apply a peculiarly persuasive form of interrogation that he had run across in his studies of the Gestapo.

Allowing for this timely intervention for the uncommon abilities represented by the gallery at the bottom of pages 84–85, and for all the other hedges that must surround any brief appraisal of 818 people, there still remains an animal that can be called the typical Foreign Service officer. He is by no means a figure of fun. He works hard and is intensely loyal to his conception of the United States and its interests. In the past 7 years he has known many of the hardships and dangers of combat zones.

Before the war most of the posts where he might serve were reasonably pleasant places to live (only 64 out of the 303 diplomatic and consular posts are officially classified as "unhealthful"), but today, in much of Europe and the Far East, he lives amid the debris of war. The State Department still puts "Esquire" on a Foreign Service officer's mail, and the United States Naval Regulations still prescribe a five-gun salute for a vice consul. But the little dignities that go with his life don't relieve him of financial worries, if he is trying to live on his salary, and especially if he has children to be educated in the United States, or of resentment over the superior salaries paid in other civilian agencies that operated overseas during the war. (These were as much as $2,000 higher for comparable age and experience.) He is aware of a good many of the defects of the Service, but is tired of the belting it takes from the press and public.

THE MUDDLE AT HEADQUARTERS

If he is in no great hurry for a reply, the Foreign Service officer can forward his gripes (via his seniors in the field, of course) to the Office of the Foreign Service in Washington. The operations of OFS were reorganized in the spring of 1945, during the brief regime of Mr. Stettinius. The new set-up would not be described as a piece of streamlining, but it does offer the framework for a rational administration of the Service. All that is lacking is some trained administrators.

The present director, Selden Chapin, is plainly uncomfortable in the job, though he is giving the Service better administration than it is accustomed to. Like the other Foreign Service officers assigned to OFS, he regards administrative work in Washington as a rather distasteful interlude in his career.

Chapin reports to Donald Russell, the Assistant Secretary of State in charge of administration of the Department and Foreign Service. Russell is the fourth man to hold this job in a year and a half. He is an agreeable, unassuming lawyer from Spartanburg, S. C. (formerly associated with Mr. Byrne's old firm), with no experience in administration and no particular aptitude for it. The Foreign Service gets only a part of his attention, since he is also housekeeper for the Department itself, and since Mr. Byrnes relies heavily on him for general liaison with Capitol Hill.

Russell, in turn, is only 1 of 10 people on "the Assistant Secretary level."[2] and must compete with all the others for the ear of the Secretary or Under Secretary. The Secretary has had little time or inclination to think about the administrative problems of the Foreign Service. Under Secretary Acheson takes a critical interest in these problems, but his office hours are almost entirely absorbed by the broader issues of foreign policy.

[1] An unmarried Foreign Service officer, recently transferred from one post to another, had his mother living with him and took her along when he moved. On his expense account he listed the taxi fare from the airport to the hotel. The item was disallowed, and the voucher returned from Washington with the notation: "It is assumed your mother rode in the cab." The officer wrote back: "I had my mother walk and carry her luggage."

[2] Six assistant secretaries, plus the legal adviser, press-relations officer, and special assistants for intelligence and international organizations. This was the line-up as of the end of May; it has been reshuffled several times since Mr. Hull left office in November 1944.

The policy decisions taken by Byrnes and Acheson are supposed to be carried out by the Foreign Service, but the mechanics of this service are almost entirely neglected in the highest echelons of the Department. If the Service were an effective agency for execution of United States foreign policy, this neglect would be understandable and could be taken as a sign that executive time was being wisely budgeted. But the good executive, in government or business, gets down to work on the grubby details when one of his bureaus or branches is not producing.

Though the administrative problems of the Foreign Service get only a brief hearing with the high command of the State Department, the Service is well represented when the foreign policy of the United States is being thrashed out. The Service controls the Department's political offices, where 58 of its career men are stationed. The recommendations of these officers travel up to the top via Assistant Secretary Spruille Braden, in the case of Latin America, or Assistant Secretary James C. Dunn, for the rest of the world. Braden is a Roosevelt career man, and Dunn is a former Foreign Service officer.

The political offices of the Department are engaged in running warfare with the economic staff headed by Assistant Secretary Will Clayton. The Foreign Service men in the European and Near Eastern and African offices are generally committed to the idea of two blocs in the world—the Russian and the non-Russian. They think in terms of "containing" Russia by a series of firm stands on specific points: Iran, Trieste, and so on. Mr. Clayton's men are more interested in exploring the possibilities of collaboration with Russia on a variety of economic problems that cut across political boundaries. Mr. Byrnes may soon have to negotiate some sort of peace between these two factions.

The Secretary recently ruled in favor of the political offices in another intramural dispute. The remnants of the Office of Strategic Services had been taken into State in January. Col. Alfred McCormack, a New York lawyer who ran a special branch of Army intelligence during the war, attempted to organize the OSS people, along with some men he brought over from G–2, as a research and intelligence branch of the Department, independent of the political offices. There followed several months of infighting. Acheson and Clayton sided with McCormack; Russell, Braden, and Dunn lined up with the career men in the political offices. A House Appropriations Subcommittee refused funds for an independent intelligence unit in the Department. Byrnes decided not to contest the point, and transferred most of McCormack's personnel and functions to the political offices; the colonel resigned.

The relations of the Foreign Service with agencies outside the State Department are sometimes equally unfriendly and they are always complex. The Foreign Service works for Commerce and Agriculture, as well as State. Its mission brings it into contact, in Washington and in the field, with Treasury, Justice, and the Army and Navy; during the war the picture was further complicated by the operations of FEA, OWI, and other temporary agencies overseas. The State Department has never mastered the rambling "chains of command," shifting "levels of interagency coordination," and assorted administrative horrors involved in this situation.

THE SERVICE WRITES A BILL

In the chaos radiating from Pennsylvania Avenue and Seventeenth Street NW. it is surprising to find that the Foreign Service has been able to put together a plan for correcting its own faults. The new Foreign Service bill has been in the works for nearly 2 years. It was drafted in the Planning Division of the Office of the Foreign Service; it has occupied most of Chapin's time since he came in as Director of the Service 15 months ago. The legislation was approved by Secretary Byrnes in April and then routed to the Bureau of the Budget. Chapin hoped it might be introduced in Congress in June.

The proposed Foreign Service Act of 1946 would, among other things:

1. Authorize higher salaries (up to $15,000) and allowances for Foreign Service officers.

2. Apply to the Service the Navy's hard-boiled system of "promotion up or selection out," by which an officer who fails of promotion after a certain period in any rank is automatically retired. At the same time a more generous scale of retirement benefits would be set up to permit ineffective officers to get out without too much hardship.

3. Set up a Foreign Service reserve among employees of State and other government agencies and people in private life who are found "to have outstanding qualifications of a specialized character." Reserve officers would hold their appointments for periods up to 4 years and during that period could be sent out for active duty at any diplomatic or consular post at any rank suitable to their abilities. After 3 or 4 years in the reserve, with or without foreign duty, an officer would be eligible to enter the career service without starting in at the bottom of the ladder.

4. Consolidate the administrative and clerical functions of the service under a Foreign Service staff corps. Salaries in the corps would go as high as $10,000 and are intended to attract some of the administrative talent the Service needs. Regular Foreign Service officers would be relieved of much of their present load of paper work.

5. Provide, for the first time, a systematic course of training throughout the career of every member of the Service. About half the officer corps would be trained as specialists in specific areas or technical fields. Language study, now voluntary, would be required.

6. "Re-Americanize" the Service by giving its members more leave and more duty in the United States.

To apply the new salary scales, allowances, and retirement benefits to the present membership of the Foreign Service would cost about $10,000,000 over the $53,000,000 the Service asked of Congress for fiscal 1947. Looking ahead 2 or 3 years, the authors of the bill would like to see a Foreign Service of about 12,000 people, 1,600 of them officers. The annual budget would then be in the neighborhood of $80,000,000 to $100,000,000, which is about the cost of an Iowa-class battleship.

The Foreign Service reserve is probably the most important idea in the new bill. This idea has already been tested in the work of the auxiliary Foreign Service officers during the war. Since no steps had been taken by the State Department or Congress to expand the regular officer corps before Pearl Harbor, it was necessary soon after to recruit hundreds of auxiliary officers—experts in a variety of technical subjects of sudden importance, as well as men who could be hastily trained for general consular or diplomatic duties. Eventually nearly 1,100 auxiliary officers were on duty in the field.

Under the reserve plan the Service in peacetime could give temporary assignments to specialists who would not be interested in foreign service as a career. (This would apply to the type of talent that William Benton, Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, wants to use overseas in some of the functions formerly handled by OWI.) Reserve officers who were attracted to the career and transferred to it would presumably bring fresh ideas and experience to the Service and keep the officer corps on its toes. But it is doubtful whether the plan is really flexible enough to achieve all these things. There seems to be no valid reason why a reserve officer who might be qualified to serve as economic counselor of an embassy should be kept waiting 3 years before he is eligible to take an oral examination for transfer to the career.

The examination system is not touched by the new bill. It is one of the main weaknesses of the Service and it is one that could be overcome without an act of Congress. Candidates are given written and oral tests, equally weighted. The oral usually lasts about half an hour and is a reasonably good test of social poise. The written exams stress factual questions of the true-false type and brief analytical problems; they show whether the candidate has a good memory and understands what he reads. As tests of this type go, they are very tough indeed. But an officer who had access to all the personnel records of the Service recently made the remarkable admission that he could see no correlation whatever between the marks given officers in their entrance examinations and their subsequent performance in the field. There is nothing in the present screening system to show which candidates have any originality, imagination, resourcefulness, or capacity for leadership. These are some of the qualities for which OSS devised the house-party tests described in a recent Fortune article (March 1946). The OSS techniques are being studied by OFS, and written questions of the essay or "thinking" type will be tried on next year's candidates, according to Selden Chapin. But he does not give the impression that the examinations are regarded as an urgent problem.

Another weakness of the Service not corrected by the new bill is the position of Mr. Chapin himself. As Director of the Foreign Service, he is three levels down from the Secretary on the organization chart of the State Department, in spite of the fact that there are nearly 4,000 more people in the Service than in the Department itself. The Director of the Service needs easier access to the Secretary; he should at least rank as an Assistant Secretary, and perhaps would be more effective as an Under Secretary. He would be still more effective if he were not himself a Foreign Service officer. What seems to be needed is a man of exceptional administrative ability, some experience outside the United States, and enough prestige to stare down an ambassador.

Mr. Chapin, after administering the Service for a while (not more than 4 years, by law), will be sent out to a post in the field, and one of the men he has been administering will come back to Washington to succeed him. There is no continuity in this arrangement and it leaves the Director of the moment in a weak position in dealing with senior officers in the field.

COUNTING THE VOTES

The Foreign Service bill, in short, is good so far as it goes. But Congress and the country are singularly ill-prepared to debate this legislation, or the more sweeping reforms that might be desirable. The Congressmen who are seriously interested in the problems of the Foreign Service are a small minority on the Hill. Like their colleagues, they are under heavy pressure to reduce Government spending, and no one is going to pick up any votes in November by giving the Foreign Service more money. Congressmen are prejudiced, furthermore, against Government salaries higher than their own. The Service itself has been notoriously inept in its relations with Congress. It has never succeeded in dramatizing its mission, and it has been reluctant to present its weaknesses in forceful terms.

The United States public, when it shows any interest in the Foreign Service, is inclined to criticize it for the wrong reasons. On the rare occasions when the Service hits the front pages, the newspaper reader receives little enlightenment. In Gen. Pat Hurley's famous broadside at the time of his resignation as Ambassador to Chungking, he set out to show that a number of career officers had opposed the policy President Roosevelt had instructed him to pursue in China. This was perfectly true, but as the general warmed to the subject, his shots were falling all over the lot. The net addition to the public's knowledge of the Foreign Service was trifling. Only a few months previous, the State Department itself had permitted the FBI to accuse one of the most promising officers in the service of conspiracy to violate the Federal espionage statute. The arrest of this officer, John S. Service, naturally got a good deal more publicity than the complete vindication that he soon received from a grand jury.

Despite the general indifference to the Service, relieved by a few clichés that pass for informed comment, there are certain lines of criticism that have been worked out with some care and presented to limited sections of American opinion. The debate on the Foreign Service bill will show whether these criticisms have made any impression on Congress. One line of attack has come from a group of American businessmen with foreign interests. They argue that the Foreign Service lacks the knowledge of American business operations, the flexibility, and the imagination necessary to give effective support to United States commerce abroad. Some of them would like to see an independent Foreign Service again set up in the Commerce Department.

Another sophisticated criticism of the Foreign Service comes from liberal and leftist quarters, where it is charged that United States diplomats consistently range themselves on the side of reactionary forces abroad. This argument can easily be overdone.[2] But it calls attention to two important facts: That our Foreign Service officers have a hand in policy making and that the personal politics of these eight hundred-odd men are thus legitimate matters of public concern. If the left-of-center criticism of the Service gets any hearing in Congress, that will be all to the good.

There is another line of criticism that could have a stimulating effect on the coming congressional debate. It arises out of the experience of people who worked during the war with FEA, OWI, and other civilian agencies overseas, or at close quarters with the State Department in Washington. Many of them have come to the conclusion that the whole idea of a career diplomatic service is anachronistic. They would like to see the Foreign Service and State Department completely merged; any employee of State could be sent out on any diplomatic assignment he was qualified for; anyone in the field could be brought back if his services were needed in Washington. There would be no such thing as a "foreign-service officer." The State Department—home office and field branches—would be a career only in the sense that most of its employees would be covered by civil-service rules. It could hire from other Federal agencies or from outside the Government for special jobs abroad.

If these proposals are put forward, the foreign service will have to go to bat for the career principle, which Congress and the service have both been taking for granted more than 20 years. That means the service must explain its failings by showing—with a good deal of documentation—that the career has not been well recruited or well run and has never really had a trial.

[2] As in the case of the United States dealings with Vichy and Darlan. These were loudly criticized as samples of arch-tory thought among the career diplomats, but the fact was that our French policy was laid down by President Roosevelt, who was in many matters his own State Department and Foreign Service.

The anticareer people overlook several points. Their experience of Foreign Service was limited to the war years, when the Government could get anyone it wanted for any job. But it doesn't follow that the State Department in peacetime can uproot one of its employees from his garden apartment in Arlington, Va., and tell him to go to Nigeria for 2 years. The career Foreign Service officer accepts the assignment because of professional discipline, esprit de corps, and the implicit promise that duty in a hell hole entitles him to better posts later on. During the war, moreover, the representation of the United States abroad consisted almost entirely of dealings with Allied governments and friendly peoples. It was an atmosphere favorable to quick and businesslike agreements. Men who had no previous Foreign Service experience saw such agreements being made, perhaps negotiated some themselves, and jumped to the conclusion that diplomacy is always that easy.

After a war, relations with Allies are likely to sour, contacts must be made with the defeated peoples, trade begins to move in new channels, competition sharpens. These are the periods when the experience of a career Foreign Service officer—if it is a well-run career—should pay off.

Old-line career men are inclined to exaggerate the mysteries of their profession. But there are techniques in dealing with foreign peoples and governments. It takes some time to pick them up, and they have to be learned in the field. The classic statement of this proposition was made by James Kearney, a New Jersey newspaper editor sent to France on an official mission during the other war. Mr. Kearney did not know France or the French and found he was not making much headway. He told a friend: "There's one thing I've discovered over here. There's a hell of a lot of difference between Paris and Trenton, and you notice it more in Paris than you do in Trenton."

Needed—a Scientific Calendar

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I introduced a bill in Congress to provide for the establishment of a World Calendar. My discussion in explanation of this proposal will be found near the end of the recorded floor debates in the House section of today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Under leave granted me by the House, I am inserting herewith a recent editorial from the Washington Times-Herald which discusses the proposed calendar incorporated in the legislation I have today introduced. I commend it to your attention.

If this World Calendar is eventually adopted, I propose that the final day of each year—the three hundred and sixty-fifth day—be set aside as a world holiday to be known as Universal Peace Day and dedicated in every country of the world to the important task of building in the hearts and minds and souls of all mankind the precepts of thought and the habits of action which will lead to permanent peace and universal equity.

The editorial follows:

NEEDED: A SCIENTIFIC CALENDAR

We present in this space today, as worth anybody's careful examination, a picture of a truly scientific calendar.

The Gregorian calendar, by which most of the world goes, is only partially scientific. It is really an improved Julian calendar. The Julian calendar was worked out by Roman scientists in the time of Julius Caesar (100–44 B. C.), and the Gregorian improvement on the Julian was sponsored by Pope Gregory XIII (1572–85).

Insofar as the Gregorian calendar tries to follow the monthly progressions of the moon and the yearly cycle of the earth around the sun, it is a scientific calendar.

But it is all messed up with months varying from 28 to 31 days in length, leap-year complications and month dates whose weekday names change from year to year.

The Gregorian's basic handicap is the fact that the figure 365—the number of days in a normal year—is not evenly divisible by four.

[2] The year-end world holiday, W or Dec. 31 (365th day) follows Dec. 30 every year.

It is proposed by the World Calendar Association that the United States lead the way in adopting the World Calendar pictured above.

As you can readily see, this calendar would involve no queer or radical departures from the Gregorian. The months would keep their present names; so would the days; weeks would still be seven days long; there would be leap years, so that the gals would lose no traditional rights in the matter of proposing to the guys.

364-DAY CALENDAR

The calendar year, however, would be limited to 364 days, instead of 365 or 366. This limitation would permit the splitting of the year into four quarters, each containing the same number of days—91. The first month of each quarter would have 31 days, the other two 30 each.

In ordinary years, the extra day—called the Year-end World Holiday, or XYZ-day, or anything else the majority of people might want to call it in each country—would come between December 30 and January 1. In leap years, there would be two of these extra-day holidays, one at year's end and one at the end of June.

With this calendar, the year would always begin on a Sunday, and each day of the week would come on the same date of the month every year. Christmas, for instance, would always fall on a Monday, July 4 on a Wednesday, St. Patrick's Day on a Sunday, Memorial Day on a Thursday, and so on.

The advantages of this systemized calendar over the present mixed-up one seem pretty obvious to us. They are much the same as the advantages we would enjoy if we would adopt the simple and scientific metric system.

THREE-DAY WEEK ENDS

Employers, wage earners, salaried employees, banks, and insurance companies would benefit especially from having quarter-years of exactly equal lengths and months varying only from 20 to 31 days.

A further twist, and for our money a most pleasant one, is suggested by the backers of this revised calendar. It has to do with holidays and the idea is to celebrate each holiday on the Monday nearest its actual date. Christmas, of course, would always come on a Monday on this calendar. But July 4 could be celebrated Monday, July 2; Lincoln's Birthday Monday, February 13; Columbus Day Monday, October 9; and so on.

By this device, we could promote ourselves quit a number of nice, long 3-day week ends during the year.

The World Calendar looks good to us; legislation aimed at United States adoption of it is in the works; and here's luck to said legislation.

The Truman Loan to Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a statement released on January 7, 1946. There has been nothing happen since then to justify any change of attitude. In fact, there are additional reasons to oppose this proposal. The statement:

THE TRUMAN LOAN TO BRITAIN

The Truman loan to Britain does not merit support. The United States, through its Congress, has provided or is providing $2,700,000,000 for UNRRA. Additional millions and billions of dollars have been appropriated to carry out the principles of the Atlantic Charter. The UNRRA appropriation was made in the name of humanity. These funds were provided to feed, clothe, and shelter human beings. We should not nullify these Christian objectives by now providing Britain or any other country the funds with which to carry on an imperialistic war to destroy human beings. While UNRRA will save human lives, the British loan will destroy more human lives.

The time has come to tell Britain and all countries that the American people are not going to give further from their depleted resources any money to any country that does not subscribe and support the principles of the Atlantic Charter. There is small difference indeed between carrying on an imperialistic war ourselves and the providing of funds for other countries to carry one on.

No one need be deceived. Everyone knows that these funds will be used for bombs and bullets to take the lives of innocent people in Java, Indochina, and other countries. No thoughtful person would provide a loan for some individual to buy a gun and the ammunition to take even one human life. Why then, I ask, should these enormous funds be provided a country to destroy thousands upon thousands of human lives?

The world should be advised once and for all that Christian America is not so materialistic that it can be influenced by those who would place more coins in the pockets of a few "money changers in the temple" regardless of the country the temple happens to be located in. I hesitate to believe that the American people are so materialistic and so mercenary that this loan can be sold to them on the basis of the "good times" it will bring in our country.

There is a moral issue involved in this proposed loan, and no whitewash is white enough to hide the sins incident to it. The Truman administration and the previous administration professed great interests in humanitarianism. Even on the floor of this House it is frequently evident that the majority wishes to convey the impression that minority membership is lacking in appreciation of human rights and human values. This has been a most false approach. The Truman administration has evidently now repudiated all humanitarianism—yes, it has openly flouted all humanitarianism by even proposing this loan.

Enough sugar cannot be used to coat this legislative pill so that it should be swallowed by any person who does not want human blood on his hands and a permanent blight on his conscience.

The American people applauded the President's action when he told the Chinese to quit killing each other and to unite for the benefit of their country. I believe the American people would applaud the President if he would tell Britain and the other loan-seeking countries to sweep off their own doorsteps, follow the Atlantic Charter, and cease activities that violate the rights of men—yes, men, whoever they may be, wherever they may be, and whatever the color of their skin may be.

Attlee's description to the Congress of the conditions in Limey and the reasons why he is for the general welfare of all the people of England was only a sham, if he now advocates or condones what his own country is doing in Java and in Indochina at this very moment.

The right and the desire for life and freedom is just as valuable and sweet to the lowly as it is to the snobs of any country.

More About Democratic Machine Election Frauds in McMinn County, Tenn.—McMinn County and Polk County, Tenn., Are Two Political Plague Spots in the United States—And the Machine, in the Words of the Infamous Boss Tweed, Says to the Decent People of Those Counties: "As Long as We Count the Votes, What Are You Going To Do About It?"

OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the eyes of the people of east Tennessee will be on McMinn County from now until the close of the election for county officers in that county on August 1 next.

For the past 10 years the law-abiding citizens of that county have been disfranchised through force and fraud by the Democratic machine. The machine has disfranchised the voters of that county and has taken over every office in the county at the point of pistols and with the blackjacks of armed deputy sheriffs, policemen, and other armed satellites.

The outrages reached their most shocking heights while the 3,526 boys from that county were absent from home as members of the United States armed forces fighting all over the world. In the Army alone 79 of these boys were killed in action, other came home with arms and legs off, others with enemy shrapnel and bullets in their bodies.

While they were fighting, bleeding, and dying for liberty in this country and in other lands, their loved ones at home were disfranchised by the armed members of the Democratic machine of their home county.

One mother of six boys in the armed forces, one of whom was killed in action, was forced to run the gauntlet of pistols and blackjacks when she voted in the August and November elections of 1944 in her home town of Athens. In the same town a prominent, gray-haired businessman, two of whose boys were in the armed service and one of whom was wounded in action, while acting as a Republican judge of the election in Athens, Tenn., was forced by armed thugs to stand back 10 feet from where the count of the ballots was conducted, so he could not know whether the ballots were properly called or not. The Republican judges and watchers who were detailed to help hold said election were driven back from the ballot box so they could not witness the count and, in some instances, were driven from the polling places.

The machine has stated its intention to deny to the GI ticket and their friends the right given them by section 2087 of the Code of Tennessee to witness the count of the ballots. This section of the code reads as follows:

> Reading and numbering the ballots: When the election is finished, the returning officer and judges shall, in the presence of such of the electors as may choose to attend, open the box and read aloud the names of the persons which shall appear in each ballot; and the clerks, at the same time, shall number the ballots, each clerk separately.

The leaders of the machine have stated that if the GI candidates or their friends undertake to enter the polling places in McMinn County for the purpose of witnessing the count to see that the ballots are honestly counted they will be met and repelled by armed force.

In every county of Tennessee except in McMinn and Polk Counties the citizens are permitted to enter the polling places and watch the count. No honest election official objects to being watched—a dishonest one should be watched.

Evidence of what happened through the conspiracy of the two Democratic election commissioners in the appointment of officers and in the conduct of the November 1944 election for the election of Presidential electors and a Member of Congress is in the hands of the Department of Justice and has been prior to and subsequent to the November elections of 1944. If any prosecutions result, they must be in the Federal court. None can be had in the criminal court for McMinn County. All the machinery for the enforcement of the law in McMinn County is absolutely under the control of the machine.

A staff writer of the Knoxville News-Sentinel has written three articles exposing the revolting conditions existing in that county. I include as a part of these remarks the last two of these articles written by Willard Yarbrough, News-Sentinel staff writer, the first under an Athens date line of July 12, the second under an Athens date line of July 13:

REDISTRICTING MCMINN PUTS DEMOCRATS ON TOP—PACKED CONVENTION NAMED DEMO TICKET FOR AUGUST 1, SAYS GOP

(By Willard Yarbrough)

ATHENS, July 12.—The Cantrell Democratic organization, which expects to maintain itself in office August 1, has been solidly entrenched in McMinn County for more than 10 years.

The Cantrells have been cussed and discussed by their enemies just as long, but they have continued to ride out the storms that brew over their determined dynasty and still rule supreme.

The organization came into full flower several years ago when the general assembly passed a redistricting bill which changed the county court set-up and named the successor magistrates—the majority of whom were Democrats.

This removed the last trace of Republican rule in this once Republican-dominated county. There are five Cantrell brothers, all Etowahans, but the two political leaders are State Senator Paul Cantrell, who seeks the sheriff's post, and Frank Cantrell, mayor of Etowah.

CONVENTION PICKED CANTRELL

The Democrats in convention nominated the present candidates, and Senator Cantrell, as chairman of his party, was named for sheriff over Clyde Rogers, another Etowahan, who had split with the main organization.

The convention, which the Republicans say was packed with delegates from Polk, Meigs, and other adjoining counties, also picked these well-known McMinn men:

For circuit court clerk, T. B. Ivins, Etowah, former sheriff and one-time county WPA administrator, who is the incumbent clerk.

For trustee, John B. Kennedy, Athens, former city judge who already has served two terms as trustee and is a candidate to succeed himself.

For register of deeds, John C. Cates, Jr., Niota, who is seeking his second term.

For county court clerk, Boe Dunn, Athens man and former Etowahan, who has been chief deputy sheriff for several years.

WOODS ENDORSED

The convention also endorsed George Woods, county purchasing agent and speaker of the house of representatives at Nashville, for direct McMinn representative, and Sheriff Pat Mansfield as senatorial candidate to the general assembly as the choice to succeed Paul Cantrell. The two would virtually swap jobs.

There also are four constable nominees who are Democratic supporters, three of whom—A. B. Blair, Dick Carden, and B. F. Sharp—are incumbents.

The die was cast and the Rogers-Cantrell split was official. Mr. Rogers had thought of becoming a candidate to succeed himself after only one term in office, but a hitch developed.

Mr. Dunn, the county court clerk nominee, wanted to run for sheriff. The story goes that the organization said the only post open to him was that of county court clerk—so he announced for that position and Mr. Cantrell decided he wanted the sheriff's post again.

TURNS ON POWER

With Mr. Rogers thus frozen out of the race he bucked the organization and opposed Mr. Cantrell for the sheriff's nomination. Mr. Cantrell polled more than 700 delegate votes and Mr. Rogers 95.

This political split led eventually to bloodshed at Etowah. The candidate's father, John Rogers, was arrested charged with carrying a pistol. State Highway Patrol Sgt. C. W. Strader made the arrest and it's no secret that Mr. Rogers was not treated too gently.

He was taken to McMinn jail where he posted bond. A few hours later Etowah Police Chief William (Bill) Rucker and Night Policeman Roe Rucker, brothers, attempted to arrest Mrs. Bill Murphy in Etowah. She is Mr. Rogers' daughter and a sister of Clyde Rogers. They say the charge was profanity.

MURPHY IS SHOT

At any rate, during the ensuing argument, Mr. Murphy was shot at his drug store. He recovered. Chief Rucker says his brother did the shooting in self-defense. Others say Chief Rucker did the shooting and that Mr. Murphy was not attempting to fight back, but simply trying to prevent Mrs. Murphy from being arrested. No arrest was made and no charge has been brought against either policeman.

But blood had been drawn a month before the polls open. The fear that more shooting will occur on election day is expressed. Restraint by both factions and both parties is needed if violence is to be kept down and law and order maintained.

The Democrats have not been campaigning too strenously, depending on personal contact and team work to maintain their organization on election day. Only Boe Dunn has a poster posted.

BARBECUE ON TODAY

Their first formal campaign bid was set for this afternoon (3 p. m.) at McMinn County High School campus here. It's in the form of a barbecue, with plans made to feed choice beef, mutton, and pork to 2,500 persons.

Paul Cantrell said it was almost impossible to put the sheriff and deputies strictly on salaries. He said an enabling act before the general assembly and an appropriation by county court would be necessary before deputies could be taken off the fee system and given salaries instead. GI Sheriff Nominee Knox Henry advocates salaries for self and deputies only, without fees.

Mr. Cantrell said his organization was letting "the other side do all the talking." The Democrats, up until this time, have not made any campaign talks. They hoped to have Senator TOM STEWART in Athens for the Friday afternoon barbecue. Gov. Jim McCord advised he wouldn't be able to attend the gathering.

Mr. Cantrell served three terms previously as sheriff. He appeared quite unconcerned about the outcome this time. "Whatever happens I am always the target of the opposition," he said. "They cuss me more than anybody else. We hope there'll be a quiet election and that everybody will keep his temper."

THREAT OF GUNS ENTERS MCMINN BALLOT BATTLE—GI TICKET CHIEF, OPPOSING DEMOCRATIC NOMINEES, SAYS VETS "BROUGHT WEAPONS HOME AND KNOW HOW TO USE THEM"—BOTH ADMIT BUYING POLLS

(By Willard Yarbrough)

ATHENS, July 13.—More than 10,000 persons have been qualified to vote in the McMinn County election August 1, and the total vote in the bitter contest between the Cantrell Democrats and the GI Nonpartisan ticket may exceed 13,000.

This record figure reflects the determination of each party to win the election, billed as the keenest test of the Cantrell forces in 10 years. It also bespeaks wholesale purchase of poll-tax receipts, commonly referred to as bloc buying.

The Democrats admit purchase of 4,600 poll-tax receipts in book form, with names of voters usually filled in later. The GI's say they have bought 3,500 receipts and that individual backers have purchased at least 800 more to bring the total to 4,300.

FIFTEEN THOUSAND DOLLARS DEMOCRATIC KITTY

The Democrats admit, too, that they have $15,000 in the campaign kitty, but don't expect to spend near that amount. The GI's have spent about $5,000 already, they say, and have an unlimited amount to draw on if and when it is needed.

The GI's declare, too, that the supreme test will come at the ballot box and they realize—and have been repeating the chant—that they must convince the voter his ballot will be counted after it is cast. They openly charge that the Democrats will attempt to count them out after the polls have closed. This same charge has marked many McMinn elections in the past.

This Battle of the Ballot Boxes unquestionably will bring on fireworks, and bloodshed might result August 1, for both sides will be armed for the show-down.

GI'S BROUGHT GUNS HOME

"We aim to have an honest count at the ballot box," said Jim Buttram, 24-year-old husky ex-footballer who is manager of the GI Ticket. And with a grin, he added: "We GI's brought our guns home with us and we know how to use them."

The GI's expect to keep their eyes on the ballot boxes until the vote is counted and therein lies the conflict. For Paul Cantrell, Democratic nominee for sheriff, says no one other than election officials and watchers will be permitted inside the rooms when the vote is counted!

"There are two Democratic and one Republican members on the County Election Commission," said Mr. Cantrell. "The GI's or Republicans will have four representatives, a judge, a clerk and two watchers. The Democrats will have six representatives, an officer, a clerk, two watchers and two judges.

"Only these persons will be admitted to the count of the ballots. No one else will be permitted and armed deputies will see to it that the election law is upheld to the letter. We are not boasting about strife and are trying to talk it down. The less we talk about it the less we will have."

BUTTRAM DENIES STATEMENT

Mr. Cantrell heard that Mr. Buttram, during the Etowah rally last weeks, made this statement:

"We know that the Cantrells have spies here and I want them to take this statement straight back to their headquarters. We know that the Cantrells will have 500 armed deputies on election day and we will have 500 too! They may fire shots, but we will fire the last."

Mr. Buttram, asked about the reported statement, said that was not said. This is his version:

"Fred Hutsell, a veteran supporter, said he knew that the Cantrells would have armed deputies at the polls. And then I said: 'We will have good clean people at the polls to see that we get a fair count.'"

Mr. Cantrell said that any person not deputized would be disarmed as quickly as it was discovered he was carrying a gun. The GI's said that if any member did carry a gun he certainly wouldn't be carrying it with the intention of handing it over.

VOWS FAIR COUNT

Knox Henry, GI candidate for sheriff, is campaigning with other veterans on the GI Clean-up Ticket. His platform was expressed early but one statement is significant: "Your vote will be counted as cast."

If the GI's mean business then that statement carries a lot. For to assure the voter that his vote will be counted the GI's must be in the ballot-counting room, a GI supporter said. And this action the Democrats fully expect to thwart by preventing anyone except election officials in the rooms when the votes are polled.

Mr. Henry also said: "I believe in true democracy and honesty in elections, and McMinn County is going to have decency and honesty."

The Republicans and the Clyde Rogers faction are remaining quiet, with the GI's taking the lead. But all three admit that careful organization has been set up, with election-day workers to be plentiful and watchers to be stationed at every polling place.

The 1946 battle of the ballot boxes may prove anything but an exception to that rule. Much is at stake and neither side expects to pull its punches on the 1st day of August.

Address of Rear Adm. Ralph Davison

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include a splendid address made by Rear Adm. Ralph Davison, United States Navy, at the impressive commissioning exercises of the U. S. S. Saipan, aircraft carrier, in Philadelphia, on July 14, 1946, of which ship Capt. John G. Crommelin is the commanding officer, which commissioning was under the jurisdiction of Vice Adm. James L. Kauffman, United States Navy, commandant of the Fourth Naval District:

Admiral Kauffman, distinguished guests, personnel of the Saipan, ladies and gentlemen, when Captain Crommelin asked me by telephone some weeks ago to participate in the commissioning of this fine ship a host of memories came flooding back to me—memories principally of the gallant career of your captain, then of the campaign and island conquest which the name "Saipan" will forever commemorate.

I had scarcely arrived at Pearl Harbor in December 1943 when John Crommelin came to see me. He had narrowly escaped death in the sinking of Liscombe Bay, where he had served as chief of staff to my brave classmate, Rear Admiral Henry Mullinix, who was lost in the same sinking. He was still suffering from the extensive injuries he had received on that occasion, and the skin over the greater portion of his body had the raw and painful appearance which we came to associate with recently healed burns. Yet his one thought was to get back into action, and back he went as my own chief of staff. From Kwajalein through Eniwetok to Kavieng and Emirau, he served me faithfully, loyally, and well, but he did it at the expense of his own health and well-being, and finally, to my great regret, had to go back to Pearl for major repairs.

I recite these few facts, not so much in his praise, though he well deserves it, but as one example among thousands of the spirit which carried us to final victory; a spirit which under his command and guidance will imbue this ship. I saw that spirit displayed on innumerable occasions, and I know that it is alive today, wherever the Navy has a ship or a shore station. We are the inheritors of a great legacy illumined by names of men such as Hopkins, Lawrence, Decatur, Porter, Farragut, and Dewey; by names of ships like Constitution, Yorktown, Olympia, Enterprise, and Franklin. We have added more names to that long roll, and one of the proudest is the name of the carrier we commission today.

The campaign for the conquest of the Marianas, in which the capture of Saipan was the first step, will be studied by students of naval and amphibious warfare when we are long gone from this mortal scene. The Navy and Marine Corps had perfected the technique which won us Tarawa, Kwajalein and Eniwetok; we were receiving men, ships, and munitions in greater abundance when the combined Chiefs of Staff decided on the bold stroke that was finally to bring us bases at Japan's doorstep, and force the Japanese Navy to fight for the first time since Midway.

The initial landing on Saipan was accomplished without great loss, but the subsequent clearing of the island taxed our Army and Marine landing force to the utmost. The enemy resisted to the last man, and forced us to commit even our floating reserve. It was on Saipan that we encountered Japanese fanaticism at its cruel worst—hundreds of Japanese civilians, penned between our lines and the cliffs of the north coast, threw their children into the sea, and then hurled themselves after them.

The island was finally secured, but not until the Fifth Fleet had encountered and broken the desperate attempt of the Japanese Navy to thwart our conquest of the Mariannas. In the first battle of the Philippine Sea, Admiral Mitscher's Task Force 58 met and threw back the best the Japs could offer; and then, in one of the most daring actions of the Pacific war, sent them flying headlong in defeat; a defeat from which they never fully recovered, for they had lost the cream of their carrier air force, which they could never again replace.

You can see, then, why Saipain will always be an honored name. It signalizes the beginning of our reconquest of our lost island of Guam. It will be associated forever with the gallantry of our marines. It will recall, wherever Navy men are gathered, the mighty power of our carrier task forces, which swept across the Pacific in a blazing arc of destruction which ended in Tokyo Bay.

We are living in a period of uncertainty, when the lessons of the war are still beclouded by our nearness to them, when we lack the perspective that time alone can give. The problems of demobilization, of reorganization, of world peace, of the future of our armed forces, crowd thick about us. Nothing seems secure in a world of insecurity.

Yet there are some imperishable truths to which we may hold fast for all time, whose validity is attested by every page of history. One of these truths is the profound influence of seapower on the rise and fall of nations. Twice within a generation we have seen Germany beaten to her knees because she never understood the proper application of seapower in peace or war. Despite her early successes, the inexorable might which seapower conferred upon Great Britain and the United States slowly throttled her, and finally brought her crashing down in utter ruin.

The applicability of the same lesson to Japan is not so simply drawn, yet, if we look closely, we will see the reason for her defeat. From her earliest recorded history Japan had regarded her sea power solely as an adjunct to her army. It was a convoy and escort force; it was never a "blue-water" navy. The futile frittering away of her naval forces in her unsuccessful attempt to dislodge us from Guadalcanal; the disasters which overtook her at Midway, at the Philippine Sea; off Leyte and Cape Engano, all point to her ignorance of the proper application of sea power. Of able and educated naval officers she had plenty, but they were ever and increasingly subordinate to her army high command, which dominated not only the Japanese Navy but the whole Japanese Nation.

Surely there is a lesson here for us. Four times since the Revolution—in 1789, in 1812, in 1917, and in 1941—we have seen our policy of neutrality fail and have been drawn into world conflict. Twice—in 1917 and in 1941—we have been granted an interval in which to gird on our armor by the interposition of sea power, in both cases British sea power, between ourselves and our Atlantic adversary. Again, in 1941, we were saved from disaster in the Pacific by the obsession of the Japanese with land conquest, instead of with an extension of her sea power. Are we so oblivious to the lessons of history that we will not learn that our national existence is forever dependent on control of the sea?

A second truth, one which comes closer home because it affects us as individuals, is the superiority of moral courage over material factors in war. A great soldier, Napoleon Boneparte, himself put the ratio as 3 to 1. Whatever the exact ratio may be, we have had abundant proof of the underlying principle. The indomitable moral courage of the British, rising from the holocaust of Dunkerque to build anew her shattered army; the almost incredible tenacity of the Russians before Stalingrad; the swift unification of our own divided nation after Pearl Harbor, and our miraculous arming of the whole world against the forces of fascism; are not these sufficient proof of the triumph of moral courage over material disaster?

Let us read aright then the pages of history; let us insure the preservation of our American way of life, and the success of our foreign policy, by the provision of such sea power as is symbolized by this mighty ship. But let us never forget that it is men, not ships, which make a navy; and let each of us resolve to be worthy of the traditions embodied in the proud name of Saipan. To her captain, officers, and crew we wish Godspeed; to her aviators, happy landings.

A Basic Issue in Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of July 14, 1946.

A BASIC ISSUE IN EUROPE

The outcome of a struggle over new constitutional structures, now at a critical point both in France and Poland, will do much to determine the future political balance of Europe. The issue in each country involves something similar to our own American system of checks and balances. The people of France and Poland must decide whether they want their laws made in a single legislative body, unrestrained by any other control, or in a two-chamber legislature, where proposed laws may be subject to reconsideration, compromise and adjustment.

Back of this question, of course, and fundamental to its solution is the effort of the Communist Party to establish minority rule through democratic forms. It consistently advocates the unicameral legislature. It believes that in nations where there is a multiplicity of parties a disciplined legislative minority, voting as a bloc, can shatter the ranks of an undisciplined and divided majority or exercise a paralyzing veto. Such a condition would provide the first essential for a party distatorship. Opponents of communism see this clearly. They demand a bicameral legislature, supported by an executive and administrative set-up which can resist such disruption and guarantee majority government.

In France, where the voters at the latest election rejected a Communist-sponsored constitution and confirmed the moderate Popular Republicans as the dominant party, the Communists are heavily outnumbered in the electorate. In Poland, which already has a provisional Communist government, they may be. In the recent referendum held there under repressive conditions the radical parties won only 60 percent of the counted vote. One of the proposals of the referendum was to abolish the senate, as established under the constitution of 1921, and approve a unicameral legislature. Mikolajczyk's Polish Peasant Party registered a 40 percent vote against the proposition. So even in Poland, where final elections have not yet been held, the situation remains in flux, with the constitution structure undetermined. In France the matter is all but decided. It seems certain that the present constitutional assembly will endorse a legislature of two chambers. The French people evidently believe that a unicameral legislature, while it may work in England, where minority rule is impossible, would be a danger at this time to the French state.

OPA Was an Alien Weed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANGIER L. GOODWIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, as a further contribution to the current discussion as to whether a revival of price control will be best for the economy of the country, and in the interest of our people, I present to my colleagues the following editorial from the Medford (Mass.) Press of July 5, 1946:

OPA WAS AN ALIEN WEED—IT HAS WILTED; LET IT DIE

Thomas Jefferson once said: "Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread."

We have just issued from several years of Government control of production and prices; we have been told what we should eat and what we should wear, and how much we should pay.

One result has been, as Jefferson wisely foresaw, that we have wanted bread.

The OPA ended perhaps too abruptly. But, having ended, its resurrection is pointless.

Let's not be misled by the mass of propaganda. True, prices have gone up somewhat and will go up some more. This was anticipated. But food and clothing and merchandise are headed at last for the open market, now that obstacles to production have been removed; prices will automatically level off—it has always happened.

Regardless of what OPA's entrenched advocates assert, a revival of the OPA—even a skeletonized OPA—would not be in the interests of the public. We have had a full dose of artificial control and bungling and shortages and black markets.

This is not Russia, where the government tells you how many shorts and how many socks you can buy. This is America and democracy. The OPA sprouted as an alien weed; now that it has wilted let it die a natural death.

Railroad Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I signed the Crosser discharge petition in the firm belief that the bill offered by the gentleman from Ohio had considerable merit and that the House should have an opportunity to debate it. Obviously, some changes in the law were desirable, but it was the responsibility of this House to write the bill. I voted for amendments offered by the committee, which to some degree modified the proposals offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CROSSER]. I could not support the bill as now written.

Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post, in a recent editorial, correctly analyzes the mistakes in that bill, to which I subscribe. Under permission previously granted, I include it as a part of my remarks:

RAILROAD PENSIONS

The turmoil over OPA, the fate of the British loan, and possibly preholiday absorption in personal affairs may account for the lack of public interest in House passage of the Crosser bill amending the railroad retirement and unemployment insurance systems. Yet the far-reaching changes introduced by that bill vitally concern every man, woman, and child in the United States. Those most directly and immediately concerned, of course, are railway employees and the railroads, since the bill calls for greatly enlarged benefits and at the same time would increase substantially the already heavy costs of financing the railway retirement system.

Whether the House itself knew what it was voting for when it approved the Crosser bill seems doubtful in view of the fact that, sitting as the Committee of the Whole, it had previously approved a series of modifying amendments recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. When a record vote was called for, however, it promptly made an about-face and passed the bill in its original form. It is now before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce which, we sincerely hope, will subject it to drastic revision.

Objection to the bill as it now stands is not based upon belief that the proposed new benefits are per se undesirable, for that is not the case. The major questions at issue are (1) whether it is desirable as a matter of public policy to bestow upon a minority group benefits much greater than those enjoyed by the workers insured under the Social Security Act; and (2) whether the additional cost entailed by the proposed enlargement of benefits ought to be imposed upon a particular class of employers—the railroads—under existing conditions.

What the country needs is a coordinated system of social insurance with a greater measure of uniformity in the character and scale of benefits. Instead, the Crosser bill widens the existing gulf between the social insurance system covering wage earners in general and that applicable to railway employees. It would introduce a system of survivorship benefits at a level approximately 25 percent higher than that payable under social security. It also provides for disability benefits entirely unconnected with employment, although no provision for such service-disconnected benefits is to be found in the Social Security Act. In case of unemployment insurance, maximum benefits are raised from $20 to $25 per week, and the duration of benefits raised from 20 to 26 weeks. Moreover, maternity and sick benefits are to be paid for out of unemployment reserve funds, even though the illness may be entirely unconnected with employment.

Chairman LEA of the House Interstate Commerce Committee estimates that a social-security system as liberal as that proposed by the Crosser bill would cost the people of this country over $20,000,000,000 a year. By that token a particularistic pension system applicable solely to railway workers is certain to prove highly costly. The bill itself provides for a staggering levy amounting by 1952 to 15½ percent of pay rolls, with the roads paying 9¼ percent. Moreover, actuarial estimates indicate that even this levy would fall far short of what is required to make the system self-supporting and actuarially sound. The immediate cost to the roads of the larger benefits is estimated at about $100,000,000 per year. Since the roads are already in financial straits and appealing for increases in freight rates, it is obvious that the cost of the proposed larger benefits would ultimately be shifted to the public in the form of higher charges for transportation.

Now is the time to take cognizance of the ultimate effects of extravagant particularistic insurance systems of this type upon the economy. For once insurance rights are established, changes that may be essential in the public interest will undoubtedly meet with bitter opposition from the groups that have acquired preferential insured status.

Inflation Fears

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. ELSTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article from the Cincinnati Enquirer of Saturday, July 13, 1946:

INFLATION FEARS

We have been so saturated with New Deal propaganda of the publicity-minded Chester Bowles pattern that most people really expected to be blown high into the air the day of the great OPA bomb burst.

Here we have survived for two weeks without OPA and we haven't had to yell bloody murder at the top of our lungs. For we of Cincinnati, sick city some folks like to believe it is, are a hardy people, who have stuck together and weathered many an emergency.

First, our Council, unlike the Congress and President Truman, promptly froze rents, which, after all, is the chief concern of responsible people who fear inflation. Our merchants promised to hold the line, and hold the line they have, splendidly. Cincinnati is fortunate in that department-store business here is highly competitive. Runaway inflation just isn't in the cards for thrifty Cincinnatians, for our merchants for years have engaged in healthy competition, and the consumer has enjoyed sane prices on the standard necessities of life.

We have, also fortunately, responsible landlords who do not wish more than an equitable mark-up in rentals. We have trustworthy motorcar dealers who wish to remain in business after any threat of inflation has passed and not profit through black-market prices which OPA fostered, however indirectly, in the past. We have honest food purveyors who are making every effort to stabilize prices for housewives, and some are losing money right now on certain items in order that we may still exist within our budgets.

Cincinnatians are doing without bread. During the war we were forced to forego white shirts, clothing and nylons, motor cars, and tires. We even were forced to forego our beer for a week recently. Some of us may have to pass up butter until normal prices return.

For, as long as Cincinnati largely is populated with sensible people and responsible businessmen, we need not fear wild inflation as genuinely as certain administration politicians would have us do, should OPA be retained only in skeleton form.

The Attitude of the Truman Administration Toward the Purity of the Ballot Box

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, under this heading I include as a part of my remarks an article under the date line of Kansas City, Mo., July 7, appearing in a recent issue of the Chicago Tribune. It contains the picture of the recipient of the pardon under the headline "Pardoned by Truman." The article is captioned by the words of the pardoned criminal, " 'I earned it,' says pardoned vote stealer. Pendergast aide receives Truman favor."

"I EARNED IT," SAYS PARDONED VOTE STEALER—PENDERGAST AIDE RECEIVES TRUMAN FAVOR

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 7.—"I think I earned it," was the only comment of Mrs. Frances Ryan regarding the Presidential pardon for vote frauds she was disclosed yesterday to have received "some time ago."

Mrs. Ryan bossed the old twelfth ward for the Pendergast machine in its heyday as the ruler of Kansas City politics. She was convicted of election frauds after a grand jury inquiry into the 1936 election and entered prison in 1939 with a 3-year sentence. She was paroled after serving 21 months.

POLITICAL RIGHTS RESTORED

The pardon, which came from President Truman on a date not yet ascertained, has the effect of restoring to Mrs. Ryan political rights she lost through her conviction. These include the right to vote, the right to hold public office, and the right to participate in elections as a worker.

Rumors that Mrs. Ryan had been the recipient of Presidential clemency have been current here for several months, and in the city election last March there were reports she was participating actively as a worker for the remnants of the shattered Pendergast machine. Mr. Truman was himself a protégé of this machine for 22 years.

Confirmation of the existence of the pardon came yesterday when Frank McCabe, chief assistant election commissioner, said Mrs. Ryan had presented the pardon to him and that he had thereupon restored her to the election rolls as a qualified voter. He did not say when this took place.

REFRAIN FROM COMMENT

City officials and persons active in politics refrained from commenting on the Presidential action, although there was speculation that he had apparently wasted little time after becoming President before erasing the blight of conviction from his former political coworker.

It was recalled that the United States circuit court of appeals used strong language in affirming her conviction, asserting she was the guiding spirit of the conspiracy and through bribery and intimidation organized, directed, and controlled the conspiracy from its inception.

In Washington, D. C., the White House had no comment today.

Commenting on this article, the Knoxville Journal, of Knoxville, Tenn., in an editorial by its editor, the Honorable Guy L. Smith, had this to say: "When is a thief not a thief? One answer appears to be 'When election is thing that is stolen.' "

WHEN IS A THIEF NOT A THIEF?—ONE ANSWER APPEARS TO BE "WHEN ELECTION IS THING THAT IS STOLEN"

It was revealed in Kansas City a few days ago that a certain Mrs. Frances Ryan, who under old Tom Pendergast was Democratic boss of the Twelfth Ward in that city until lodged in the penitentiary for violation of the election laws, had received from Mr. Truman a Presidential pardon, technically restoring to her all the rights and perquisites of citizenship in this fair land.

The United States circuit court of appeals, in confirming her conviction and sentence of 3 years, made this enlightening comment:

"A consideration of the testimony warranted the jury, we think, in believing that appellant (Mrs. Ryan), through bribery and intimidation, organized, directed, and controlled the conspiracy from its inception and was its guiding spirit.

"She not only participated in the conspiracy, but she was the arch conspirator, and dominated, guided, and controlled the election officers of this precinct."

To the average United States citizen, fortunately, stealing is stealing, whether one is talking about a watch or an election. Bribery and intimidation are no more respectable, when applied to elections, than they are in other fields of endeavor. An overwhelming majority of Americans believes a thief to be a thief, whether it's an election at stake or a sack of money.

To this majority, it would have appeared just as appropriate for the President of the United States to have issued a Presidential pardon to any two-bit thug ever paroled from any State penitentiary, or any chicken thief, as it was for this lofty gesture to have been extended by Mr. Truman to a Kansas City election thief. We believe that this view would have been that of most Presidents of the United States.

It could not have been Mr. Truman's, by any stretch of the imagination. As a working member of the Pendergast organization, he could have been ignorant of the fraud through which that corrupt machine maintained itself only if he could have established that he had only half sense. To him, therefore, the sacred character of the ballot must be only some sort of myth that one reads about in newspapers.

In addition, there may have been some feeling of personal friendship involved in the restoration of Mrs. Ryan's citizenship. It may be that her old twelfth-ward machine was instrumental in elevating Mr. Truman to a Jackson County judgeship in 1922, or to the presiding judgeship of the county court in 1926.

In addition to these perhaps personal considerations, of having been a member of the Pendergast organization and perhaps of having been supported by this proven election thief, it must also be kept in mind that the New Deal as established by Roosevelt and inherited by Truman has actually been built with one of its three pillars the wholesale corruption of the ballot box.

History will record that the New Deal was elected and maintained in office by a three-way combination of southern Democrats, labor politicians, and most important of all, big-city machines such as those fashioned by Tom Pendergast, of Kansas City, Ed Kelly, of Chicago, Frank Hague, of Newark, Ed Flynn, of the Bronx, and Ed Crump, of Memphis. To any of these gentlemen, the sacredness of the ballot could not be more than a hearty laugh, and Mr. Truman, as a prime beneficiary of their efforts, could scarcely regard the corruption of the ballot any more seriously than they, or than did Mr. Roosevelt.

Mrs. Ryan, therefore, may be simply an election thief to most of us, but so far as the President of the United States is concerned she is doubtless draped in the habiliments of one of the early Roosevelt martyrs.

In contrast with the sordid story of the notorious election thefts of the rottenest of all rotten political machines, the Tom Pendergast dynasty of Kansas City, I include the following editorial from the Nashville Tennessean:

The Carter County courthouse was filled at the beginning of this week as Judge D. A. Vines of the circuit court gravely addressed the new grand jury that will sit through the coming elections.

I have known Judge D. A. Vines for the past 40 years. He is a learned lawyer, a just, upright, and fearless judge.

After having called the attention of the grand jury to a political situation existing in Tennessee where through the power of a political machine, elections are controlled, Judge Vines said:

We here in this great hill section of East Tennessee trust that such conditions may forever be kept from our door.

The judge paused, and continued:

Gentlemen of the jury, it is the constitutional right of every man or woman of lawful age who has lawfully registered, paid the poll tax and qualified according to law, to vote for the candidate of his own choice—and I charge you that no one has a right to interfere with that right. No one has the right to stuff or change the ballot box, the vote that goes in by the voter should come out and be counted as he or she voted said vote.

In Carter County the names of the jurymen read like the passenger list of one of those ocean-daring packets that first brought sturdy and freedom-loving settlers from Scotland and Ireland and England to these shores. Those stalwarts never tolerated dominion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. REID F. MURRAY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the following article is from the July 6, 1946, edition of the Washington Times-Herald:

MODIFIED OPA LAW LIKELY

Best guess now is that modified OPA bill reported in Senate will pass; that Truman will sign it.

But prices will go up under it, some say as much as 20 percent.

Southerners in Congress will support bill this time since they got what they want for cotton and trust Agriculture Department to give them what they want for food items.

This article indicates the sectionalism which creeps into nearly all legislation presented by the present administration. Anyone who has followed the price-control legislation knows that this administration has carried on two OPA's. One is special privileges for the few; the second is little privilege for the many.

President Truman, when he gave his political speech vetoing the OPA bill, did not tell the American people that the Taft amendment did not give any American manufacturers or dealers any legislative advantages that had not already been accorded the cotton people.

The South does not believe in reciprocal trade agreements for themselves because they erected embargoes and other barriers to protect the products of the South but were and are eager to put them in operation for the products of the North.

In other words, they weakened the economic position of the northern products while they entered a shelter protected by the embargo and other trade barriers.

Most Americans have caught on to that one and will catch on to what the New Dealers are trying to do with the OPA legislation. They are following the same course they did with the Reciprocal Trade Treaties.

Secretary Byrnes' Report on Meeting of Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER F. GEORGE

OF GEORGIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the able address delivered by the Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, over the radio last night, reporting on meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers in Paris.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

After every great war the victors find the making of peace difficult and disappointing. It took the 13 American States more than 5 years after winning our independence to agree upon a constitution which promised anything like a durable peace among themselves.

To build world peace requires even greater tolerance, patience, and understanding. It requires the will and ability to seek the best, to accept the best obtainable, and then to make the best obtainable work.

As war breeds war, so peace can be made to breed peace.

That is why President Truman and I were determined at Potsdam last summer, 2 months after VE-day, to set up a Council of Foreign Ministers. We were eager to have the council start the making of peace and to make peace as quickly as possible wherever possible.

It was obvious, then, that the making of peace with Germany would take time. There was no German government to deal with, and no agreement as to how soon we should permit a German government to function. It was equally obvious that a start could be made toward making peace with Italy and the states which were satellites of the Axis. They had governments. So we started there.

The whole world knows how great the struggle has been during the last 10 months to harmonize the views of the great powers so as to make possible the presentation of tentative drafts of treaties to a peace conference. That struggle has now been brought to a successful conclusion and the Peace Conference has been called to meet in Paris on July 29.

It is my hope that the Council of Foreign Ministers will consider the recommendations and agree upon the final texts so that the treaties may be signed by the delegates before the conference adjourns.

The drafts of treaties agreed upon are not the best which human wit could devise. But they are the best which human wit could get the four principal allies to agree upon. They represent as satisfactory an approach to the return of peace as we could hope for in this imperfect and war-weary world.

The attitude of the United States in these matters represented not only the judgment of the President and the Secretary of State, but also the judgment of Senator CONNALLY and Senator VANDENBERG, whose long experience in our foreign relations and intimate knowledge of the specific issues made their counsel invaluable.

The greatest struggle was over the Italian treaty, and the greatest issue involved in that treaty was the fate of Trieste and adjacent territory along the western shore of the Istrian Peninsula. The American delegation, supported by the French and British, urged that Trieste and adjacent territory, which are predominantly Italian, should remain with Italy and the predominantly Slavic hinterland should go to Yugoslavia.

The Soviet Union argued strongly that Trieste and adjacent territory should not be cut off from its immediate hinterland. While it admitted that a few cities and towns along the coast were predominantly Italian, it argued that the Istrian Peninsula should be regarded as a whole and that so regarded it was predominantly Yugoslav. This view was also urged by Czechoslovakia.

The Soviet Union further urged that greater consideration should be given to the Yugoslav claims than to the Italian claims, because, while Italy as one of the Axis partners, was responsible for bringing on the war against the Allies and for the loss of thousands of Allied lives, Yugoslavia had fought on the Allied side throughout the war and had suffered from the attacks of Italy.

As neither the Soviets nor ourselves were prepared to yield, we then proposed that the issue be left to the peace conference but the Soviets would not agree.

This left us in a more serious dilmma than most people realized. We could make a separate peace with Italy, leaving her Trieste, but the Soviet and Yugoslav Governments and possibly others would not accept that treaty.

If we made a separate peace, the Soviet and Yugoslav Governments would undoubtedly demand that Italy make a separate peace with them, ceding Trieste to Yugoslavia. If Italy refused, it is not difficult to foresee the difficulties which would arise.

Even if no one of us presented a treaty to Italy, a disarmed Italy could hold Trieste against the army of Yugoslavia only so long as our troops held it for her.

In an effort to break this deadlock, the French informally suggested that Trieste and adjacent territory be separated from Italy but not ceded to Yugoslavia, and that its security and integrity be internationally guaranteed.

At first no one liked this proposal. But the more it was studied the more it seemed to offer a reasonable basis for agreement. It was recalled that before Italy entered World War I she had proposed that the Trieste area should become an autonomous state.

Our delegation insisted that the area should be protected by the United Nations and not by joint agreement between Italy and Yugoslavia as the Soviets proposed, and not by the four principal Allied Powers as suggested by the French. Our proposals were accepted.

The proposal as finally agreed upon leaves Gorizia and Montfalcone with Italy in the north and includes within the free territory of Trieste the rest of the area west of the agreed ethnic line.

It is true that the proposed free territory of Trieste is predominantly Italian in the city and predominantly Slav outside the city. But neither the Italians nor the Slavs in this territory are placed under alien rule. They are given home rule. The people will elect their own assembly and the assembly will elect the officials to administer the laws. They will be subject to supervision only by the United Nations Security Council and by an impartial governor appointed by the Security Council.

The prosperity and welfare of Trieste are linked not only with Italy but with Yugoslavia and the countries of central Europe. It is the natural outlet of central Europe to the Mediterranean. The only railroads entering Trieste come through Yugoslavia and are controlled by Yugoslavia. Representatives of that government asserted that if Trieste were given to Italy they would divert traffic to Fiume or some other port in Yugoslavia.

Because of the bad feeling between the two peoples in that area, the control by the United Nations may prove the best means of preventing armed conflict and relieving tension.

If the area were joined either with Italy or Yugoslavia its political and economic relations with the other would suffer. Its industries might be unable to attract the necessary capital, and labor might have difficulty finding employment.

If friendly relations are maintained between the free territory of Trieste and her neighbors, this little territory may enjoy greater prosperity and be a source of greater prosperity to its neighbors than would be the case if it were joined either with Italy or Yugoslavia.

I am convinced that the agreed solution to the problem of Trieste is fair and workable if the peoples most concerned work together to make it so. Unless they work together, there can be no solution. No final decision was reached on the disposition of the Italian colonies.

It will be recalled that originally the Soviets had requested the trusteeship of Tripolitania. They stated they wanted a base in the Mediterranean for their merchant ships. The French favored Italy as trusteeship for all the colonies, and at the April session the Soviets expressed their willingness to accept the French proposal.

Except for certain reservations in respect to Cyrenacia, the British were willing to accept our proposal to have all the colonies placed under the trusteeship of the United Nations.

In view of the difficulty the Foreign Ministers were having in reaching agreement and the danger of the colonial question becoming a pawn in the settlement of other issues, I suggested that we defer a final decision.

It was finally agreed that the ultimate disposition of the colonies should be made by the four principal Allied powers in light of the wishes and welfare of the inhabitants and world peace and security, taking into account the views of other interested governments.

If the four principal Allied powers do not agree upon the disposition to be made of the colonies within a year of the coming into force of the treaty, they have bound themselves to make such disposition of them as may be recommended by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

The four powers have further agreed to send commissions to the colonies to ascertain the wishes of the local population.

Pending the final disposition of the colonies, they will remain under the existing British military administration.

The thing I like about the agreement on the colonies is that the ultimate decision does not require unanimity. Failing agreement among the four powers, the decision rests with the United Nations.

The Soviets finally withdrew their objection to the cession of the Dodecanese to Greece and to the permanent demilitarization of the islands.

It was, however, extremely difficult for us to reach agreement on reparations. The Soviets wanted at least $100,000,000 reparations for the devastation of their territory by the Italian Armies.

Moreover, under the armistice agreements with Hungary, Rumania, and Finland reparations payments of three hundred million from each had been imposed. The Soviets found it difficult to reconcile themselves to a more lenient reparations policy in the case of Italy.

We on the other hand were more deeply conscious of the help that Italy gave us in the last months of the war and opposed putting on her a reparations burden which would delay her economic recovery.

We had previously agreed that reparations could be taken in war plants not needed for Italian peacetime economicy and could be paid out of Italian assets in Hungary, Rumania, and Bulgaria. But the Soviets insisted that part of the reparations should come from current or future production of Italian factories and shipyards.

We reluctantly agreed that the Soviets could receive reparations up to $100,000,000. But we required them to agree that insofar as reparations were taken from Italian production, the deliveries must be arranged so as to avoid interference with economic reconstruction.

We further required the Soviets to agree that such deliveries should not commence for 2 years. In order to avoid our having to finance Italy's purchase of raw materials to furnish manufactured products to the Soviets, we also required agreement that the imported materials needed by Italy to make these deliveries should be supplied by the Soviets.

There remain some questions in the Italian treaty and other treaties on which we were unable to reach final agreement. As the Soviet delegation took the position that they would not agree to the calling of the peace conference until the four governments had harmonized their views on fundamental questions, we assume that the Soviets do not regard these issues as fundamental and will accept the decisions of the peace conference.

I admit that prior to our meeting in April I had little hope we would ever reach agreement. After our April meeting I had less hope. Now the prospect for peace treaties with five countries is bright. Ninety days after ratification of those treaties occupation armies must be withdrawn except where they protect a line of communications. Then the people of the occupied states can live and breathe as free people. Truly we are on the road back to peace.

I have no desire to conceal from the American people the great struggle and tremendous difficulties the four governments had in harmonizing their views to the extent they did on these treaties. In the long run we shall have a much better chance to work out our problems if we and our allies recognize the basic differences in our ideas, standards, and methods, instead of trying to make ourselves believe that they do not exist or that they are less important than they really are.

While the Council made real progress toward peace with Italy and the former satellite states, it made no progress at all on the German and Austrian question. Perhaps the time taken in discussion was not wholly lost, because our experience suggests that understandings, particularly with our Soviet friends, cannot be reached until we have gone through rounds of verbal combat, in which old complaints are repeated, past positions, reaffirmed, differences accentuated and crises provoked.

I am ready to believe it is difficult for them to understand us, just as it is difficult for us to understand them. But I sometimes think our Soviet friends fear we would think them weak and soft if they agreed without a struggle on anything we wanted, even though they wanted it too. Constant struggle, however, is not always helpful in a world longing for peace.

The Soviets started the German discussion with a prepared statement on the draft treaty we had proposed to guarantee the continued demilitarization and disarmament of Germany for at least a quarter of a century. The Soviet statement reveals how hard-pressed the Soviets were to find real objection to a treaty which gives them the assurance that Germany should never again become a threat to their security or to the security of Europe.

I do not believe the Soviets fully realize the doubts and suspicions which they have raised in the minds of those in other countries who want to be their friends by the aloofness, coolness, and hostility with which they have received America's offer to guarantee jointly the continued disarmament of Germany.

Had America been a party to such a guaranty after World War I, World War II would never have occurred, and the Soviet Union would never have been attacked and devastated.

Is German militarism going to be used as a pawn in a struggle between the East and the West and is German militarism again to be given the chance to divide and conquer?

To that question there must be an unequivocal answer, for equivocation will increase unbearably the tensions and strains which men of good will everywhere are striving to relieve.

The Soviets stated our proposed treaty was inadequate; that it did not assure the denazification and democratization of Germany; that it did not assure them reparations. But these are political matters which are already dealth with in the Potsdam agreement.

Our military agreement of June 5, 1945, provided for the prompt disarmament of armed forces and demilitarization of war plants. By our 25-year treaty we propose that when Germany is once disarmed, we shall see that she stays disarmed. We cannot understand Soviet opposition, especially as Generalissimo Stalin on last December 24 agreed with me in principle on this subject.

The Soviet representative stated he had reports that in the British zone the disarming of military forces was not being carried out. The British representatives stated he had reports that in the Soviet zone German war plants were being operated.

We asked that the control commission investigate the accuracy of both reports. The British and the French agreed. But the Soviet Government would not agree to the investigation unless we limited it to the disarmament of armed forces.

I certainly made clear in our earlier meeting in Paris that the proposed guaranty of German demilitarization was only a part of the German settlement. I proposed then, and I proposed again at our recent meeting, that deputies be appointed to start work on the whole settlement which the Allies expect the Germans to accept. The British and French accepted the proposal. The Soviets rejected it.

The Soviets suggested we have a special session of the council on the German problem. I agreed and insisted on setting a date. But from my experience with the Italian and Balkan settlements I fear that until the Soviets are willing to have responsible deputies, who are in close touch with the foreign ministers, sit together continuously over a period of time and find just what is the area of our agreement and what is the area of our disagreement, the exchange of views between the ministers on the complicated problems of the German settlement will not be sufficient.

It is no secret that the four-power control of Germany on a zonal basis is not working well from the point of view of any of the four powers. Under the Potsdam agreement Germany was to be administered as an economic unit and central administrative departments were to be established for this purpose.

But in fact Germany is being administered in four closed compartments with the movement of people, trade, and ideas between the zones more narrowly restricted than between most independent countries.

In consequence, none of the zones is self-supporting. Our zone costs our taxpayers $200,000,000 a year. And despite the heavy financial burden being borne by ourselves and other occupying powers, the country is threatened with inflation and economic paralysis.

This condition must not continue. At Paris we proposed that the control commission be instructed to establish the central administration agencies necessary to administer Germany as an economic unit, and to arrange for the exchange of products between the zones and for a balanced program of imports and exports.

The French Government, which had previously opposed the establishment of central administrative agencies, indicated its willingness to accept our proposal when we suggested that the Saar be excluded from the jurisdiction of these agencies. The British agree.

But the Soviets said they could not agree to the exclusion of the Saar without further study and, therefore, no immediate progress was possible.

I made clear that the United States was unwilling to share responsibility for the economic paralysis and suffering we felt certain would follow a continuance of present conditions in Germany.

I then announced that as a last resort we were prepared to administer our zone in conjunction with any one or more of the other zones as an economic unit. I indicated that recently we had secured cooperation with the Soviet zone in one matter and with the British on another. I explained our offer was made not in an effort to divide Germany but to bring it together.

I stated that whatever arrangements were made with one government would be open on equal terms to the governments of the other zones at any time they were prepared to participate.

The British stated they would consider our proposal and indicated they hoped to agree. Neither the Soviets nor the French expressed any view.

Our military representative in Germany will this week be instructed to cooperate with any one or all of the three governments in essential administrative matters like finance, transportation, communication, trade, and industry. We will either secure economic cooperation between the zones or place the responsibility for the violation of the Potsdam agreement.

Finally we came to a discussion of the Austrian problem. On June 1 I had circulated a proposed draft treaty recognizing the independence of Austria and providing for the withdrawal of the occupying troops. The British also had submitted a draft for consideration. I asked that deputies be directed to prepare the treaty.

The Soviets submitted a counterproposal calling first for further action to insure the denazification of Austria and the removal of a large number of displaced persons from Austria whom they regard as unfriendly.

The British and French were willing to join us in submitting to the deputies the consideration of the treaty and in requesting the control council to investigate and report on the progress of denazification and on the problem of the displaced persons. But the Soviets were unwilling to agree to the deputies taking up the Austrian treaty until more tangible action was taken on these other two problems.

We recognize the seriousness of these problems and have been grappling with them. The problem of displaced persons is particularly difficult to solve, where they are willing to help them to return to their homes. But many refuse to return to their own countries because they fear death or imprisonment for their political views.

Our tradition of protecting political refugees is too precious for us to consent to the mass expulsion of these people from our zone. The United Nations has a committee studying the problem and we shall continue to do our part to try to find a solution, but it cannot be a cruel solution that will reflect discredit upon the American people.

It would be a tragedy to hold up the peace treaty with Austria because she is obliged to afford temporary refuge to these people until homes can be found for them in other countries.

We shall press on in session, and out of session, to restore conditions of peace to this war-sick world, to bring soldiers back to their homes and to their families, to beat our swords into ploughshares. The war has left wounds, but we must work to heal those wounds.

We do not believe in a peace based on a desire for vengeance. We believe in justice, charity, and mercy. If we act with charity and mercy, those we fear as enemies may become our friends. We must trust to the healing processes of peace and pray that God in His mercy will give peace to the world.

Award of Citations to 13 Carriers of Task Forces 38 and 58

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, at 12:30 p. m. today, at the White House, the President of the United States is awarding citations to 13 carriers of Task Forces 38 and 58.

Many of the officers who commanded these vessels, and the task forces of which these vessels were integral parts, will be present at the ceremony.

I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD pertinent parts of the Navy press release made with respect to these awards.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THIRTEEN CARRIERS OF TASK FORCES 38 AND 58 CITED FOR PACIFIC AIR-SEA OFFENSIVE OPERATIONS

Thirteen aircraft carriers which bore the brunt of the Pacific air-sea offensive as essential components of famed Task Forces 38 and 58 have been named to receive individual unit citations and commendations.

Eight of the thirteen—the U. S. S. Essex, U. S. S. Hornet, U. S. S. Lexington, U S. S. Bunker Hill, U. S. S. Yorktown, U. S. S. San Jacinto, U. S. S. Cabot and U. S. S. Belleau Wood—will receive the Presidential Unit Citation.

The Navy Unit Commendation will go to the U. S. S. Enterprise, U. S. S. Hancock, U. S. S. Wasp, U. S. S. Cowpens and U. S. S. Langley. The Enterprise previously was awarded the Presidential Unit Citation for her combat record in the early days of the war. She was the first capital ship so honored.

Citation of the 13 carriers reveals the part played by carrier-based aviation in starting the first offensive action against the Japanese less than 2 months after Pearl Harbor and in bringing about the final defeat of the enemy. Statistics released for the first time show the full extent of damage inflicted by ship-based air power on the Japanese Navy and merchant fleet, and its part in spearheading amphibious attacks and furnishing close support for ground troops.

The figures show the 13 flattops—of the total of 29 large and medium carriers to see Pacific action—staged 56 percent of all carrier-based action sorties of the war. (Action sorties are flights on which actual contact was made with the enemy.)

Carrier-based planes recorded a total of 147,094 action sorties during the war. Navy carrier pilots destroyed in aerial combat 4,487 enemy fighter planes and 1,997 bombers for a total of 6,484. Only 452 carrier-based planes were lost in aerial combat for a ratio of better than 7 to 1 over the enemy in air action. In addition, 1,428 carrier planes were lost to enemy antiaircraft guns.

During the war, carrier planes dropped 91,318,000, or 45,659 tons, of bombs and depth charges on targets, and expended 182,569 rockets against the enemy.

The results of their precision bombing on shipping is shown by the fact that carrier planes sank 21 percent of all Japanese ships lost in the Pacific. This includes 281 merchant ships of 1,000 tons or greater totalling 1,326,698 tons, and 170 warships totalling 747,268 tons. The figures do not include ships damaged, or the thousands of small cargo vessels, sampans, fishing boats, barges, corvettes, gunboats and other vessels of less than 1,000 tons that were sunk.

The extreme contrast in carrier strength was found between the first raid of the war against the Marshall and Gilbert Islands on February 1, 1942, and the 3-month Okinawa campaign in 1945. In the former, two carriers carried out 165 action sorties, destroyed 34 Japanese planes in the air, lost 7 planes to enemy antiaircraft batteries and 5 to aircraft, and dropped 129 tons of bombs on targets. Three years later at Okinawa, 50 carriers, including 28 jeep carriers, staged 40,157 action sorties, destroyed 1,692 planes in the air and 824 on the ground, lost 305 planes to antiaircraft guns and 59 to enemy aircraft, and dropped 12,888 tons of bombs on targets.

The superiority of Navy planes and pilots to the enemy is reflected through the compilations. The ratio of planes destroyed in comparison to losses rose from 4-to-1 in the first Marshall and Gilbert Island raids to a high of 55-to-1 in the Mindoro campaign, and assumed an average of 26-to-1 over the last 5 months of the war.

The knockout of Japan's air power in the last 5 months of the war opened the way for greater devastations by heavy bombers. Navy carrier planes destroyed 3,739 enemy planes, including 1,926 on the ground in Empire Islands and 1,813 in the air over Japan, for an average of almost 25 planes a day for the 5-month period.

The development of the American fast carrier task force in World War II followed an historical pattern in which new weapons through history have altered traditional concepts of naval warfare. In World War I the submarine introduced a second dimension, undersea warfare, and tactics had to be revised accordingly. With the adaptation of the airplane to military uses all previous formulas for control of the sea went overboard as control of the air became a new factor in naval warfare.

Strategy and tactics of the carrier task force gradually grew up through experimentation and studies of previous conflicts. At first, carrier actions were carried out with only one or two carriers, frequently because more were not available. In the first raids on the Marshall and Gilbert Islands, the carrier force under the command of Fleet Admiral William F. Halsey, Jr., United States Navy, comprised two flattops, the old U. S. S. Yorktown and the U. S. S. Enterprise. Then followed raids against Rabaul, Wake, Marcus, Salamaua, and Lae, and the attack on Tokyo when Army B–25 bombers took off from the old U. S. S. Hornet. All were unpretentious in scale, with not more than two carriers participating in any raid.

The early raids, however, revealed the potentialities of ship-borne air strikes and revealed the limitations of our task force organization at that time. They proved to be experiments that led to the future development of the fast carrier task forces as the greatest military power in naval history, and immediately put us on the offensive in enemy waters during the first few months of the war.

Outstanding among the early raids in the development of carrier task force strategy and tactics was the attack at Lae and Salamaua, New Guinea, on March 10, 1942. This was the first phase in the evolution of the modern task force. A unique feature was that the attacking aircraft had to fly over the Owen-Stanley range of mountains to reach their objective. This prevented a series of consecutive strikes. Since the damage had to be done in one blow a powerful air striking power was needed. This was provided by the old carriers Lexington and Yorktown, protected by a screen of 4 cruisers and 10 destroyers—at that time the most effective carrier force which had ever been assembled within the American Navy. The results were doubly effective. Heavy damage was inflicted upon the enemy, and the striking power of 2 carriers maneuvering together was demonstrated.

Another unprecedented step in carrier warfare was taken in the Battle of Coral Sea. The immediate strategical results were tremendous—the southern advance of the enemy was stopped and Australia was saved from invasion—but the effect upon naval warfare went far beyond this consideration. It was the first decisive engagement in the history of the world in which carriers played the principal roles and opposing surface ships did not fire a shot or get within sight of each other. As a revolutionary influence upon the science of naval warfare, the Battle of Coral Sea has been called the most important engagement fought by the Navy since the engagement between the Merrimac and the Monitor.

Valuable lessons in the tactical handling of carriers also were learned, including the doctrine that each carrier in an engagement should have its own screening vessels for protection.

On the other hand, the lessons in tactics and strategy were costly. The old Lexington was lost at Coral Sea and the Yorktown was badly damaged. The enemy, though, was learning its carrier lessons at greater cost; losing one at Coral Sea and four at Midway.

The Battle of Midway, the turning point of the war, switched the Japanese from offensive to defensive warfare and started the American offensive. Although its immediate effect was to stop the enemy occupation thrust, Midway set a pattern for naval engagements fought by carrier-borne planes. It was a contest of air power, and as such confirmed the principle established in the Coral Sea battle that carrier aircraft were the decisive factor in the control of the sea.

During the 3 days of the battle at Midway 3 carriers, the former Yorktown, the old Hornet, and the Enterprise, sent 374 aircraft into the air on action sorties. They dropped 100 tons of bombs on enemy ships and shot down 69 planes in aerial combat. Navy losses were 41 planes in aerial combat and 20 planes to enemy antiaircraft guns. The Japanese lost an additional 140 planes on carriers that were sunk. The previously damaged Yorktown was sunk.

With the first amphibious attempts at Guadalcanal in the summer of 1942, the problem of the tactical organization of the carrier task force again became vital. The loss of the Lexington and Yorktown left four Navy carriers in the Pacific—the Saratoga, Enterprise, Wasp, and Hornet. Instead of being operated together or in pairs within a single formation, an idea still in the nebulous stage, the four carriers became flagships of individual task forces in the South Pacific which steamed within visual distance of one another as a means of attempting air coordination.

Carriers provided air cover for the landing on Guadalcanal and the entire Solomons campaign, which lasted from August 7, 1942, to February 4, 1943. During this period carrier planes participated in 1,162 action sorties and dropped 285 tons of bombs on enemy targets. They also shot 200 enemy planes out of the air, while losing only 43, a ratio of almost 5 to 1, and destroyed another 51 Japanese planes on the ground. Only 7 planes were lost to antiaircraft guns. The Wasp was destroyed after being badly damaged by enemy torpedoes, during the Guadalcanal support operation, and the Hornet was sunk in the Battle of Santa Cruz Islands.

The losses in the Guadalcanal campaign, however, temporarily arrested the development of the fast carrier task force until the summer and autumn of 1943. At that time the new carriers of the Essex and Independence classes began arriving in the Pacific. They included the Essex, the new Yorktown, the new Lexington, the Independence, Belleau Wood, and Cowpens. On August 31 the first dress rehearsal for future carrier operations took place at Marcus Island when a task force built around the Essex, Yorktown, and Independence struck that Japanese outpost for the second time during the war. On September 1, in a concurrent operation, the Princeton and Belleau Wood covered the unopposed landing on Baker Island, and, with the new Lexington, raided Tarawa, in the Gilbert Islands, 18 days later.

The largest carrier task force yet assembled, composed of the seven new carriers, attacked Wake Island on October 5 and 6, 1943, in a test of revised air and surface tactics. Later the great carrier attacks on Rabaul on November 5 and 11, 1943, illustrated the efficiency of coordinated tactics. These raids proved that carriers could be maneuvered together in cruising dispositions characterized by flexibility and simplicity, and that the result was a combined air group of powerful offensive and defensive proportions. In the middle of November 1943 the four-group fast carrier task force appeared for the first time in the Gilbert Islands campaign.

The seizure of Tarawa, Makin, and Apamama established the fast carrier force as an essential component in amphibious operations. The history of the Central Pacific advance to Okinawa and the Japanese Empire reveals that no penetration was made into hostile waters without carrier air power to cover amphibious units by striking and nullifying the enemy's air and surface forces. Carrier aircraft also provided invaluable support for ground troops of the Army and Marine Corps.

The campaign for the Gilbert Islands, the first battle test of the modern fast carrier task force, was carried out by Task Force 50, under the command of Rear Adm. Charles A. Pownall, United States Navy. It was comprised of six large and five medium carriers. This force later became known alternately as Task Force 58 and Task Force 38 under the command of Admiral (then vice admiral) Marc A. Mitscher, United States Navy, and the late Vice Adm. John S. McCain, United States Navy.

The operations of Task Force 50 in the Gilbert Islands area again demonstrated the ancient principle that overwhelming force is the key to victory. Despite the fact that the task force was compelled to remain in a restricted area for many days within easy striking distance of enemy shore-based planes, it was able to deny the adjacent seas to the Japanese Fleet and reduce air opposition to scattered nuisance raids from bases in the Marshall Islands.

Rear Admiral Pownall stationed his four groups of multiple-carrier formations at strategic points and blanketed the Gilbert atolls with aircraft. The Independence and the new Lexington were damaged by aerial torpedoes, but a repeat of the heavy casualties of the Guadalcanal campaign, where the Hornet and Wasp were lost and the Saratoga and Enterprise damaged, was avoided. The fast carrier task force emerged from the Gilbert Islands campaign as a powerful, mobile fleet of such offensive and defensive strength that the Japanese were unable to oppose it with the orthodox weapons of warfare.

In the conquest of the Marshall Islands, Task Force 58 required only 1 day to destroy every enemy plane east of Eniwetok. Campaign action sorties, which previously had ranged in the hundreds, were now well up in the thousands. Damage was proportionately high. During the Marshalls campaign, from January 30 to February 23, 1944, Task Force 58 flew 7,387 action sorties, dropped 2,261 tons of bombs, and destroyed 189 Japanese planes in the air and 260 on the ground, while losing only 7 planes in aerial combat, a 27-to-1 ratio, and 31 planes to antiaircraft fire.

After the occupation of the Marshall Islands, Task Force 58 provided the air cover for General MacArthur's troop landing at Hollandia and began clearing the way to Tokyo by pummeling the formidable Japanese strongholds of Truk, Saipan, Tinian, Palau, Yap, Woleai, Marcus, Wake, and the Volcano and Bonin Islands. With the sudden growth in the number of baby flat tops, or "jeep" carriers, the duties of providing close air support for ground troops began falling to the smaller and slower carriers. This gave the fast carrier task forces more freedom to roam and to carry out the strategic missions of reducing Japan's inner bastions and the enemy homeland by destroying remote enemy forces intended for reinforcement.

With the exception of the Okinawa campaign, the fast carrier task forces did the most damage during the Marianas campaign, which included the famous "Marianas turkey shoot" and the Battle of the Philippine Sea, where two Japanese carriers were sunk. Eight large carriers, the Essex, Hornet, Yorktown, Lexington, Franklin, Bunker Hill, Wasp, and Enterprise, and 8 medium carriers, the Bataan, Cabot, Cowpens, Belleau Wood, Monterey, Princeton, San Jacinto, and Langley, operated with 7 new battleships, 13 cruisers, and 58 destroyers. This force provided an air fleet of 900 planes.

During the landing operations on Saipan, Tinian, and Guam, Task Force 58 was supplemented by 12 "jeep" carriers which performed the necessary tasks of service and support for ground troops.

During the entire Marianas campaign, from June 11 to August 8, 1944, 22,432 action sorties were flown by carrier planes which destroyed 917 planes in the air and 306 on the ground and dropped 7,090 tons of bombs on enemy targets. A total of 203 planes were lost to antiaircraft guns, and 65 were downed by enemy aircraft. This operation, which resulted in the capture of the Japanese islands of Saipan and Tinian and the recapture of Guam, established the springboard for the heavy bomber attacks on Iwo Jima and the B–29 strikes at the Japanese home islands. The major portion of all B–29 raids on the Japanese Empire, including the two atomic bombings, were staged from the Marianas Island bases.

Operations against the western Carolines—Peleliu, Anguar, Ngesebus, and Ulithi—from August to October 1944, were aimed at establishing an unbroken line between forces in the South Pacific and those now well established in the central Pacific. The operations were deliberately undertaken to create an opportunity to engage the enemy fleet and to gain and maintain control of the eastern sea approaches to the Philippine-Formosa-China coast areas. For them, the fast carrier striking force was designated Task Force 38. It was comprised of 8 large carriers, the Wasp, Hornet, Bunker Hill, Intrepid, Essex, Enterprise, Lexington, and Franklin, and 8 medium carriers, the Cowpens, Monterey, Cabot, Independence, Langley, Princeton, San Jacinto, and Belleau Wood; 19 escort carriers helped support the landing and service forces. The result showed 12,653 action sorties, in which 527 planes were destroyed on the ground and 372 in the air, and 3,980 tons of bombs were dropped on enemy targets. We lost 65 planes to antiaircraft fire, and 13 in aerial combat, and outshot the Japanese in the air about 29 to 1.

The last year of the war was a period of experimentation in carrier warfare and in new methods of defense against Kamikaze attacks. It also was the period of the greatest carrier trials and triumphs. During the battle of Leyte Gulf, October 24–26, 1944, the Japanese made their first deliberate use of suicide pilots, and thereafter sent special attack corps on extravagant missions to immobilize the fast carrier task forces. The missions failed to sink a large or medium carrier, but compelled certain revisions in carrier tactics.

With the nearest Allied base more than 500 miles distant, the task of establishing initial control of the air over Leyte for the landing of General MacArthur's troops fell to Task Force 38 under Admiral Mitscher. The establishment of this control required the destruction of large numbers of enemy aircraft in the Philippines and the neutralization of surrounding bases through which reinforcing aircraft from the Empire would pass. It was, therefore, necessary that Task Force 38 penetrate the enemy's inner ring of defense.

Carrier plane raids began 10 days before D-day on Leyte, striking as far north as Okinawa. The task force was divided into four groups and comprised a total strength of 9 large carriers (Bunker Hill, Enterprise, Essex, Franklin, Hancock, Hornet, Intrepid, Lexington, and Wasp), 8 medium carriers (Belleau Wood, Cabot, Cowpens, Independence, Langley, Monterey, Princeton, and San Jacinto), 6 battleships, 14 cruisers, and 57 destroyers. Supporting the landing operations were an additional 18 "jeep" carriers.

The Battle of Leyte Gulf was the ultimate in the development of carrier warfare. With the opposing fleets entirely out of sight and range of each other, one was able to wreak devastating destruction on the other by air power alone. The situation was entirely against the Japanese as the following summary of ships sunk by United States carrier planes alone indicates: one large carrier, two light carriers, one battleship, four heavy cruisers, one light cruiser, and three destroyers. Damaged were: four light cruisers, one of which later was sunk by our cruisers, and another by our submarines, two battleships, one heavy cruiser, and four destroyers, one of which later was sunk by our cruisers. Only two ships, a cruiser and a destroyer, escaped without damage.

The medium carrier Princeton, hit by a Japanese bomb, was abandoned and sunk by United States forces when fires on her got out of control. She was the first and only Independence-class carrier sunk during the war, and first of the larger classes lost in 2 years of war. Two "jeep" carriers also were lost during the Leyte campaign, the Gambier Bay by enemy shell fire, and the St. Lo by a Japanese suicide plane.

At the end of the sixth day after the landing it appeared that the stragetic air support mission for Army ground troops was almost completed. Delays in airfield development, however, prevented land-based planes from performing their task without help from the carrier planes, which remained in direct support until November 25, 1944—36 days after the initial landing had been made. Vice Admiral McCain assumed command of Task Force 38 on October 30, 1944.

During the entire Leyte campaign from October 10 to November 25, 1944, 15,327 action sorties were flown, 44,853 tons of bombs were dropped on enemy targets, 1,460 enemy planes were destroyed in the air and 1,160 on the ground. Navy losses were 248 planes to antiaircraft guns and 85 in aerial combat, a ratio of better than 17 to 1 in the air.

To establish air bases within supporting distance of future operations on Luzon, the occupation of Mindoro Island was ordered. Task Force 38 supplied air support for the operation by neutralizing 100 airfields on Luzon with flights from seven large and six medium carriers. Six "jeep" carriers provided direct support of the landing force as part of the Seventh Fleet. A total of 2,062 action sorties were flown; 333 tons of bombs were dropped; 23 planes were destroyed on the ground, and 111 in the air. The losses were 28 to antiaircraft batteries and 2 in aerial combat, a ratio in combat of 55 to 1.

The invasion of Luzon was the largest operation carried out in the Pacific up to that time. Task Force 38, which had been in almost continuous action since October 10, underwent minor repairs at Ulithi and made preparations for another extensive period of operation. As part of Fleet Admiral Halsey's Third Fleet, Task Force 38, under Vice Admiral McCain, was organized into three carrier task groups, one night carrier task group and a service group for the Luzon campaign. Comprising the day task groups were 7 large carriers, the Essex, Hancock, Hornet, Lexington, Ticonderoga, Wasp, and Yorktown, 4 medium carriers, the Cabot, Cowpens, Langley, and San Jacinto, 6 battleships, 13 cruisers, and 48 destroyers. The night group was composed of the Enterprise, the Independence, and 6 destroyers. The service group had 7 "jeep" carriers, 9 destroyers, 18 destroyer escorts, and 25 oilers.

The fighter plane complement of the large carriers had been increased considerably to provide greater protection from the kamikaze attacks and to increase their striking power by using fighter planes as bombers, or fighter-bombers.

For the first time since December 4, 1941, when the Saratoga delivered 12 Wildcat fighter planes piloted by Marine Corps flyers for the historic defense of Wake Island, Marine fighter squadrons were aboard a carrier. Two Marine squadrons equipped with Corsair fighters joined the Essex to operate with the fast carrier task forces. Later, Marine squadrons also boarded the Bunker Hill, Bennington, Franklin, and Wasp.

Task Force 38 carried our preinvasion strikes against airfields on Luzon and Formosa, and on the night of January 9–10 made a high-speed passage between the narrow straits of Luzon and Formosa into the China Sea to stage a surprise raid on shipping along the Indochina coast. In 1 day, January 12, devastating results were produced. Convoys caught at sea were wiped out and harbor shipping was bombed and strafed with excellent results. Forty ships were sunk, representing 127,000 tons, and an additional 22 ships, totaling 70,000 tons, were damaged.

For the entire period of the Lingayen campaign, including the China Sea exploits, Task Force 38 staged 8,637 action sorties, dropped 2,308 tons of bombs on targets, destroyed 474 planes on the ground and 243 in the air, while losing 108 planes to enemy antiaircraft guns and 10 in air combat.

The 21-day Iwo Jima campaign was the shortest in duration in many months for the fast carrier forces, again under Admiral Mitscher, but involved 2 days of bombardment of Tokyo itself, one before and one after the Iwo Jima landing.

Eleven large carriers, the Bennington, Bunker Hill, Enterprise, Essex, Hancock, Hornet, Lexington, Randolph, Saratoga, Wasp, and Yorktown, 5 medium carriers, the Belleau Wood, Cabot, Cowpens, Langley, and San Jacinto, 8 battleships, 17 cruisers, and 81 destroyers made up the largest striking force yet assembled. The carriers, with increased fighter complements, carried more than 1,200 planes. Twelve "jeep" carriers also were used to furnish air support of the ground troops.

In strikes against Japan and in support of Marine troops who made the Iwo Jima landing, 8,091 action sorties were flown, 1,691 tons of bombs were dropped, 275 enemy planes were destroyed on the ground and 437 in the air. The losses were 77 planes to antiaircraft fire and 40 to enemy aircraft.

The Okinawa operation officially began on March 18, 1945, with strikes against Kyushu as part of the plan to neutralize all airfields in the Ryukyus. The first day's scoreboard showed 102 enemy planes shot out of the air by carrier planes and another 275 destroyed or damaged on the ground. The second day's strike against Kobe and Kure added 97 planes destroyed in the air and 225 additional planes destroyed or damaged on the ground.

Ten large and six medium carriers of Task Force 58 covered the landing with 20 "jeep" carriers. Opposition was light until April 6, when more than 400 suicide planes surged down the Ryukyu chain. At Okinawa and over the task force, carrier-based fighters shot down 236 planes that day, with losses of only 2 planes. Task Force 58 ships "splashed" an additional 13 planes, escort carrier fighters added 55 enemy planes, and antiaircraft fire from ships at Okinawa accounted for 35 more.

Up to June 22, when Okinawa was declared secure, a total of 14 large carriers, the Bennington, Bunker Hill, Enterprise, Essex, Franklin, Hancock, Hornet, Intrepid, Randolph, Shangri-la, Ticonderoga, Wasp, Yorktown, and Lexington, all 8 of the Independence-class carriers and 28 "jeep" carriers participated in the Okinawa action. They flew a total of 40,157 action sorties, dropped 12,888 tons of bombs, and destroyed 1,692 planes in the air and 824 on the ground, while losing 305 planes to antiaircraft guns and 59 to enemy aircraft.

Ten large carriers, including the new Bon Homme Richard, took part in additional assaults during the last 2 months of the war. They flew 12,153 action sorties, dropping 4,382 tons of bombs and destroying 1,102 planes on the ground and an additional 121 in the air, while losing 186 planes to antiaircraft batteries and 11 to enemy aircraft.

During the last 5 months of war, carrier planes flew a total of 52,310 action sorties to annihilate what was left of Japanese military aviation. They destroyed 3,739 enemy planes, 1,926 on the ground and 1,813 in the air, with losses of only 70 planes in the air, a ratio of 26 to 1.

NOTE.—It should be noted that ship reports tabulated all shipping destroyed, while over-all war records contain sinkings of ships of 1,000 tons or more. Thus, it will be found that each ship's claims as stated here will be at a wide variance with the number and tonnage of ships of 1,000 tons or more listed as sunk.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, May 28, 1946

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JOHN THOMAS, late a Senator from the State of Idaho

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, Senator JOHN THOMAS, of Idaho, who passed away on November 10, 1945, at his home in Washington and now rests in a garden spot which has been reclaimed from a desert condition by the enterprise of American pioneers, was identified with the major interests of his State for nearly 40 years during which time many trusts were reposed in him by his fellow citizens.

Coming to Idaho as a young man qualified to teach school, he devoted the remainder of his life to business interests and to his service in the Senate. He was a farmer and stock raiser and entered into various activities of a business nature in his home town of Gooding, the most important being the management of a strong banking institution. His position was that of the leading citizen of his county engaged in all activities which increased its wealth and promoted its culture.

Senator THOMAS' interest in public affairs was doubtless lifelong and it was not many years after his arrival in Idaho until he attained the topmost position in the councils of his party, the Republican Party, which was generally predominant in Idaho during the first 30 years of this century. He was not ambitious for political office for himself but as head of the party organization for several years was largely responsible for its policies and to a considerable extent for the personnel in the offices of the State. In 1927, on the death of Senator Gooding, he was by general consent designated as United States Senator to which office he was duly elected in 1928.

The political overturn of 1932 brought about Senator THOMAS' retirement. In view of his age and the 7 years that elapsed while he was in retirement, it is an impressive sign of the strength of Senator THOMAS that no one had arrived during that period to fill the high position he had held in his party in State and Nation and that he was summoned back to be Senator when Senator William E. Borah died in January 1940. In spite of the fact that the State was now in the Democratic column generally, Senator THOMAS was reelected in 1942 and 1944. If I was the person fated to be left behind by the potent Senator, I could at least console myself with the thought that my successful opponent was so able and distinguished a man.

I did not meet Senator THOMAS personally until I came to the Senate. I recall, however, campaigning in his county and upon one occasion introducing myself to a man wearing the overalls which are so common on the streets of Idaho country towns. The man responded courteously to my approach, but replied, "Well, TAYLOR, you may be all right as far as I know, but I have worked for JOHN THOMAS for years, and I am voting for him." Something in the tone of the man revealed a warmth of feeling which I attributed to a long course of square dealing in his business and neighborly relations on the part of the Senator. I could not hope for much where he was best known.

When I first came to the Senate I valued the kindness and courtesy with which Senator THOMAS received me and introduced me around. To my deep regret Senator THOMAS' health which had been failing for many months soon became so impaired that he was not able to attend the sessions of the Senate. Accordingly, I missed the benefit of the wise counsels which had so endeared him to his colleagues of many years. Though he seldom spoke on the floor, the universal testimony of those who served with him was that he was a tower of strength and dependability in the halls and committee rooms as he had been for many years in the political and business life of his home State. He was active on several of the most important standing committees of the Senate, namely, Banking and Currency, Finance, Military Affairs, Irrigation and Reclamation, and Public Lands and Surveys, and thus exerted tremendous influence on major legislation.

We do honor to Senator THOMAS not only as a man of simple and upright life, faithful in business, who was chosen by his fellow citizens to stand before kings but also as a typical representative of a generation of men who went west, or farther west, in youth or early manhood to develop business and industry, modern homes and schools, and to build the political institutions of a young and undeveloped State. These were not men consumed by ambition to live by public office; they sought only the satisfaction of seeing prosperous happy communities rise where formerly were mere Indian trails through the deserts and mountains. They built soundly. Here and there one, by reason of his preeminence, was selected by his fellow citizens to execute the laws of the State or to represent them in the national councils. Senator THOMAS by the nearly unanimous call of his party and the repeatedly expressed approval of the voters as a body, was one of these. His body now rests in the heart of his State near that of his friend, former Governor and United States Senator Frank R. Gooding. Well may he rest from his labors and his State confer upon him the commendation, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Price Control and Free Enterprise

REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD A. KELLY
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. KELLY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, last week, steaks and pork chops on the hoof thronged into the Nation's stockyards in numbers exceeding week-end expectations and, in many cases, setting records for the year.

Arrivals of cattle and hogs at the Chicago stockyards totaled 47,500, the largest number since last November and the record for any July day since 1934.

Markets where people had to wait in line for meat are once again looking like the markets of old, with meat starting to fill up empty cases and counters with an abundance for all—and this meat is not black-market meat.

Mr. Speaker, I was one who voted to override the veto of President Truman on the OPA bill.

Because of having knowledge of the slaughter of livestock, the OPA has been more responsible for the black-market operations of the packing business than any other group in America.

When the order 75.7 was issued on April 28, 1946, placing all registered slaughterers under quotas of 80 percent of the 1944 kill, they practically extended their confidence in black-market operations.

I know many cases where this order closed down slaughterhouses, not because of livestock not coming to market, but because the OPA, under this order 75.7, refused to allow livestock to be slaughtered.

Under this order, many packers met their quota as early as June 11, resulting in a close-down of their plants from June 11 until the end of the month.

As a specific example, I cite one telegram which I received from a Chicago packer under date of June 19 and I quote:

> Have today wired the Department of Agriculture as follows: Our June hog quota exhausted and we are closed. Estimate that closing will cost us $10,000 per week. Our June quota already completely slaughtered was 2,700,000 pounds. We need additional quota for June of 1,125,000 to avoid lay-offs and operating loss. We can get hogs in quantity at OPA prices. Announced purpose of quota order was to channel livestock to legitimate packers. Order has had opposite effect in our case. We are federally inspected in full compliance with set-aside and all regulations. Hogs we would kill if we had quota are being diverted to nonfederally inspected houses not subject to set-aside. Our customers scoff at explanation that quota has closed us, in view of announced administration policy to keep all legitimate business in full production. Request immediate wire collect giving us additional June quota 1,125,000 pounds hogs.

I called Mr. Porter about this situation, citing this particular case as an example and stating this order was not workable, but he informed me nothing would be done.

When I called his attention to the layoff of employees, he said, "I can't help that."

I then contacted the Department of Agriculture, where men have more knowledge of this industry, and immediately an extra quota of hogs was given these packers, in order to keep them in operation for the balance of the month.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, all necessary restrictions of food should be placed under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture, where it belongs, where men are qualified and capable of handling this situation, and not under the supervision of unscrupulous individuals such as you find on the pay rolls of the OPA, whose only experience has been that of public-welfare workers and the like, who know nothing about business, have never seen a loss or profit statement of a businessman and would not know what one looked like if they did see it.

I, like many more in this Chamber, believe in price control over many items that must be controlled until a safe economy is established, but let us not destroy free enterprise in America, and that is what the OPA has been doing.

I cite another specific case.

A few Saturdays ago, I happened to be in a gentlemen's furnishing establishment.

The proprietor called my attention to the two-piece undergarments for men, showing me the listed price of $1.25 per garment, marked with the OPA labels.

He also showed me a change order in their price, reducing it to $1.05 per garment.

He told me he had taken this matter up with the manufacturer of these garments, in order that some adjustment might be made, where he would not absorb the loss of 20 cents per garment.

The manufacturer informed him that they would have to close down, because they could not afford to manufacture these garments at a cost where they would retail at $1.05 per garment, thus closing down an industry and throwing thousands of employees out of work.

These are some of the many cases of the inequities practiced by the OPA and no consideration is ever granted the people who become victims of this practice.

That is why I supported the Wolcott and Wadsworth amendments.

I believe in free enterprise in America—for America came a long way since its early beginning—and I am not going to be a party to destroying that principle.

We must make a start sometime back to our peacetime basis, unless we wish to continue and build up the regimentation and controls which were necessary during the war, but which are certainly not a part of our normal American way of life.

If these controls are lifted in a commonsense way—if manufacturer, producer, merchant, and consumer do their share and cooperate at this time of transition in the interest of all—we shall hasten the return to our system of free enterprise.

If only in their own interest, the producer, the manufacturer, and the merchant with any foresight will not overcharge and thus automatically summon the return of price control, again handicapping themselves by restrictions and regulations which were part of the all-out war effort, but which, now that the national emergency has passed, should also pass out of the picture if free enterprise is to be restored in America.

If the buying public will boycott the racketeer, the individual who tries to take advantage of this period we must go through in order to reach our goal, we shall speed the return of the day when our tested and proved system of supply and demand takes care of the situation.

There is, however, one other very important issue involved in this whole matter, and that is rents.

I have met many people who say that the OPA should be discontinued in connection with everything but rents, and here seems to be the real controversial question.

We all know that the rent question involves individual problems.

Landlords were frozen to depression rentals; they were never given a chance for adjustments of any kind.

We are all familiar with the increased costs of fuel, decorating, labor, and all overhead expenses, and if the OPA used common sense and made a slight adjustment whereby a landlord could get a break to meet his added costs—say about 10 percent—I do not think anyone would object to it.

I know that in Chicago taxes on real estate have been increased more than they should, many people owning buildings have burdensome mortgages to meet—and we must take all of these matters into consideration and not just be one-sided.

There are people, however, who think that a man in business, or who owns a building which he rents to a tenant, is burdened with wealth.

But I know people in business who are heavily indebted to banks for loans made to meet obligations in order to carry on and give employment to people.

I am looking at this matter in fairness to all.

A man in public office today, however, has a difficult task, no matter how fairly he may try to deal with all sides of a question.

He must follow the policy he judges best for his country, but he must at the same time recognize the force of popular feeling.

Popular feeling is often misguided and confused by cleverly organized, false propaganda, deliberately taking advantage, of course, of those who are misinformed concerning the real facts in the case and the issues involved.

Popular feeling, therefore, can be very unsound; yet it cannot be disregarded.

I have given these facts as they exist.

The true American, whose sincere interest rests in the perpetuation of American ideals and principles, will weigh all sides of this question.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, since the discontinuance of the Office of Price Administration, there appears to have been no panic among the American people as was predicted by the proponents of OPA. There has been no panic among the consumers of the Nation and neither was there any run-away inflation by merchants of practically all commodities. It is simply amazing at the calmness and stability shown by the American people during this period when certain forces apparently failed in their efforts to create a panic. The New York Sun had caused to be made a survey among retail markets showing the comparison between ceiling prices and current prices.

Under leave, I submit a published survey of prices, both ceiling prices, black-market, and present price range, as of last week:

BOX SCORE OF CITY'S FOOD PRICES

The supply of meat in the hands of wholesalers here today was larger than on any Friday in recent months, according to Clyde F. House, market analyst for the Department of Agriculture. The retail supply continued to show gradual improvement, with prices in most stores holding steady about midway between the old OPA ceilings and the black-market prices which prevailed before controls were lifted. Butter was more plentiful, with some stores reducing prices slightly, and chickens, fruits, and vegetables were plentiful at or near the former OPA ceiling prices.

A survey of retail markets showed the following comparison between current prices, the old OPA ceilings, and black-market prices:

	OPA price range	Black-market price range	Present price range	Present supply

Commencement Day Address by Secretary Forrestal at Williams College

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address delivered by the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. James Forrestal, at the commencement exercises at Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., on June 16, 1946.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Today I should like to talk to you a little about Williams as a symbol of the American scene and the American system and what is involved in keeping that system a vital and dynamic force for the world of the future in which you will live and act.

Williams College is one of those liberal arts colleges of moderate size which are essential foundation stones to American culture. The larger endowed universities and the great State institutions provide a diversity of graduate training which is necessary for professional life. But without colleges such as Williams, colleges relatively small in size but wide in their influence, American education would lose an important leavening force.

The privately endowed colleges and universities serve as a balance to State education. The State college and university provides an essential service in making higher education available for a great number of our young men. But in the nature of things, if all education were left to them, there would be the danger of subordination of academic freedom to political expediency.

The trustees of Williams, I know, are painfully aware of the problem that the future presents in securing the continued endowments necessary for their support. The means must be found, and I am confident they will be found, to replace the large individual endowments which have made possible these fine and time-hallowed institutions. I suspect it will take the form of more widely spread contributions of alumni. Provided the sums are sufficient, this in itself can well become an advantage because we are all apt to take a greater interest in the things which we support and to have greater pride in institutions which we must work to maintain.

The place of Williams College in American life is a great heritage from those devoted scholars on the early New England scene who put religion and education high among the necessities of existence. They were the spiritual pioneers who helped greatly in the development of institutions singular to us in terms of politics, of education, and of our economy. The values of those institutions, I believe, we are inclined to underrate rather than to estimate at their true worth.

In general, Americans have been susceptible to imported philosophies and to an admiration for the things of other times and other continents. It is quite proper that we should draw upon the wisdom and culture of the past and that our minds should be open to the intellectual and artistic achievements of the rest of the globe. But self-depreciation can be as overdone as self-esteem. It has been my view that the overprecise rationalism of Kant, Fichte, and Hegel pervaded much of the university thinking in this country from 1840 to 1910. The admiration for those admittedly great German philosophers of the nineteenth century is too often duplicated today in the admiration for another philosophy deriving to a considerable extent from the same origins and equally inapplicable to American life.

In this Nation in terms of government, education, and general culture we have developed, and are continuing to develop, a philosophy and a Government essentially our own. Both, it is true, have had their roots in English tradition and in the Anglo-Saxon conception of law, equity, and administration, but the trunk and branches and the fruit are wholly and uniquely American.

It is a philosophy understood by few other nations. One of the great problems of modern times is the difficulty of getting other nations to understand it and ourselves. And I must add in all humility that we frequently have equal difficulty in understanding theirs.

The essence of American life, whether at the local, State, or national level is that Government exists to serve the individual and not to be his master. The belief of the founders, expressed in the Declaration of Independence and in the Constitution, that the collective judgment of individual men is preferable to the absolute decisions of any one man or group of men, continues as an essential of the American faith. We continue to be skeptical that either one man or one group of men can safely be entrusted with the interpretation of the needs and wishes of the masses. We are, indeed, suspicious of men who set themselves up as the interpreters of the common man. We prefer to let the common people do their own interpreting. We believe that the judgment of men from many communities, and reflecting many interests, will produce a better composite of law and government than can flow from an hierarchy, whether it is an hierarchy of intellectuals, of business magnates, or leaders of pressure groups.

I take my position with those who believe that American political institutions have within them greater possibilities of development for the freedom of men than the conceptions of statism which are now sweeping Europe.

But statements of convictions are not sufficient by themselves if America is to retain the benefits of this system that we believe in so strongly.

Let us admit at the outset that government under our method is more difficult and sometimes less efficient than government by a central authoritarian group. Therefore responsibility for maintaining our kind of government cannot be discharged by such speeches as mine today or by reliance upon casual lip service to the validity of our beliefs. Our society and our form of government can only be maintained by work and hard work. To be specific: I mean that at every level of the community—in the village, the township, the county, the State, and the Nation—young men who comprise such audiences as this one today must by their own action take a part in shaping and developing the future course of the state. Polemics and intellectual exercises are not sufficient. The same self-discipline that went into the molding of the tremendous armed forces of the United States during the war must be drawn upon again. You will have to take your active part as citizens in the field of politics if the Nation is to be preserved just as you and your contemporaries performed your duty in the ranks of the Army and Navy in wartime.

You must seek membership in a political party. You must be active in that party. You must participate in governing through expression of your opinion by vote and voice. Finally, some of you must be willing to accept the sacrifice involved in the holding of appointive office in government or in running for elective ones.

In this connection I cannot refrain from observing that an encouraging step in the improvement of the machinery of our Government was taken by the United States Senate last week in the passage of a bill increasing the salaries of its Members and providing increased allowance for expenses of Members, as well as a provision of a moderate pension to men who have reached a certain age and have given at least 5 years of service to the Government.

I have long felt that this was the first step in the process of securing improvement in Government administration which I believe is essential. The next step, I hope, will be in the direction of creating career opportunities for young men such as yourselves by lifting the level of rewards open to those qualified for such careers. The creation of a class of civil servants recruited from the schools and universities and refreshed, if possible, by the introduction of men from the practical fields of activity—business, law, and engineering—can go far toward elevating the standards of our Government administration.

I have little patience with the tendency to ridicule and derogate the Members of Congress of the United States. My own experience has convinced me that, broadly speaking, they are a conscientious and patriotic group of men representing quite accurately the broad range of American life. Many of them remain in Congress under handicaps and at substantial sacrifice. To hold them up to abuse and ridicule is to hold ourselves up to abuse and ridicule, because, after all, it is we who either by action or inaction put them there.

Claude Bowers, our present Ambassador to Chile, has pointed out that one of the first steps taken by any aspirant to dictatorship has been the destruction of the reputation and character of politicians. He remarks—"When the politician * * * the Hitlers usually come along in their wake."

I shall close with a few remarks about international affairs, in which, whether or not your tastes lie in that direction, you will have to take a far greater interest than did those of my own generation. Today there is no curtain, either iron or silk, behind which we can shut ourselves from the rest of the world. The fires of disturbance that may begin in the Middle East, in India, or in the Balkans must inevitably have a profound influence upon your lives. A century ago it may have been possible for this Nation to live remote from the rest of the world, but the foreshortening of time and space that have occurred since, the development of lethal weapons capable of spanning vast distances, the increased speed of communications, all make it clear to any thinking person that, as the Secretary of State recently observed, "Unless we realize that peace is indivisible, we shall be forced to take part in a war that is world-wide."

There are two great forces which challenge the minds of men in the world today, competing, in the words of Mr. Churchill, "for the empire of the mind." One is the force of democracy as we know it—the democracy of liberty, of individual freedom, of equal opportunity, of religious and political tolerance—the goals, in short of the early settlers of New England. The other is the thesis of total authority in a central government, the creation of a monolithic state for solutions to all problems, for the expression and direction of all the hopes and aspirations of men. It cannot be taken for granted that because our system is the best for us, it will necessarily be accepted by the rest of the world. If the Anglo-Saxon concept of democratic government is to hold its present high place in the contemporary and future world, we shall have to keep our democracy dynamic. Fortunately, that dynamism will be a benevolent one, expressed in terms of help to the distressed millions of many countries. The story of democracy will be listened to only by people who have sufficient physical strength and spiritual faith to believe that they can successfully govern themselves. It is only after people have enough to eat that they will concern themselves with the abstractions of free government and of individual liberty. Conditions of hunger, of anarchy, and of economic chaos make fertile the soil in which dictatorships spread.

For our democracy to provide the leadership which it must give if it is to prove that there is an alternative to totalitarian concepts, it must have the support and understanding faith of the people of all of the United States. To you will fall a major part of the task of continuing the education of your generation and of sharing in the leadership which will give that confidence. We ourselves know that America does not seek conquest of territory or any other selfish interest, unless the desire for a peaceful and progressive world can be called selfish. These motives we must make clear to the rest of a stricken world as beacons of hope shining through the darkness. You and your generation who have so ably and nobly served in the crisis of war must shape the course of history. If through you this Nation takes the part proportionate to its capacity and its strengh, if it provides the leadership which the democratic and liberal world awaits, we may reasonably expect that the lamps of liberty, of tolerance, and of peace will once again be lighted throughout the world.

Citrus Prices Without OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN PHILLIPS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 15, 1946

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include several statistical tables, I again bring before the House the current market prices on oranges and lemons. You will recall, I gave the figures for oranges a week ago. This is for both oranges and lemons for the 2 weeks of freedom, since OPA was vetoed by the President.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that oranges, on the 10 principal markets, sold at an average price of $5.56 a box and that 409 cars were sold, approximately the same quantity as the first week, but showing a slight increase in price over the first week. They were still 62 cents under the OPA ceiling, however, thus emphasizing the fact that the old and well-established law of supply and demand is stretching its muscles again and operating as it used to operate, very effectively.

This is proven again by the lemon prices. It was expected that these prices would go up. Instead, the record shows an average price of $5.39, or $2.29 under the OPA ceiling. There never was any good reason why perishable fruits and vegetables should have been put under OPA controls, in the opinion of many of us in this House, and these figures prove that fact. Nature provided a much better control than the OPA could ever contrive. You have to sell perishable products or they spoil. The OPA, which itself finally spoiled by being kept too long, never could understand this.

New York	161	$5.58	$6.20

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Meath Chronicle:

Elsewhere in this issue we print a fuller report than was possible last week of the reception given in Navan to Mr. James A. Farley on the occasion of his visit to see his Meath relatives and to renew friendships made by him on previous occasions. Mr. Farley is 100-percent Irishman as well as being 100-percent American. There is not a drop of blood in his veins but Irish blood, for his four grandparents came from Meath; he was born in the United States, as were his parents, and he is as proud of his American heritage as he is of the good Irish stock from which he sprung—a stock which, as Mr. Condon said at the reception, was the salt of the earth. Mr. Farley is typically Irish and typically American. He has all the best characteristics of the people of both nations and is intensely loyal to both. His loyalty to the country that gave hospitality to his forebears who crossed over to its kindly shores just a century ago has been proved by a lifetime of devoted service and his loyalty to Ireland, and to his kin who remain on the old soil, is shown by his visits to this land and to them on every occasion that business brings him to Europe. The business, of which he is an important executive, has no branches here, yet he managed to bring our land within his busy itinerary so that he could visit his own folk. The Urban Council of Navan presented him with an address of welcome and entertained him to luncheon at which he met many more friends, and made them friends for life. His circle of friends in Meath expand at his every visit. One thing that can be said is that if anyone at the reception had wondered before at the high place in the political life of the United States which Mr. Farley has won, they wondered no longer having heard his address in reply to the toast of the United States. He spoke for fully an hour. His effortless delivery; the fluency of his diction; the comprehensive review of world affairs which he delivered, showed the master mind. His enthusiasm for the United States was manifest and his love for Ireland in general, for Meath and his own folk in particular, was made evident. His friendship for Mr. de Valera and other leaders of the Irish people was clear. Mr. Farley is a big man in every way; big in physique, big in mind, big in ability, and above all, big in heart. Those who met him last week in Navan were as impressed by him as were those who first met him in 1937 and again in 1939, occasions of his previous visits. Here in Meath we all hope to see him again and all hope and expect that in the post-war world he will fill even a higher position in the United States than he filled in prewar days.

Deficit Spending Causes Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, full production and prevention of runaway inflation present a vital economic problem today. Many persons believe that continuance of OPA will check price advances, while they completely ignore the basic factors which influence such trends.

For the past 15 years there have been huge annual deficits incurred by the Federal Government, thus increasing the currency in circulation by about 500 percent. Deficit spending was used extensively prior to the war, but increased materially during the past 5 years, despite peak tax collections. From June 30, 1932, to June 30, 1946, our national debt increased $250,000,000,000, and today Idaho's share exceeds $1,000,000,000. It now requires five billions annually to pay interest charges on this debt—or a sum equal to the total revenues collected in fiscal year 1940.

The President, since VJ-day, has frequently promised greater economy and efficiency in Government so that the Federal budget may be balanced this fiscal year. However, little progress is being made in that direction, as evidenced by the $22,000,000,000 deficit in the year which ended June 30, 1946, and by the 2,837,000 civilian employees in the executive department on May 31, 1946.

It is difficult to justify the liberal spending policies which scatter American dollars throughout the world, accentuate shortages of consumer goods in this country and jeopardize the solvency of our Government. The menace of inflation is reflected in the following statement of Federal expenditures, revenues, and the public debt outstanding at the end of each fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year 1932, together with annual increases in the public debt:

Fiscal year	Net receipts [1]	Total expenditures, including debt retirements	Excess of expenditures over receipts	Public debt outstanding at end of year [2]
1932	$2,005,725,437	$4,947,776,888	$2,942,051,451	$19,487,000,000
1933	2,079,696,741	4,325,149,722	2,245,452,980	22,538,700,000
1934	3,115,554,049	6,370,947,347	3,255,393,297	27,053,100,000

[1] Excludes transfers to Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund.
[2] The annual expansion is unrelated to receipts and expenditures indicated in other columns, because public-debt transactions are independently handled and accounted for.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert in the RECORD the following letter, which appeared in the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin:

SIDNEY HILLMAN

During the decade 1924–34 it was my privilege to serve as impartial chairman in the men's clothing industry in the city of New York; also, as chairman of their unemployment-insurance fund. Thus, I represented the manufacturers, contractors, and Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. In that capacity, and later as chairman of the National Labor Board (Philadelphia region), I had intimate contacts with Sidney Hillman. My admiration for him as a great industrial statesman increased as the years went by.

In their autobiographies, Jane Addams and Lillian Wald (founder of the famous Henry Street settlement) wrote with enthusiasm regarding the extraordinary services which Hillman rendered not only the clothing workers but hundreds of thousands engaged in other industries. In this connection I should like to quote from a letter received from the late Julian W. Mack, United States circuit court judge and one of the ablest jurists of our generation. Wrote Judge Mack:

"I esteem Sidney Hillman as one of the finest labor leaders this country has ever had and as one of the finest men I have ever met. He has vision and a true sense not merely of the place of the laborer, but of that of the manufacturer and the public in industry. He knows that, without harmonious cooperation of all the elements, industry itself will get a set-back, labor as well as employer will suffer. While of course he is most keenly interested in the working people, he sees the other fellow's point of view, and more than any other man that I know, he succeeds in looking at the entire situation from the other fellow's point of view."

Sidney Hillman was an extraordinarily skillful negotiator. Those who came into conference with him expecting contentious argument or hostility were uniformly surprised. His great passion was to soften the area of conflict in industry, to bring together the contending forces, and in the end to get them to see what few in addition to Hillman saw: that upon the maintenance of the industry which itself depends upon harmonious relations between capital and labor, the welfare of both sides rests.

After an illness in 1937 Hillman said he had learned his lesson, but as his distinguished biographer, George Soule, pointed out, if he had his life to live over again he would not have acted differently than he did in recent years. When a crisis demanded his services, he would throw himself into it with his superb energy and passion.

In the death of Sidney Hillman, this country has lost one of its truly great men.

Jewish Palestine Will Fight and Endure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "Jewish Palestine Will Fight and Will Endure" delivered by William B. Ziff, at Convention Hall, Philadelphia, Pa., on the 12th of June 1946. In my judgment this is one of the greatest speeches ever delivered in the history of this country.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JEWISH PALESTINE WILL FIGHT AND WILL ENDURE

(By William B. Ziff)

The most terrible words that can be uttered by the human heart are these: "We are alone."

It was this awful sense of being abandoned by the rest of mankind, this utterly hopeless agony and despair, which gave the sufferings of European Jewry its last dreadful depths of meaning.

Only from this sinister and shattering sense of having been forsaken can the future redemption of European Israel be measured.

The 6,000,000 men, women and children who died, and the others who were tortured, beaten, and reviled, found in these words the ugly truth of their position in Europe. This crushing realization that they were alone, not only was the measure of their misery—it also was the test of their powers, and their will to live and endure.

Only a magnificent generation of men could survive such an experience as this without crumbling in soul and body. Only a people with unsuspected strength and tenacity could live through these degradations, to add to the devastating words, "We are alone," the glorious phrase, "But we will fight."

This was the spirit and the determination the world saw in the epic battle of Warsaw, one of the most heroic encounters in the annals of man. Here led by a little, thin, yellow-haired student, a motley group of clerks, tailors, bookkeepers, housewives, children and old men—people who had never even beheld firearms before—conducted the only mass revolt staged against the German war machine. Alone and friendless, and with their very heroism almost unknown, the inhabitants of the Warsaw ghetto fought with ferocious courage, sustained only by a great inner revelation of the dignity of man. In the hands of these people were a few smuggled arms, and little else with which to brave the flame throwers, mortars, and airplanes of the Wehrmacht.

In all the ghetto not one man yielded. The last survivor, a tall, emaciated, eager boy of 15, stood on the roof of a burning building, defiant to the end, before he, too, fell dead into the street. Even then, where he stood, the blue and white flag of Zion continued to wave yet for a few moments.

These shabby, helpless little men and women lived through this last grim crisis in their lives with singular beauty and a supreme faith in their vision of tomorrow. They believed that they fought not only for their own lives, but for the future of those few who would survive. They saw this future under the lovely banner of Zion in the old homeland of Israel, which had been granted to them by the nations for just such an emergency as this.

In Palestine the children, brothers and friends of those who perished in the Warsaw ghetto, also gathered to fight. They were sustained by the same courage, the same hopes, and the same illusions as to the character of the pledged words of the appointed custodian of their national home, Great Britain.

It was they who made possible Montgomery's advance in Africa. It was they who supplied the lightermen to undertake the dangerous work of unloading the African ships. It was they who held Tobruk, who provided the desert scouts, and who furnished the industrial resources required by Alexander's armies. And it was they who, in the critical moments of Rommel's invasion of Egypt, furnished Alexander with fully forty percent of his effectives.

Today these men, who have lived through fire, find again that they are to be cheated of their patrimony. The pledges made to them are to be abandoned. Today, instead of German Nazis, it is British Nazis who are depriving them of that national future they have earned for themselves among the nations.

Today again, in the pestholes of Europe and in the villages of Palestine, the torn Hebrew people must repeat that terrifying phrase: "We are alone," but with an almost single will they thundered the inspired and fearless words: "But we will fight. We will fight. We will never yield—never!"

These are the young patriots who have been characterized by British propaganda as hoodlums and thugs. Most of them are late of the British armies in the Near East, where they fought for the very Empire which now seeks to leach their little inheritance away from them.

There is no more gallant, no more heartening chapter in the history of man's resistance to tyranny than the activities of these young men, whether they belong to the Irgun Zeval Leumi, the Hagganah, or the other self-defense organizations of Jewish Palestine. Long after those who read this will have passed beyond, the brave and resourceful actions of these boys will live in song and story as among the most admirable and singular exploits of men.

If it be pointed out that their activities are illegal and involve violence, it must be replied that so did those of the New Englanders at the Boston Tea Party; so did those of the Swiss mountaineers when they freed their villages from despotism. The test of right is the honor and justice of a cause, and not the weapons of some tyrant or usurper.

Now for the first time it is the British and Arabs who complain of Jewish hoodlums, who proclaim their helplessness before a few thousand determined and patriotic men. The Administration of Palestine has been reduced to abandoning all principles of civilized conduct, and has introduced rules into their warfare against the remnants of the Jewish people which will foul the good name of Britain for long years to come. Young patriots now are shot on sight. There is to be no more trial. Under General Cunningham's orders houses may be searched without warrant, and people picked up on the streets and executed without the formality of trial. Suspicion of guilt is to be enough.

This harsh tyranny will not stop the young Jews of the Holy Land any more than it stopped their brothers who perished in the Warsaw ghetto. The British may pile abomination on abomination and compound force with force, but the battle will go on. The young men who changed their names from the German Goldberg and Tabatchnik, to the proud Hebrew Ben-Souri and Ben-Yossef, changed also from the old helpless irresolution of the ghetto, to begin again where Bar Kochba and Judas Maccabeus left off. They intend to insure a decent future for themselves, their families, and their nation. They intend to be a dignified and secure part of the world around them, and not helpless outcasts. Or they intend to die.

Sidney Hillman's Last Message

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the last message of the late Sidney Hillman entitled, "Political Action Is Social Work," appearing in the newspaper PM, Sunday, July 14, 1946. This message written a month before his death, expresses eloquently and sincerely Mr. Hillman's political and humanitarian faith.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Political action and social work have a common goal. They both seek to improve the lot of man, and for this reason, both fields should work in close harmony with each other.

When the Political Action Committee of the CIO was founded in 1943, it was based on the principle that the people of this Nation, indeed the people of the world, must be given the opportunity to enjoy the basic things which man has always cherished, a good job, a home, family, education, and leisure—the essentials which, when missing, help create the environmental and emotional problems with which social work must cope.

Labor knew from bitter experience the misery and suffering of depression, of unstable economies and the personal maladjustments which such conditions produce. They saw, too, in the wartime production accomplishments of American labor, Government, and business what intelligent planning and cooperation could do. And they know the instrument for achieving the era of peace and plenty they so earnestly desired lay in the political structure of the country. They realized that as long as reaction and its spokesmen predominated in the Congress and local and State legislative chambers, so long would progressive legislation be stifled, and so long would the common people be deprived of the just fruits of our great victory over fascism. They realized that what most governed their lives, their wages, working conditions, their homes, and health was the performance of the representatives they elected to public office.

The immediacy of the problem was posed in the campaign to reelect Franklin D. Roosevelt, and with his reelection the enactment of his great social document which has been so aptly called the economic bill of rights. This is the nucleus around which the CIO and its Political Action Committee, together with all other progressive forces in America, must build.

Examine the specific of this document, and the connection between labor's political action and social work's aim to improve the individual's lot in life is seen at once. "The right of every family to a decent home, the right to adequate medical care, and the opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health, the right to a good education * * *," imperatives if our society is not only to grow and prosper, but to actually hold together. For history has proven that on the economic discontent of people is built the greatest threats to civilization, as the rise of Hitler and fascism so clearly demonstrated.

Franklin D. Roosevelt is dead, but the program he mapped out for America is not. The program is alive, the embodiment of his spirit, the catalyst which has activated so many millions of Americans to continue the struggle for social and economic progress which he courageously led.

At no other time have the issues been so clearly defined, the forces so clearly alined—at no other time has the battle been so bitter. Today in our Congress are men who are spokesmen for those selfish forces who would spend huge sums of money and effort to destroy all of the fine social legislation which the Roosevelt era produced, legislation which has been a boon to social work. It is many years since such programs as the NYA, the Federal free-school-lunch program, and the vast education and slum-clearance projects were instituted. But social workers today know what tremendous values were derived from these and other Roosevelt measures, values apparent today in the people better able to face the ordeals of life because of the training and aid they received.

Insofar as labor is concerned, passage of the Wagner Act, setting forth labor's rights to bargain collectively, resulted in the organization of industrial workers in the CIO. And with this organization came better working conditions, better living conditions for millions of Americans. Lives without fear or want and the lessening of the emotional and psychological problems which fear and want bring.

The CIO Political Action Committee is dedicated to the fulfillment of the Roosevelt economic bill of rights. So should the people who make up the social-work field. For it is through the enactment of these proposals that our mutual aims will be realized. For if our program is successful, and it will be, we will have a national health insurance bill, guaranteeing all Americans that they need not suffer because of the lack of medical care. We will have a higher minimum-wage law, raising our economic standards and thus assisting the individual to master his own problem. We will have better protection of our civil rights as laid down in the Constitution through enactment of a permanent FEPC, which will advance the fight against discrimination and help solve the psychological disturbances which directly result from discriminatory practices. We will have a firm and lasting policy of friendship with our wartime allies, the international accord so necessary for real peace of mind, and an end to the terrible threat of war now hanging over our heads.

For these things labor through its political arm will fight. For these things they should be joined by workers in the field of social work. For these things are, in essence, the goal toward which we both are striving—full security for all men.

Political Partiality of Radio

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the June 1946 issue of the American Mercury magazine contains an interesting and thought-provoking article by Dr. Rolf Kaltenborn on the subject Is Radio Politically Impartial? Dr. Kaltenborn is the son of H. V. Kaltenborn, the eminent news analyst. He formerly served with one of the major radio networks and is now teaching in the political science department of Yale University, after serving in the Army Signal Corps.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of his article be reproduced in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS RADIO POLITICALLY IMPARTIAL?
(By Rolf Kaltenborn)

Radio is our most powerful political weapon. Yet if the democratic process is to function properly radio must not become the mouthpiece of the dominant political party. Congressmen who drafted radio legislation were well aware of its potentialities as an instrument of political persuasion. That is why they tried to legislate against partisan control and provided that during campaigns candidates for public office are entitled to equal radio time. But there is no provision in the radio law which compels broadcasters to present balanced discussions of controversial issues between elections, and it's a long time between elections. In that interim, the responsibility of balancing political discussion rests exclusively with station owners.

One thing is clear from the record. Representatives of the party in power get the lion's share of radio time devoted to political discussion. Here is how the National Broadcasting Co., which has the largest radio audience, balanced the political scale in 1945. During the year, 56 Democratic congressmen and governors and 63 members of the administration were given radio time. During the same period only 47 Republican Congressmen and governors got on the air. It was doubtless with these facts in mind that the new chairman of the Republican National Committee, CARROLL REECE, said recently, "Radio has helped to perpetuate the present administration in power. When there were definite policies to put over, the various government agencies turned to radio."

Back in 1936 the Republicans protested loudly against the repeated national hookups arranged for the late President Roosevelt. Their protest was answered by William S. Paley, head of the Columbia Broadcasting System, who said, "I am glad to answer your question as to whether or not the time we allowed for the President's speech was a donation to a political party. It certainly was not. It was a donation to the American people. It has always been our policy to make time available for the President of the United States when he wishes to address the Nation. We followed this policy through two Republican administrations, and we will follow it now." It is the general policy of radio executives to give time to the President of the United States and members of his Cabinet whenever it is asked for. This is considered in the public interest.

If, as Thomas Jefferson has said, "The spirit of resistance to government is so valuable that it should always be kept alive," it would seem to be in the best interest of the American public if radio made another "donation"—this time to the opposition party. But is equal time at an equally good hour automatically given to the opposition?

It is not. Radio executives assume that access to the air waves is a natural prerogative of public office. Time and again microphones are turned over to national, State, or local administration leaders. The opposition has the right to demand time for reply only if broadcasters interpret the remarks of an administration spokesman as having been controversial. Most administration speeches are regarded as informational rather than controversial. For example: throughout 1945 Chester Bowles, then Price Administrator, spoke once a week over the American Broadcasting System to inform the public about price regulation, the activities of the OPA, and other administration efforts to check inflation. One looks in vain for a similar series by any party or group opposed to administration ideas. When questioned about this, the public service director of the network said, "I see nothing controversial about inflation. We are all agreed that it must be prevented."

While we may all be agreed that inflation should be prevented, the administration and the majority of the Republicans certainly do not agree on just how it should be prevented. If the American public is to be fully informed on the dangers of inflation it would be best to donate equal time to the opposition to discuss its views. If Republicans endorsed Mr. Bowles' activities, the Administration's fight against inflation would be so much stronger. If they disagreed, the public would certainly profit by learning something about possible alternatives to administration policy.

II

The closer one looks at the networks' performance, the greater the favoritism to official spokesmen appears. The list of prominent figures who gave special talks over the American Broadcasting System during the last 3 months of 1945 includes President Harry Truman (who spoke five times), Secretary of States James F. Byrnes, Secretary of Commerce Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Labor Lewis B. Schwellenbach, Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of the Treasury Fred M. Vinson, Assistant Secretary of State Spruille Braden, and John W. Snyder, Director of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion. Representative leaders of the opposition are not to be found on this list. Nowhere was equal time at a comparable hour given to them to speak on foreign policies, reconversion, financial policy, labor, or agriculture. Surely the public would be more aware of public issues if equal time had been given to the opposition to endorse or criticize Government policies. Present broadcast practice does not provide for regular responsible criticism of public policies from official representatives of the opposition party.

For more than a year representatives of the State Department have been participating in a weekly half hour NBC program entitled "Our Foreign Policy." There is little doubt that the public wants and needs more information about our foreign policy. However, the people would be better served if the participants on this program were not primarily administration spokesmen.

"It is our idea," says NBC, "to put on the men who are executing our foreign policy so that they may explain it." Certainly, the men who execute a policy are most competent to explain it, but they are not always the best persons to provide us with an objective analysis of their policies. NBC might, for example, present an equally interesting series on foreign policy without using a single administration spokesman. There are those who believe that Americans must show no difference of opinion on foreign policy. Our strength, it is claimed, lies in unity. But that unity would be presented more effectively if leaders of both the ins and the outs joined equally in explaining and endorsing it.

Present broadcast policy naturally takes no account of the fact that administration leaders advertise themselves and their views whenever they go on the air. For instance, during 1945 listeners to the Mutual Broadcasting System were treated to many special programs. The ceremonies attendant on the launching of the hundredth ship from the Butler Shipyards in Superior, Wis., featured an address by Secretary af Labor Schwellenbach. A special Labor Day program gave him a second opportunity to speak on the air. His third appearance over this same network was his speech at a dinner sponsored by the National Lawyers Guild. Secretary of the Navy James Forrestal launched the U. S. S. Franklin D. Roosevelt with a radio speech. Chester Bowles was guest speaker at the Ohio

State Grange. Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr., was on the air at a Washington Birthday dinner, and at various war-bond rallies. A testimonial dinner for Henry A. Wallace gave him a chance to talk. National Farm Safety Week featured a talk by Secretary of Agriculture Anderson. Former Postmaster General Walker presided over Memorial Day ceremonies. Philippine Independence Day was highlighted by the radio address of Paul McNutt.

No one will deny that these occasions made for good, topical broadcasting. No one will deny either that repeated radio appearances by administration leaders make a tremendous impact on the listening public. Names and personalities become increasingly familiar—which means that they have increasing political value. The opposition has no such opportunity to build up its stars. The late President Roosevelt, even before his second term was the best-known figure in American politics. It is very likely that radio was more responsible for this than any other single factor. He spoke more than 300 times over major networks while he was President. If members of the opposition are to become well-known figures to the radio public, each fireside chat that is not entirely informational should have a counterpart. And at least some ceremonial occasions should feature the outs as well as the ins.

Some circles assert it is only fair that the Democrats at present should dominate radio because the Republicans dominate the press. It might be answered here that two wrongs do not make a right. It is more pertinent, however, to point out that should the Republicans win the election in 1948 they would be able, as things stand now, to dominate both of these vital channels of communication.

Even when equal time is provided, equally good time often is not. James F. Byrnes spoke on October 5, 1945, over the Columbia Broadcasting System. The next evening John Foster Dulles made a speech over CBS entitled "A Republican Speaks on the London Conference." On the surface it would appear that both the Republicans and Democrats had equal opportunity to report their reactions to this conference. It should be noted, however, that Secretary Byrnes was given a half hour on Friday night at a time when the listening audience is at its peak. Mr. Dulles was given 15 minutes at 10:45 on Saturday night, the poorest radio night in the week. It is interesting to note that a commercially sponsored program was canceled to present Mr. Byrnes, which means his talk had a guaranteed network throughout the country. Mr. Dulles was not so fortunate. His speech was merely "made available" and consequently had no guaranteed network. Local stations could take it or leave it. If it was the intention of CBS in this instance to put before the listening public the viewpoints of both parties on the London Conference, each speaker should have been accorded an equally good radio time and been guaranteed an equally large area coverage.

Balancing radio time between the ins and the outs is a problem which also confronts radio officials in other countries. Recently in Sweden the Minister of Finance appeared briefly on an entertainment program to explain to the citizens how to fill out income tax reports. His appearance caused a storm of protest. The four opposition political parties demanded time on the air, claiming that they too were entitled to explain how to fill out an income tax blank. In Sweden the holding of public office does not imply any special right to time on the air. Can it be that the Swedes are more astute and fair in this matter than we?

Some may object that an open-door policy on the airwaves would admit small, dissident groups to an equal footing with important spokesmen. If our radio officials would automatically give equal time to the major opposition party each time the administration speaks, they ask, why shouldn't the Communist, Socialist, and other small parties be allotted equal time? It is generally agreed that ours is a two-party country. The Communists and Socialists do get time on the air on forum and discussion programs. Until they can command voting strength more comparable to that of the two major parties, however, they cannot expect equal access to the air. But just because universal equality of the air is not feasible, equal time should not be denied the major opposition party.

The issue is not primarily one of free speech on the air. According to the best available evidence, once a political figure gets on the air he is free to say pretty much what he pleases. The most important problem concerns equal access to the radio facilities of this country.

When the Democrats came into office in 1933 the broadcasters abandoned even a pretense to impartiality in politics. The reason for this, in the candid words of one of their spokesmen, was partly "the hope of currying favor, and partly because we were misled by an excess of zeal, based on the oft-repeated statement that we were in the midst of an emergency * * *."

The tendency of broadcasters to surrender their scruples and yield to the excitement of the hour poses a real threat to the democratic process.

The Sovereign Equality of All Nations in the United Nations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address of welcome to Lt. Gen. Alexander Papagos, commander in chief of the armed forces of Greece during World War II, delivered by me at a banquet given by the Order of Ahepa and the Supreme Lodge last night. The address is entitled "The Sovereign Equality of All Nations in the United Nations."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SOVEREIGN EQUALITY OF ALL NATIONS IN THE UNITED NATIONS

Both the joint four-nation declaration at Moscow, November 1, 1943, and the resolution of the Senate of the United States, known as the Connally resolution, reveal the settled purpose of this great treaty power to base the structure of security and peace on the principle of the sovereign equality of members of any organization formed for that purpose.

The language of these state papers is nearly identical. They recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security.

The Charter of the United Nations provides in article 2:

"The Organization and its members, in pursuit of the purposes stated in article 1, shall act in accordance with the following principles:

"1. The Organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members."

The principle of equality was extended, also, beyond states which are the members, and to include individuals. Thus, article 8 provides:

"The United Nations shall place no restrictions on the eligibility of men and women to participate in any capacity and under conditions of equality in its principal and subsidiary organs."

An illustration of the specific application of this great principle is the manner in which the general welfare of the world is provided for, subject to the restriction (art. 12, 1) that:

"While the Security Council is exercising in respect of any dispute or situation, the functions assigned to it in the present Charter, the General Assembly shall not make any recommendation with regard to that dispute or situation unless the Security Council so requests."

Subject to that restriction, the General Assembly may recommend measures for the peaceful adjustment of any situation, regardless of origin, which it deems likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations, including situations resulting from a violation of the provisions of the present Charter setting forth the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

This counterpart of the primary functions of the Security Council is vested in all of the members on an equal basis, thus:

Article 9, 2, provides:

"Each member shall have not more than five representatives in the General Assembly."

Article 18, 1:

"Each member of the General Assembly shall have one vote."

The various provisions relating to special majorities do not transgress the principle upon which the great and promising Organization is founded, namely, "the sovereign equality of all its members."

Greece has, from the beginning, been specially interested in a general international organization for security and peace.

From the beginning Greece has also participated, through the United Nations declaration of January 1, 1942, and the San Francisco Conference which produced the Charter of the United Nations. Her delegation there emphasized the importance of having the Charter based on the foregoing principle of the sovereign equality of all its members.

Now upon this occasion, as upon all other occasions when a distinguished officer of Greece honors the United States by his presence here and whenever Greece is considered, our first thought is apt to be of the beauty and art of Periclean tragedy and exquisite marbles.

The classic history of Hellas persists notwithstanding the death of the mythological gods under Julian the Apostate.

The casting down of the pagan gods was concerned not merely with the passing of paganism, but it plumbed the depths of human nature and discovered the invisible realm of the spirit. Whenever Greece is mentioned this epochal event in the progress of the human race is remembered.

We are moved, also, by the heroic deeds and glorious achievements of patriots, who were led by the Greek Orthodox Bishop Patras in the liberation of Hellas from the old Ottoman Empire. The Greek revolution was not concerned alone with the end of Turkish rule, but dealt with the spiritual problem of balancing individual liberty with orderly government of masses. The incomparable courage and moral stamina of the Greek people which persisted for years was not only destructive of tyranny, but it was creative of a new pattern of political thought.

Fortunately the relations between Greece and Turkey today are amicable.

Politics in the Greek sense has special meaning, for the Greeks were first of all people to study political science. The philosophy of the law and the science of government engaged their sagacious scholars during the classical period. The principle of subservience of self to the state was accepted as virtues and incorporated in their law. The dominance of law was established and prevailed in the hearts of the Greeks.

These principles are graphically illustrated by the message of the Spartans engraved on a memorial at the place where they fell:

"Stranger, go tell the Lacedaemonians that we lie here in obedience to their laws."

They early crystallized into law principles of free government which are the pillars of free government everywhere.

As a Member, still, of the Senate of the United States, I acknowledge America's debt to Sparta for the prototype of our two-chamber legislature—a Senate and a House of Representatives.

However pleasant may be the contemplation of the glorious history of the Greek people, the consideration of the problems of this moment bring us up to the gallant conduct of Greece in the present war:

Albania, treacherously captured, was early used by the Italians as a springboard against Greece. Promptly, and with full knowledge of the almost certain death that faced them, the Greeks advanced to meet the enemy, fought furiously, and were crushed only when the Germans came to the aid of their satellite with insuperable weight of numbers, superior mechanical equipment, tanks, and squadrons of airplanes. This great sacrifice of the Greeks contributed immeasureably to the victory, for it upset the Nazi timetable of conquest and diverted their operations.

Hitler had counted on bringing Yugoslavia and Greece under the swastika without a fight, as he had conquered Austria, Bulgaria, Hungary, and Rumania. But these two Balkan countries fought and Hitler and his hordes were compelled to postpone his attack against Soviet Russia until the month of June was nearly gone. The Russians were able to rally. The German offensive bogged down as winter approached, and we now appraise the achievement of the Greek Nation in this phase of the war as emphatically beneficial to the United Nations. Reprisals followed, of course. The suffering which the Greek people have endured has appalled the world.

The people of the United States have great sympathy for the people of Greece in their suffering. They have helped, and desire to help, toward early reconstruction of Greece. While not interfering in Greek domestic affairs they are sympathetic to the future of free institutions in this ancient home of democracy.

A golden thread connecting Greece and the United States is this benevolent organization called AHEPA, of which I have had the honor to be a member for many years.

The precepts and practices of this organization have a tendency not only to strengthen friendship between these two countries, but also, to encourage development of loyalty to the United Nations.

AHEPA teaches loyalty to the inspiring traditions of classic and modern Greece, as well as enthusiastic citizenship in the United States.

This organization promotes teaching to its members the Constitution of the United States, explains the form and spirit of the Government of this country, and stimulates its members to become naturalized citizens. These nationals of the United States of Greek racial stock also maintain Greek culture here in Greek schools and churches without diminishing loyal pursuit of American culture in American schools. Their desire to do this reflects endurance and strength of their civic virtue. Their freedom to do this exemplifies the faith of Americans in their primary loyalty as brother Americans.

This organization accepting the honor of the gracious visit of General Papagos to its banquet tonight, expresses to him its appreciation of the firm and lasting friendship of his gallant country. It looks forward to the collaboration in the United Nations of the United States and Greece and their other colleagues on the basis of the sovereign equality of nations, both great and small.

Has America Blown a Fuse?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER C. PLOESER
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. PLOESER. Mr. Speaker, I have a friend who manufactures fuses and does an exceptionally good job of it. Recently, an old customer and good friend of his demanded delivery of their order. The following is his reply:

ST. LOUIS, MO., April 4, 1946.

Mr. A. W. DOHRENDORF,
St. Louis, Mo.

DEAR SIR: I understand you have been making complaints about delivery on glass-tube fuses. You are probably one of those rugged individuals out of the Dark Ages—one who is so heartless as to think that people should work for a living. That went out with hoop skirts and petticoats my friend. It is people like you who have ruined this country by your foolish following of the Biblical admonition, "By the sweat of your brow you shall earn your daily bread." Just look what all this hustle and bustle the past hundred years has done. We have cluttered up our streets with automobiles so that it is almost impossible to find a parking place. We have so many wired homes that the sun has become obscured by all the wires running down the alleys feeding current into the homes of the workingmen. We spent $8,000,000,000 last year for liquor. What was spent on the other two important parts of that famous triumvirate—wine, women, and song—is not of statistical record. Obviously, the singing did not cost much and I have a suspicion that the liquor end of the bill was not the heaviest part of it either. Our trains and hotels are all cluttered up by people who earn money working and are now trying to find ways of spending it.

When you were a youngster you should have studied, but probably didn't, your Bible lessons. These were filled with beautiful phrases such as "Blessed be the poor in spirit" and "A rich man has as much chance of going to heaven as a camel has going through a needle's eye." These two sayings are all shot now. We have no more poor. In place of worrying about the cost of turnips, carrots, etc., we dash around trying to buy nylons at a couple of bucks a pair; when the neighborhood picture shows charged 10 cents, we didn't care much about going to the shows but now that they are up to 50 cents, plus another 15 cents or so in taxes, we have standing room only—all of this the result of drivers such as you who insist upon people making money.

Just because you want fuses, is that any reason why we should insist upon our people putting in a full week's work? Who are you to say that they are not entitled to three or four days off each week? A lot of our workers come in like the laundress came in years ago—about one or two days a week. If it weren't for fellows like you always crabbing for material, we would put the administrative end of this business on the same basis.

Last week the newspapers carried an item advising the reading public that 32,872 people who should and could be working were drawing "unemployment compensation" from the State of Missouri—that is to say—being paid for not working. What's wrong with this? If business executives like you had been a little smarter, you would have been able to figure out a beautiful scheme like this many, many years ago, but, no, you have to stick to such hackneyed phrases as "Honesty is the best policy," "Work and you will succeed," etc., etc. This is a new era—we can't stand for any more of such vicious propaganda such as fellows like you have been putting out. Just because you need fuses is no reason why these 32,872 people should work.

Enough of this! It is time for you to realize that the old horse and buggy ideas are as out of date as that method of conveyance. Why don't you modernize yourself? In the language of the street, get hep to yourself and shed a lot of your old-fashioned notions.

In order to stop some of your crabbing, I am sending you a large box of five fuses herewith, which leaves a total of only 186,435 still due you on your order, and I will even say that if and when our people become thoroughly rested up and are willing to make a few more fuses, you might get some more—but don't crowd us— we will not stand for any more of your bullying. Thinking men have developed a Utopia and we are not going to let guys like you ruin it by insisting on old-fashioned, sound fundamentals.

Respectfully yours,

A. B. BUSSMANN, President.

Patent Provisions of S. 1717

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the following testimony of Conder C. Henry, Assistant Commissioner of Patents during World War II, was heard by the House Military Affairs Committee on June 26, 1946, on S. 1717.

It is of great relevance to the debate on S. 1717.

STATEMENT BY CONDER C. HENRY BEFORE THE HOUSE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE IN EXECUTIVE SESSION ON JUNE 26, 1946, ON S. 1717, AN ACT TO REGULATE AND CONTROL ATOMIC ENERGY

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I shall make my comments on S. 1717 brief and to a practical end. Before doing so, however, I wish to thank the committee for according me an opportunity to appear before it to express my views on the measure, and I hope that what I am about to say will be of some help in the committee's deliberations.

Perhaps it is unnecessary for me to qualify myself, but I might mention the fact that as Assistant Commissioner of Patents during World War II, I issued a large part of the secrecy orders which were issued under Public Law 700 in applications for patents. Also, I had the privilege of inspecting for the Patent Office the plants at Oak Ridge, Tenn., and at Hanford, Wash., at which were produced the materials for making the atomic bomb. Hundreds of inventions there used had previously been made by private inventors. As to inventions relating to the bomb, I think that they should be viewed as being merely a part of an evolutionary process and as constituting only steps forward in man's upward struggle for the achievement of complete freedom.

Considering the time they were made and the accumulated knowledge available to those who made them, they are not, in my judgment, any more startling or important and are not capable of any more or less beneficial or harmful uses than others made in earlier times and which were accompanied by far less furor. There might be mentioned in this connection, the spinning jenny, the internal combustion engine, high explosives, the linotype machine, radio, the submarine, and the airplane. These and many other earlier inventions revolutionized the art of war and the economy of nations, but they were dealt with in this country by practical men under our constitutional processes in such manner as insured their full development and utilization. My entire argument today will be that our experience of the past in dealing with these older inventions is a guide for the future in dealing with this latest one.

The bill before you is concerned with fissionable materials and with atomic energy generally. It endeavors to solve the problems created by the discovery of this new source of power, and such problems are rendered unnecessarily complicated by the manner they are dealt with in the bill.

I suppose that most of you have been trained in law and perhaps some of you in the mathematical sciences. Lawyers and scientists know that when they are confronted with a problem, the solution of which seems difficult, the method of attack is to divide the problem into its component parts and then solve each part one at a time. Applying this technique to the bill, it will be seen that it does not present one integral problem but three in juxtaposed position, the solution of neither of which is necessary for the solution of the other. As I view the matter, such problems are:

First. The problem relating to the production and control of fissionable materials and byproduct materials. Sufficient facts are known to permit of the solution of this problem now;

Second. The problem of forecasting the "political, economic, and international effects of the utilization of atomic energy" (p. 24); and Third. The problem relating to the nationalization of inventions not yet made relating to such energy.

Manifestly, in the 10 minutes time allotted to me it will not be possible to discuss these problems in detail. There are, however, certain broad observations with respect to them which can be made.

First, the problem of controlling production and use of fissionable materials is the only problem which is capable of present solution. By injecting into this problem considerations concerning the prospective economic and social effects of the industrial utilization of atomic energy and also concerning patents for inventions which may be evolved in the future, the factors necessarily involved in the solution of the main problem are greatly clouded.

Insofar as the bill provides for the control and policing of the production and use of atomic energy on a scale which would constitute a hazard to life or health, and for the disposal and licensing of fissionable material, I think that for the most part it admirably accomplishes the purpose. However, I am unable to see any logic or justifiable reason for incorporating in a bill designed primarily for dealing with the very practical problem of policing the production and use of fissionable materials now in existence, provisions for a new patent policy and for studies of the future social effects of inventions not yet made. These three matters should, in my judgment, be dealt with separately in separate measures as involving unrelated considerations.

Please project your minds backward to the year 1900. I suppose that in 1900 many of you gentlemen were launched on the careers which placed you among the policy makers of the Nation. At that time we did not have many telephones, and no electric refrigerators, radios, airplanes, submarines, or articles made of plastics, and the automobile was just being introduced. Inventions in these fields constitute the basis of huge industries which provide enormous investment outlets and jobs for millions of people.

Suppose there were a law on the statute books dating back to that year such as is represented by the bill before you, can it be truthfully said, or can you believe, that we would have achieved the industrial supremacy we now enjoy, or would have made discoveries which insured our success in two world wars? Such a law would have closed the field to private citizens to make and secure patents for inventions relating to automobiles, for example, out of which sprang the military tank. It also would have enabled sociologists and economists from the very beginning to raise their raucous voices against any progress in the field of automotive transportation because of the misapprehension they may have entertained about the impact automobiles would have on the established livery stable and horse-breeding industries, as well as on the expected dislocation of people occasioned by the decentralization of urban populations into outlying communities because of the easier and faster method of transportation. More importantly, it would have destroyed the incentives provided by the Constitution to make new discoveries and to invest speculative capital needed to develop them into marketable products. In this connection, I wish to comment briefly on these incentives.

In effect our patent laws simply provide that if a man will spend his time and money in discovering something of the kind named in the patent statutes which is new and useful, he may receive a patent (not a reward) for it, by which he may exclude others for a limited time from making, using, or selling his new invention. Essentially, he must make a discovery and, therefore, add something to the sum of human knowledge. Furthermore, when he receives his patent he must establish a new enterprise or sell his invention to someone else, if he expects to recoup the money spent in making the invention in the first place. The Government does not spend anything. Its purpose is accomplished by providing the incentives which induced the disclosure of the unknown to the public and the establishment of the new enterprise.

Over 2,400,000 patented inventions were made since our Government was founded as a result of these incentives, and substantially all of our industrial economy is built on them. Unquestionably they insured our success in the inventive type of warfare in which we were engaged during both world wars.

By removing the incentives provided by our patent laws the bill is a radical departure from anything known in our history. The only parallel I can find to it is the Soviet patent law. That law provides in part as follows:

"69. If the invention or technical improvement is accepted for utilization, the inventor or individual who proposed the technical improvement receives, depending on the technical significance, savings or any other effect produced by his invention or technical improvement upon the national economy, and the degree of perfection of this invention or technical improvement, a remuneration in accordance with the instruction approved by the Council of People's Commissars of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

"71. All utilized inventions and technical improvements, as well as the remuneration paid for them, are noted in the labor book of the inventor or individual who suggested the technical improvement.

"72. The inventors have, other conditions being equal, a priority for positions as scientific workers in scientific research and experimental institutions and enterprises related to the field in which their invention has been made."

The above quotation is from "Sobranie Postanovlenii i Rasporiazhenii Praviteltva Soyuza Sovetskikh Sotcialisticheskikh Respublik, March 25, 1941, No. 9, Art. 150," an unofficial translation of which was furnished to me by our State Department.

I am not informed as to whether anything worth-while has been produced under the Russian law. I do not know nor have I heard of anything.

The adoption of a similar law by the enactment of the bill before you, which substitutes bureaucratic "rewards" for the exclusive rights provided by present law, would, in my judgment, effectively retard the making of new inventions for the establishment of new enterprises based on them for the utilization of atomic energy for commercial, industrial, and military purposes by private initiative, enterprise, and capital. I trust it will be remembered that regardless of what suppressive measures may be adopted by this country in this respect, other countries that are our industrial rivals may continue to pursue a more enlightened policy. The most that we can do to encourage inventors is not too much to demand to insure the continuance of our industrial world supremacy, or even our national security.

Obviously, the bill is predicated on the proposition that foreign nations might gain an advantage by learning from published patents, or as a result of our patent procedures, of new inventions made by citizens of this country. My answer is that full secrecy can be preserved without modifications of our patent laws and that few such inventions will be produced if the incentives to produce them are destroyed. No departure from our historic patent policies is necessary for security purposes, and no such proposal was either advocated or adopted during the recent period of hostilities. Ample security is possible, and was secured during the war period, without departing from any of our established fundamental patent practices.

Underlying this bill, gentlemen, is the idea of fear, virtually confessed in its preamble. Because of this fear, unwarranted change in the normal course and direction of American business philosophy is advocated.

My recommendation is that the patent provisions of this bill be eliminated, especially since under present law the government now has the right to use any patented invention, although the patent owner may not consent to such use. This recommendation I believe to be entirely consistent with the findings of the Section of Patent, Trade-Mark and Copyright Law of the American Bar Association which, acting through its committee on Patent Law Revision (of which I am a member) and its Council, with the full knowledge and consent of the Board of Governors of the Association, drew up a resolution disapproving those portions of S. 1717 which provide for the compulsory licensing of patents and prohibits the creation of patent property for certain subject matter. Copies of that resolution were sent to all members of this committee.

Speech of Gen. Alexander Papagos

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include herein a splendid speech made by the outstanding military leader and Greek hero, made at the banquet in his honor held in Washington, D. C., the evening of July 15, 1946, by the Order of the Ahepa:

Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. Supreme President of Ahepa, honorable gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives, honored Admiral Nimitz, heroic General Devers, beloved General Madumes Dramantopoulos, gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps, ladies and gentlemen:

I thank all the previous speakers for their very warm remarks which honor Greece, her people, and her armed forces.

My lifelong wish is fortunately fulfilled today. I am most happy to be at the heart of America—the land of the brave, the symbol of freedom, and the champion of world victory over Axis tyranny.

On behalf of the Greek Government and people, I am greatly honored to convey—through the honorable Senators and Congressmen and the indomitable Admiral Nimitz, present here tonight—the gratitude of Hellas to the glorious American Nation.

Were is not for the gallant American Nation, the world today would still be in chains. No nation can repay you the debt. How could Greece do it? My country's gratitude will stay eternal.

We, in Greece, learn to love America before coming to this sacred soil. We do not forget the Monroes, the Websters, the Clays, the Howes, or the Adamses and the Pleiad of great Americans who assisted us in our 8-year war for independence in the 1820's.

They are endeared to our hearts forever. You gave us then a helping hand for freedom's sake. This is a sacred bond.

We are gratefully conscious of all of this and moreover of the American generosity shown to the dear old country of mine at any time of need.

Your affection deeply stirs the soul of every Greek knowing that it has also been extended to hundreds of thousands of his compatriots now honored with the American citizenship of which we all feel most proud.

A great number of them belong to the distinguished organization, the Ahepa. I cordially thank the supreme president and all its members for their extremely courteous hospitality of the evening.

However, above all, our fighting for freedom—side by side—in the two world wars and our communion in an ancient civilization and political institutions stand out in excellent prominence and bind Greece with the glorious United States forever.

These institutions set up 25 centuries ago below the Acropolis guided once more the Greek Nation to the road of duty on that night of October 28 in 1940. Imbued with the spirit of Greece, our people accepted the unbearable odds and kept the traditions of the old land.

We now emerge with pride out of the struggle for the defense of world liberty. We have been decimated by the cruelty of four ruthless invaders, the Italian and German partners and their Bulgarian and Albanian satellites.

They all tried to exterminate the Greek Nation, a peace-loving nation. They attacked us by surprise. They did not spare woman or child. But Greece was proud to endure that suffering. Now, deeply wounded, she lies in a sea of ruins and desolation. Our holocaust was worthy the price of liberty.

We do not seek revenge. Standing up amongst glorious wreckage, we look for justice, as proclaimed by the Atlantic Charter. But is it just that Axis satellites like Bulgaria and Albania, which devastated Greece en masse, be still allowed to muster mighty forces on the Greek borders and threaten the peace? Why shouldn't they be disarmed for the sake of justice, as disarmed were their Axis partners whom they helped in their aims of world conquest in a "new order" through an infamous "blitzkrieg"?

We lack adequate words to express our gratitude to our great Allies for the liberation of the Dodecanese Islands, another old cradle of Greek civilization and freedom. But why should northern Epirus (southern Albania), a land Greek since the remotest time—acknowledged as such by a United States Senate resolution of May 17, 1920—still be under the tyrannical yoke of the Albanian totalitarian regime?

Is it right that Albania should be permitted just after a war of so tremendous proportions to carry out mass executions and deportations of my countrymen in an effort to weaken our just claims at the Paris Conference? Or was in vain the untold sufferings and bloodshed of my countrymen in Greece? Such is the picture, because the invaders not only have not as yet atoned for their crimes, but they endeavor to distort the world public opinion and thus evade every sort of reparations.

Greece has never had any ambition for conquest. What she needs is her security from any future attack. The Bulgarians have attacked us three times during the last 30 years, and they invaded our soil. For this reason our border population is reluctant to return to their homes which are under a constant menace.

For the sake of world peace and justice our borders with Bulgaria should be rectified and militarism be suppressed forever. Only then in southeastern Europe could peace be secured.

We have faith in the United States that justice will be done to Greece.

Ladies and gentlemen, I propose a toast in honor of the President of the United States and also to the glory and grandeur of the American Nation which we Greeks love and admire with gratitude.

Labor Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. ROLAND KINZER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include therein an editorial in the Daily Intelligencer, of Doylestown, Pa., on July 12, 1946:

LABOR RELATIONS

It is said that a picture is worth a thousand words. Sometimes a few simple figures are worth a million.

The most unanswerable proof of the proposition that the Republican Party has been the best friend American labor ever had is to be found in statistics of the United States Department of Labor.

Figures are now available (p. 720, May 1946 issue of the Labor Department's Monthly Labor Review) covering strikes in the United States for the 30-year period from 1916 to the end of 1945.

Of the various statistics, the ones best giving a picture of the extent of labor disputes is not the number of strikes but the number of workers involved. The man-days idle would be still better; but these figures were kept only for part of the time.

Here are the figures on the number of men who went on strike during the 30 years:

1917	1,227,000
1918	1,240,000
1919	4,160,000
1920	1,463,000
1921	1,099,000
1922	1,613,000
1923	757,000
1924	655,000
1925	428,000
1926	330,000
1927	330,000
1928	314,000
1929	289,000
1930	183,000
1931	342,000
1932	324,000
1933	1,168,000
1934	1,467,000
1935	1,117,000
1936	789,000
1937	1,861,000
1938	688,000
1939	1,171,000
1940	577,000
1941	2,363,000
1942	840,000
1943	1,981,000
1944	2,116,000
1945	3,467,000

All records probably will be broken by the current year, as the Labor Department's figures for the first 4 months of this year show a total of 2,235,000 strikers with only a third of the year elapsed.

Study of these figures for their political significance tells a story which is extremely interesting and which has great bearing on the issues of the present political campaigns.

The 30-year period breaks into three parts, so far as concerns national politics. During the first 5 years of it, the Democratic Party under President Wilson was in command. For 12 years the Republicans controlled, under Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. For the remaining 13 years, the Democratic Party again was in power, under Presidents Roosevelt and Truman.

How did labor fare under the party leadership in each of the three periods?

Under Woodrow Wilson, in the 5 years listed, the average of men on strike was 1,938,000 per year.

Under the Republicans, the 12-year average was 555,300.

After a return to Democratic control, the 13-year average was 1,508,000.

Still more sensational comparisons can be found. For instance, part of the excessive labor dissension of the first 2 years of Republican rule in 1921–22, was a hang-over from the past. In the remaining 10 years of the Republican supremacy, the average was only 395,200 per year—little more than a fifth of the last 13-year average.

As a matter of fact, this 10-year total for Republican Presidents was less than in the single Democratic year of 1919, and only slightly higher than for 1945. At the current rate, it will be much less than for the present year.

The best Republican year was only a third of the total in the best Democratic year, and the worst Republican year only a third of the worst Democratic year.

The political impact of these figures is to prove beyond dispute that labor and management have lived in greater harmony under Republican than under Democratic Presidents—to argue conclusively that the Republican policies contain something which the Democratic methods do not, when it comes to obtaining peaceful cooperation on the labor front.

But the arguments in politics are much less important than those going into the field of economics and national prosperity.

The costs of strikes, as everyone knows, falls upon labor heaviest; but they form a serious drain upon national income as well as upon industrial earnings. Regardless of the gains of labor thus accomplished, the harm done national production can never be wiped out; and these so-called gains usually disappear in a series of price rises due to accelerated inflation.

As a matter of fact, labor benefits infinitely more from whatever increases the buying power of its dollars than it ever can from merely increasing the number of dollars received each pay day.

It is a fact almost beyond dispute that whatever reduces labor stoppages helps national economy, and whatever increases them retards the industrial resumption now so urgently needed.

Quite aside from political arguments, there are economic reasons going far beyond party lines which ought to compel a return to the type of national policy, as applies to labor issues, which this Nation used during the midtwenties.

As a practical matter, obviously this change in the field of national economic policy can be made only by a political change in the elections.

The one road to a resumption of orderly, just, and peaceful handling of labor difficulties in the United States can be resumed only by the election of a strong Republican majority in the next House of Congress.

Egypt's Cooperation With United Nations League of Lawyers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Mr. Kamel Youssef Salah, past president of the Egyptian National Bar, at a dinner of the United Nations League of Lawyers held at the Army and Navy Club, Washington, D. C., on June 24, 1946.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Salah and his associate who came with him to America, the Honorable Chalakany Bey.

The address follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it is a great honor to my friend, Chalakany Bey, and to myself to be delegated by the national bar of Egypt to attend in Washington the Executive Council meeting of the United Nations League of Lawyers. It is not for mere courtesy that we have come here to respond to the generous invitation sent to Egyptian lawyers, but it is to collaborate in the heavy task which the eminent lawyers of this great country have taken upon themselves to fulfill. The information of a league of lawyers of the United Nations is neither an easy job to perform nor a simple idea which could become a reality as soon as it is perceived; but it requires great effort, perseverance, and complete conviction of the benefits to be derived from the idea itself. We have observed the excellent work of those great lawyers who have made it their individual business to bring the proposal into existence; and as we see it taking concrete form and rapidly developing into a strong institution, its world influence in the near future well may be anticipated, whereupon we shall pay just homage to the ardent pioneers of the United Nations League of Lawyers.

We have come to this country to prove that we appreciate the proposal, that we shall do the best in our power and in our capacity to contribute to its success, and that by the steps we have taken in participating with you in the initial stages of this organization we mean seriously to share with you the burdens that are incumbent on your shoulders in the building of the league. By these means we will have the honor of sharing with the lawyers of the United Nations the glory of a deed which should benefit all mankind in thus contributing to the preservation of world peace and security. Among the objects of the league of lawyers, as it is written in its constitution, is the promotion of friendship and understanding between lawyers of the different nations and between the nations themselves. That is a superb idea, because in reality the world is in need of free organizations to promote friendship and understanding among all nations, and a league of lawyers of the United Nations will be the most appropriate and most effective means to that end.

Official organizations are not so promising in this way, since their means are restricted by laws, traditions, and political protocol. But free organizations like the United Nations League of Lawyers can serve that great purpose of promoting friendship and understanding between nations and to make law the basis of international dealings. Lawyers who practice law every day can do a great deal in a world that up until the present moment does not give credit except to force. It is fortunate that we lawyers begin our work on the eve of peace, after every nation has suffered much in the war and when there is now a tendency throughout the world to to heed the voice of law and equity.

It is a happy coincidence that has occurred today, which we regard as a good omen to our activities. That is the celebration of the proceedings of the inauguration of Hon. Fred M. Vinson, the new Chief Justice of the United States, in which we participated—thanks to Colonel Rice, secretary-general of our League, who has contributed much to our entertainment from the very moment we landed in your great country. He and Mr. Morell and many other friends in Washington have shown us every courtesy and attention. I thank them heartily.

I wish I had the time to give you some idea of the lawyers in Egypt. Egypt is not only the land of the Nile and the Pyramids, but Egypt has done a great deal to restore her greatness. As it was once the source of all ancient civilization and law, it endeavors to participate with the great nations of today and to share with them upon the same level. As regards justice, we have a system of laws and courts that assures to everyone justice and equality under law. With respect to lawyers, we have a legal association that is acknowledged by law, and no lawyer can practice before the courts without being accepted by the committee, of which the lawyers are in the majority. Our Egyptian association has the right to assess taxes, the payment of which is obligatory; otherwise, the lawyer is canceled from the list. This association provides pensions for lawyers who demand it upon reaching the age of 55 or 60 years. This and other rights and duties make of our association a flourishing and useful organization. We have brought with us a copy of the law recognizing our association, which my friend, Dr. Chalakany, and myself, during my presidency of the Egyptian bar, had the honor to propose to our parliament, and it was ratified and adopted.

In concluding, I must recognize the great work which the American people are doing in Egypt through their communities there. We can never forget the American University there, where many of our country lads are taught your ideas and morals.

We shall report to our countrymen the hospitality which we have received in this great city of Washington, where the late great President Roosevelt resided while participating in the overthrow of the Axis Powers, and where now resides President Truman, with whom we had the honor to shake hands today, and who is on the alert to win the peace as his predecessor was in the winning of the war.

Preservation of the American Form of Government in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES W. VURSELL
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. VURSELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of CARROLL REECE, chairman of the Republican National Committee, before the Hartford Women's Republican organization, Hartford, Conn., Monday, July 15, 1946:

I want to talk with you tonight about a very practical and very important problem. The problem is the preservation of the American form of government in the United States. I believe everyone will agree with me that that is important.

On the practical side, the question is, what can we do to make sure that our system of government is not destroyed? The answer to that is very simple and very practical. We can elect a Republican Congress in November 1946. It will not be easy but it can and will be done. W have tremendous opposition to overcome; not only the Democratic Party, with its three million war chest and hordes of officeholders, but also the CIO-PAC in which is corraled the radical and subversive groups in America with its boasted six million war chest. But the people are aroused to the danger and are looking to the Republican Party, through our institutions of free enterprise and private property, to be saved.

I have found in recent trips to various parts of the Nation that too many of our citizens are talking about the Presidential election of 1948 and too few of them are thinking about the congressional election of 1946. Now, I am sure no one is more interested than I am in the election of a Republican President in 1948, but 1948 is 2 years away; 1946 is with us now. It is less than 4 months until election day, November 5.

We cannot elect a Republican President this year because there is no Presidential election, but we can elect a Republican Congress this year and that includes the Senate as well as the House.

Incidentally, I would like to point out that whoever may be your favorite candidate for the 1948 Republican Presidential nomination, that nomination will be infinitely more valuable to him if we elect a Republican Congress this year. To my mind, one of the greatest disservices which could be rendered to the Republican Party and to the Nation would be for Republicans this year to become involved in bickerings and maneuverings concerning their 1948 Presidential candidate.

Let's win the 1946 fight before we get into the battle of 1948.

I said a few moments ago that the election of a Republican Congress this year would guarantee the preservation of our free, liberal, American system of government. I wish to say also that failure to elect a Republican Congress this year will expose the Nation to grave danger that our historic system will not survive.

That may appear to be an extreme statement to those who have not taken the time or trouble for careful study of the situation in which we find ourselves today. Nevertheless, the facts will sustain my contention.

The party which is in power today—if it can be called a party—is one which is made up of three distinct and mutually antagonistic elements.

There is the South which is held captive in the Democratic Party by the chains of an archaic tradition. It is really a shame that so many good Americans in our southern States are prevented from registering their views on national issues through their elected representatives in Congress. In effect, these representatives are enslaved by the left-wing elements which dominate the Democratic Party. So long as the South chooses to adhere to the one-party system, I know of no effective remedy for this situation.

There are the big city machines whose masters are in politics for what they can get out of politics.

Then there is the radical group which has been so aptly called the Red-Fascists. It is this group which seeks, through the medium of the Democratic Party to fasten upon this Nation the very form of government against which we have just waged a great and victorious war. It is this group, beholden to the political ideology of Moscow which is the most important. It is the most important because, for all intents and purposes, it has captured control of the Democratic Party.

I do not for a moment suggest that a majority, or even a major faction of registered Democrats in the United States, believe in this Red fascism which seeks to mask itself under the label of liberalism. What I do mean to say however, is that members of this radical group have insinuated themselves into positions of great power on the policymaking level in the Democratic Party and in the present Democratic administration in Washington. They call the tune to which the administration dances, and the tune is strongly like the Internationale.

The men and women who have been abroad in this war can tell you that the farmer in Italy, or in Germany, or in Russia, was not a man, but a public utility. They can tell you that the workmen of Italy, Germany, and Russia are not free, independent citizens and members of free independent trade-unions, but chattels of the state. They can tell you that the housewives and white-collar workers, the big and little businessmen in those countries, were at the mercy of men who did not hesitate to use government power against any citizen. They can tell you that the confusion and compulsions today are symptoms of the attempt to establish Red fascism in this country. You see princes of political privilege flaunt their powers before the American people while the puppets of a political monopoly use instruments of public power to shackle the liberties of the people. They planned it that way. They cry out for more and more power in the name of humanitarian ideals. They abuse that power and use it to destroy our society, our Government, our security, our prosperity, and our freedom.

What is fascism, and how does it differ from communism? Fascism is the exaltation of the state over the people, and then the establishment of a dictator and his henchmen, as the state, as in Italy under Mussolini. The difference between fascism and communism, actually, is a difference in terms only. Communism is the exaltation of the state over the people, and then the establishment of a dictator and his henchmen as the state—as in Soviet Russia under Stalin.

Now, what is this Red fascism which parades under the cloak of liberalism in our country? It is just some more of the same old poison with another label on the bottle. Their effort in these United States is to broaden and increase the control of the Federal Government over the people—and to displace government of laws in favor of government by men. The ultimate consequence would be the same as in Italy, or Germany, or Russia—dictatorship at the top, and a crushed, enslaved people at the bottom. So, then, as I speak of Red fascism I mean the same brand of political and social and industrial and governmental poison we have seen operate in other countries. We want none of it in free America, but unless we make a determined fight these mercenary men, lustful for power, will continue to work and scheme to fasten Red fascism upon us.

It is a sad and regrettable fact that President Truman has delivered the influence of the White House over to the men who would establish Red fascism here. It is a sad and regrettable fact that the Chairman of the Democratic National Committee, with White House consent, has delivered over the Democratic Party machinery to the radical reactionaries who would establish Red fascism here in America. It is a sad and regrettable fact that the influence of the White House and the Democratic Party machinery is being used to purge from the Democratic Party duly elected representatives of the people who believe in our free American system, and who oppose bitterly the establishment of this alien system here.

The Democratic Party, ruptured by this struggle between the Reds and other radical reactionaries and true Americans, can no longer provide an administration in conformity with traditional American freedom. The best statesmen of the Democratic Party who believe in American principles can secure harmony within their party only by foreswearing their scruples and lining up with the enemies of our American system.

In this land of plenty you have seen no suits, no shirts, no meat, no butter. Our fighters went away to war regarding themselves and their countrymen as free Americans. They returned to an America baffled by strikes, violence, stoppages, and confusion. They find American homes shaken with fear of the future. They went away with a feeling they were performing their duty as American citizens, they returned to find powerful and selfish men thinking nothing of duty and responsibility to coming generations, but only of their own personal political fortunes. Why does this happen here in America? Because the New Deal dickered and dealt with men wanting secret power. The administration traded lopsided, unfair governmental favors and influence for votes and political support in the black markets of the racketeers and exploiters. It traded the administration's integrity and the people's trust for a mess of political pottage. Now the pottage has disappeared and we have only the mess. It has happened because the New Deal administration—which Mr. Truman asserts over and over again is still in power under his Presidency—sold itself and the country into the hands of political extortioners and blackmailers, and the Nation is paying the bitter price of that unholy deal.

This happens in America because the men holding the real power in the administration have lost both their sense of direction and their sense of dedication. It happens because these radical and mercenary men, in their determination to stay in power, and to establish an alien rule here are thwarting your Constitution, undermining your rights, and tearing at the very foundations of American free society. They are teaching class hate instead of tolerance; dissension instead of the cooperative spirit; organized and bureaucratic tyranny instead of a rule of, by, and for the people; and you are suffering the consequences.

That we have seen shortages of lumber, of building supplies, of houses for veterans, and a hundred other essential items is their failure; that we have strikes instead of prosperity is their failure; that you and your family owe $8,000 as your share of a government debt piled up by their inefficiency and extravagance is their failure; that we have inflation right here and now is their failure; that we have a huge bureaucracy which eats your earnings in taxes and bosses your life by propaganda and Government control is their failure; but even all these are not the real issue. The real issue is whether the people shall be at the mercy of the unscrupulous men who now control this administration, or whether the Government of the United States belongs to you.

The Democratic Party is powerless to rid the Nation of this Red reactionary menace. For it to do so would amount to deliberate self-destruction. The leaders of the Democratic Party know full well that they have no remote chance to retain power nationally without the help and assistance of this radical fringe.

So, the only alternative presented to those who wish to preserve our system of government is to make sure that we elect a Republican Congress in November. I believe that what I have said thus far outlines very clearly the difference between the Democrat and the Republican Parties. The Democrats have fallen under the control of those who would destroy our system of government; Republicans have no such embarrassing alliances and will do everything possible to preserve the system under which this Nation has become the envy of the entire world.

There is still another way of stating the difference between the two parties. The made-in-Moscow philosophies of those who now control the destinies of the Democrat Party teaches that the people belong to the state. So did Mussolini. So did Hitler. So did the war lords of Japan. The Republican philosophy, the American philosophy, is that the government belongs to the people, and the people belong only to God. It is this latter philosophy which will be translated into action, into legislation, by a Republican Congress following the elections of next November.

I can think of no group in our population which should be more keenly interested in the promoting of Republican, of American, principles than the women of the United States. They have more to lose if a contrary philosophy prevails. Contrast the status of women in Germany under Hitler, in Italy under Mussolini, with that which prevails in the United States today, for a striking illustration of the truth of what I have just said. It is customary for those who oppose the Republican or American philosophy of government to sneer at the American Constitution. I fear that those of us who believe in and support the Constitution have been somewhat careless about bringing home to the citizens of this Nation the real significance of that historic document. Too many of our citizens, I fear, think of the Constitution as something which they were compelled to memorize during their school days. They do not, I am afraid, appreciate that the observance of, or the violation of the provisions of the Constitution, affects their daily lives in an infinite variety of ways.

It is the Constitution which prevents the United States or any State from interfering with your right to worship God as you please. It is the Constitution of the United States which prevents human slavery in this Nation. It is the Constitution which guarantees to me my right to stand here tonight and exercise the right of free speech in addressing you, and which protects you in your right to assemble here to listen. There are many nations in the world today, covering a major portion of the earth's surface, in which a meeting such as this could not be held. There are many nations in which opposition parties have only those rights which the ruling group wishes to accord to them, and there are many other nations in which there are no opposition parties at all—because they are not permitted.

I know it has been the custom among the Red-Fascists and their stooges and dupes, to sneer at the Constitution as an instrument designed to protect private property. It certainly is designed to protect private property. True, human rights come first but one of the first instances of human rights is the right to hold property. There are many other rights of individuals which must and will be protected, but the right to earn honestly and to retain and use the fruits of individual endeavor is one which is the basis of any free liberal civilization. I cannot conceive of a society in which such rights as freedom of speech and of religion are protected, but the right of private ownership of property is prohibited. If there is no private ownership of property each individual then becomes dependent for his livelihood, for his shelter, for his food, upon the whim of some Government official. He may get enough to eat, he may have a roof over his head, but it will not be his to choose what he eats, or when and where his home is located. Such a society is not a free society.

The Federal Constitution came into existence little more than 150 years ago. For several thousand years of recorded history and for tens of thousands of years before that, man had been struggling for a system of government which would guarantee his rights as a free individual. I think it is significant that in the century and a half since our Constitution was adopted, we have made more progress in science, in the methods of producing the things needed for health, for comfort, and for protection, than in all of the centuries since the beginning of the Christian era to the adoption of our Constitution. At the time our Constitution was adopted, if men traveled by land, they walked or they road on horseback, or perhaps they were drawn by horses in carriages. The same was true at the beginning of the Christian era. If men were traveling by water, they were propelled by oars or by sails, both in the year 1 A. D. and at the time the Constitutional Convention assembled in Philadelphia. If men wished to communicate with each other, their messages were carried by the same means of transportation which I have just mentioned. Railroads, and steamboats, and electric power were unknown. The telephone, the telegraph, were in the same category. Surgeons performed operations without benefit of anesthetics, and without the slightest knowledge of the techniques of preventing infection. As someone so truly said, it was then the custom for the surgeon to wash his hands after the operation, but not before.

Compare the conditions which I have just described with those which prevail today, even in countries which by our standards are comparatively backward. And remember that all of these advances made have been made since our forefathers brought into being a new instrument of government—an instrument of government which was liberal because it provided for liberty, because it guaranteed the rights of individuals and protected individuals in the ownership and use of the results of their labors.

I believe it is unecessary—before this audience, at least—to develop further the advantages of our system over all those which preceded it and over many of those which exist throughout the world today. The hard, practical question confronting us is what to do to win this election, to make sure that we do not slip back into the abyss of tyranny and slavery—for the two always go together—with which we are threatened today. The answer is organization, hard work, unceasing endeavor. Votes are not counted until they are in the ballot box. Sometimes it is even necessary to take precautions to make sure that they are counted then. What I am trying to say is that we are not going to win this election by sitting around in drawing rooms and clubs and condemning the bungling of our present administration and denouncing the philosophies of those who direct that administration along its wayward course. We are going to win only by making sure that we arouse the voters to the point where they actually cast their votes for our candidates. If we do not do that, we do not deserve to win. Freedom is worth fighting for, and those who are not willing to fight for it do not deserve to have it. I am sure that we can count on the cooperation—the hard-working, continuous cooperation—of every person present here tonight, and, for that matter, of the vast majority of all the women of America. That means carrying the message back to your respective homes and neighborhoods. Interest others in our fight for the preservation of the American system of government. See that they take active part along with you. There will be hard work involved, but the stake for which we are contending is well worth all of the sacrifices we may be called upon to make.

A Republican victory this year will be a victory for the United States of America.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1946

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter which I have received from Chester Bowles:

OFFICE OF ECONOMIC STABILIZATION,
Washington, D. C., July 10, 1946.

Hon. EUGENE J. KEOGH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KEOGH: I cannot leave Washington without telling you how deeply grateful I am to you for being such a faithful friend of the stabilization program.

I know there have been times during the long, tough struggle to make price control effective when we did not see eye to eye on some issue or other. Obviously, there is no way to make price control completely painless. Perhaps, if there had been a way, we wouldn't have had quite so much trouble the last 2 or 3 weeks.

However, I still feel that with a good law and adequate funds to administer it, there is still a chance of keeping prices and rents reasonably stable, and to achieve the labor-management cooperation we need if we are going to get over the production hump this fall.

I am very sorry to be leaving the program myself, even though it's been a long, grueling assignment. However, I felt that my resignation would help to clear the air and force a decision on the merits of the issue itself. The President showed tremendous courage in vetoing the bill as it was, and I certainly hope that his action will help to bring about the kind of firm legislation that is needed if we are to accomplish the tasks ahead.

No matter how it all comes out, I certainly trust that there will be no bitterness between the various groups in the economy who worked so well together during the war. Any recriminations now would simply make it harder to work out the answers for the problems we face today.

Again many thanks for the many times you have helped me out.

Sincerely,

CHESTER BOWLES.

The Solution of the National Housing Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the Congress and the Government are valiantly trying to find ways to meet the demand for housing facilities for released war veterans. The acute shortage of building material is felt in all lines of endeaver and is seriously hampering the national reconversion plans.

The need is the subject of many letters and communications being received by the Members of Congress. One of these communications and my reply thereto is inserted here:

THE COUNCIL FOR SOCIAL ACTION OF THE CONGREGATIONAL CHRISTIAN CHURCHES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
New York, N. Y., July 13, 1946.

Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WHITE: As an expression of its interest in the early passage of a national bill that would assure a housing program embracing the needs of families in all income groups, the General Council of the Congregational and Christian Churches adopted June 22, during the official biennium meeting of the denomination, the following resolution which I have the pleasure to transmit to you:

"We recommend the establishment of an adequate, comprehensive national redevelopment and housing policy in order that every family may have the advantages of decent, safe, healthful shelter available within its economic means; and we specifically endorse public housing as a method, within the framework of the capitalistic economy, of achieving the aforesaid policy."

The subsection of the general council which prepared the resolution approved in principle legislation known as S. 1592, the Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill, believing that its various provisions would be of greatest assistance to private enterprise in the fields of middle income home ownership and rentals. As you will note, public housing as a method for meeting needs of the lowest income group was specifically endorsed.

It may interest you to know that a majority of the delegates who recommended this resolution to the general council were laymen and that a number of them are engaged in various building operations. The decision of the group was virtually unanimous, reflecting the common judgment that the lack of shelter is one of the Nation's greatest threats to family security and at the same time that Federal action is requisite.

Members of the legislative committee join with me in expressing the hope that you will lend your personal influence to the passage of this measure, and at this time we should especially appreciate your requesting members of the Banking and Currency Committee to report favorably on the bill at once.

I shall be most happy to give you any further information that you may desire upon this appeal of our church to the Congress to enact this legislation.

Yours sincerely,

FRANCIS W. MCPEEK,
Chairman, Legislative Committee, Council for Social Action, Congregational Christian Churches.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington D. C., July 16, 1946.

FRANCIS W. MCPEEK,
Chairman, Legislative Committee, Council for Social Action, Congregational-Christian Churches, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. MCPEEK: I have your letter of July 13 embodying a resolution making certain recommendations as to the National Housing policy.

I am old-fashioned enough to adhere to the social policies and business principles of personal initiative and free enterprise that has advanced our country to its present stage of development.

Now there are 10,000,000 veterans that have been released from the Nation's Armed Forces many in dire need of housing. It appears the existing housing problem resolves itself into a case of "Let George do it."

This Nation has an ample supply of standing timber, clay and stone for the manufacture of an abundance of building material. It has saw mills, brick yards, stone quarries, and the necessary facilities to manufacture a superabundance of building materials, and the transportation facilities to move the building material to any selected site for the construction of needed housing.

The Army has put in the best part of the last 4 years in training a large number of our youth enlisted in the armed forces, now released, in the arts and skills of building construction.

Surely this Nation now has the manpower if those in need of housing were inclined to do what the American pioneers did in order to build the homes and communities of this great Nation—go into the woods and fell the trees, and bring out the logs to supply the sawmills, and man the mills to manufacture the lumber, and follow through by fabricating the lumber and related building materials into finished homes.

As Charles M. Schwab said after World War I: "What America needs to do is to take off its coat, roll up its sleeves, and go to work."

As a southerner, it is my recollection that after the Civil War had left the whites to their own resources, we had a saying: "Root hog or die." The southerners rooted with the result they present to you the South with all the development and abundance found south of the Mason and Dixon Line when World War II broke upon us to upset our national economy.

Let us change our motto and say: Let those in need of housing go to the forest and man the mills and do the job of giving this Nation the housing facilities so urgently needed today.

Sincerely yours,

COMPTON I. WHITE,
Member of Congress.

Two-Hour Walk-out

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial in the New York Times of July 16, 1946:

TWO-HOUR WALK-OUT

Walter Reuther has proposed that the 800,000 members of the UAW leave their jobs in a 2-hour Nation-wide demonstration today in favor of a strong OPA. What will be accomplished by such a walk-out? It will cause inconvenience to consumers and result in a smaller volume of production. The automobile industry is now reported to be producing about 75,000 cars a week. This is an hourly rate of almost 1,900 cars. A 2-hour demonstration would, therefore, mean a reduction of about 3,800 cars in the number produced.

This action is in line with the theory adopted and skillfully publicized by Mr. Reuther that prices must remain rigidly controlled, even though wages are under no such control. In fact, Mr. Reuther has favored strongly a policy of wage boosting by the Government, while the price line is held down. The wartime and postwar record of wages and prices reveals clearly the substantial gains made by workers in manufacturing industries. From January 1941 to date, average hourly earnings have risen more than 55 percent and weekly earnings more than 60 percent, while the cost of living has risen about 35 to 40 percent.

Of course, it is true that living costs have risen since the last wage increase. This is not surprising, since these wage increases inflated costs so that even before the veto of the OPA bill the cost-of-living index was creeping upward slowly. But the increase in the cost of living since the beginning of 1946, and even inclusive of the rise in the last 2 weeks, is still substantially smaller than the 15- to 18-percent increase in hourly wage rates granted in many key industries. The rise in living costs which has taken place in the past 2 weeks reflects largely the elimination of subsidies and hence the shift of these costs from the taxpayer to the consumer. Certainly it is inaccurate to claim that this rise has wiped out the gains achieved by labor earlier this year.

Veterans' Benefits Under Readjustment Act, as Amended

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, a year ago we were thinking of millions of our young men and women as members of the armed forces. We think of them today as veterans, of whose future the Congress was thinking when, in 1944, it enacted the Servicemen's Readjustment Act. At the time it was originally adopted the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, of which I am a member, told Congress and the public it was experimental. It still is. Changes have been made. Possibly more are in store.

Mr. Speaker, so the veterans of my district may know what benefits are provided under this act, as amended, I take this opportunity to explain them in a general way.

ELIGIBILITY

To be eligible for any or all of these benefits the veteran must have been released from service under conditions other than dishonorable, and must either have served not less than 90 days between September 6, 1940, and the end of the war, or have been discharged for a service-connected disability. Rank in service or age makes no difference.

EDUCATION

At any time within 4 years after discharge, or termination of the war, whichever date is later—provided that all such programs must be completed before 9 years after the end of the war—any eligible veteran may receive education for a period of 1 year plus the length of time he was in active service—between September 16, 1940, and the end of the war—with a maximum of 4 years.

To continue for the full period for which he is eligible the veteran must meet the standards established by the school or institution in which he enrolls.

The veteran may choose any approved school that will accept him, and the course he desires to study. He can go to school in any State, but the cost of transportation from his home to the school is his own expense.

The Federal Government pays for all books, supplies, and the customary tuition fees up to $500 per year. While in school he will be paid $65 per month, if single, $90 if married—or has dependents—for subsistence or living expenses. This is enough to help veterans help themselves, and there is no law or regulation against taking outside work. In fact, we knew some outside work would be necessary to enable students to obtain the education they so much desire.

This opportunity is not confined to ordinary schools or colleges. He may take short, intensive, more expensive, specialized courses, the maximum tuition, however, being limited to $500. He may elect to take vocational or apprentice training, in which case part of his maintenance will come from the employer.

Many veterans, while in service, learned the value of correspondence courses. These courses can now be pursued after return to a civilian status, but in this case he does not receive subsistence allowances. The cost of any such course will be established by contract, with a maximum limit of $500.

Education may be commenced while on terminal leave, but no payment is allowed for living expenses until after the leave ends.

These benefits, as of June 1, 1946, had been enjoyed by 839,454 veterans. As of the same date 1,576,273 additional applications had been approved. It has been most gratifying to receive reports from schools all over the country to the effect that returning veterans, with few exceptions, are serious, energetic, and studious, ranking high in their classes.

LOANS

A veteran may apply for loans from nearly every type of lending agency. His honorable discharge is his certificate of eligibility. Other discharges must be passed upon by the Veterans' Administration.

Property loans may be at the figure negotiated with the lending agency, with the limitation that they may not exceed the reasonable value of the property, or the appraisal of an experienced appraiser living in the community where the property is situated, employed by the Veterans' Administration.

Interest on loans is limited to 4 percent. Home loans may not run for more than 25 years, farm loans not over 40 years, and business loans are limited to 10 years.

There are conditions that property on which loans are to be made must be suitable for the purpose for which it is to be used—for a dwelling, for farming operations, or for a business location. It must also be shown in connection with loans for farms or for business that there is a reasonable likelihood that the veteran will succeed in his undertaking as a farmer or as a businessman.

When the loan is finally completed the Government guarantees one-half—50 percent—of the amount loaned, with a maximum guaranty of $4,000 on real-estate loans and of $2,000 on nonreal estate—chattel or personal property—loans. Thus a veteran is now eligible for the Government guaranty on an $8,000 loan on real estate or a $4,000 loan for business.

The veteran may obtain a loan for the purchase of property to be occupied as his home, or to make repairs, improvements, or alterations on a home he already owns.

The veteran may obtain a loan to purchase land, buildings, livestock, machinery, and supplies, if he anticipates engaging in farming.

The veteran who seeks to enter business may obtain a loan to buy land, buildings, supplies, tools, equipment, inventory, and stock in trade, or for the alteration of realty to be used in his business.

Many regulations by the Veterans' Administration must be changed, but no great delay is expected; and the new simplified procedure should speed up loans considerably and eliminate much red tape which has existed.

This does not mean that any veteran can go into any bank or to any lending agency and get a loan up to $8,000 merely for the asking. He goes in as any other person and makes his deal. Of course, the lending agency and the Government want some reasonable assurances of the soundness of the loan—of the ability to repay it and of the value of the security.

One hundred and seventy-eight thousand, one hundred and sixty-two loans for homes, farms, and business, totaling $819,139,000, have been guaranteed by June 21. July 1946 will find the billion-dollar mark passed. Of all these loans only 138 have defaulted, involving payment of only $116,891; 1,181 loans for $1,630,670 have been paid up in full.

This enviable record is a tribute to the veterans, proving them worthy of the trust placed in them whether in war or peace.

EMPLOYMENT

Assistance is provided in placing veterans on jobs, and in each State a veteran is on duty as placement officer to protect the interests of veterans.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

In the event a veteran, after complying with State law relating to registration for work, cannot obtain employment, he may receive $20 per week unemployment allowance—for not to exceed, however, 52 weeks. The period for receipt of this benefit is fixed by length of service—24 weeks for the first 90 days in service, and 4 weeks for each month of service beyond 90 days. In other words, 10 months or more of service entitles a veteran to the maximum.

Restrictions are rigid enough to discourage "gold-bricking" and prevent duplication.

If a veteran goes out as his own boss in business, a profession, or on a farm, an allowance is provided to bring his net income up to $100 per month, with a limit of 12 monthly payments. Application for this benefit must be made within 2 years after discharge or the end of the war, whichever is the later date.

One million seven hundred and sixty-six thousand four hundred and twenty-eight veterans had found it necessary by June 30, 1946, to use this benefit in solving their problems of readjustment, with a total payment of $925,982,197, an average of $524 for each unemployed veteran. About 300,000 self-employed veterans have sought this aid.

HOSPITALS

Despite scarcity of materials and increased costs, hospitals are being built and improved, raising our hopes of eliminating shortages in bed spaces in the near future.

APPLIANCES

Veterans needing artificial appliances can obtain them, with training in their use, and the payment of necessary travel in connection therewith.

Veterans suffering the loss of a leg, or the use thereof, are now eligible for "conveyances."

Under recent regulations veterans using appliances are issued an identification card which authorizes them to receive, wherever they may be, a new appliance immediately, if the old one is damaged beyond repair, or to have immediate repairs made without awaiting special authorization from the Veterans' Administration.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

As amended, Americans who served with our allies may receive benefits hereunder if they now live in the United States and have not applied for or received similar benefits from the nation with whose Army service was rendered.

The Veterans' Administration is given full power to obtain space by building, purchase, or lease.

Section 1505 of the original act provided that in the event any payment in the nature of adjusted compensation is later authorized, benefits and payments received, including payments made by the Government on defaulted loans, under the act were to be deducted from such compensation. This section has now been repealed. However, this repeal is not to be construed as a promise or assurance that, in order to avoid inequalities, such action may not be taken by a future Congress.

MISCELLANEOUS

At the time the Servicemen's Readjustment Act was amended, Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, which relates solely to veterans with service-connected disabilities, was liberalized. Veterans with service-connected disabilities, to whom we owe our greatest obligations, are given training and education to help them overcome physical handicaps and enable them to become self-supporting.

Payments for these men and women while in training have been too low. These disabled veterans will now receive—in addition to all training expenses—$105 if single; $115 with a dependent—wife, child, or parent. Ten dollars per month is allowed for one child, $7 for each additional child, and an allowance of $15 for a dependent parent.

CONCLUSION

This presentation must necessarily just hit the high spots. For detailed information inquire of the nearest Veterans' Administration office, the local posts of the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, the Regular Veterans Association, Order of the Purple Heart, or other veterans' organizations, the Red Cross, or the State veterans' representative.

If you prefer, write ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., who is in Washington to serve the veterans and their families.

Second Class Opportunities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. T. MILLET HAND
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, we are approaching a time when Congress will recess, possibly for the rest of the year. A considerable number of important pieces of legislation have not yet been considered. A proper social-security bill, many national health measures, and a minimum-wage bill are among those that have not been put on the House Calendar, and I am particularly disappointed that legislative maneuvers have prevented this Congress from passing adequate legislation on the subject of fair employment practices.

I had not been in Congress much over a month before I fulfilled a promise made to the people of my district and spoke out definitely in favor of FEPC. On February 23, 1945, I made the following statement:

Mr. Speaker, there is now pending in the House H. R. 2232, a bill to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry. Its purpose is to put into form of permanent law that equality of opportunity to work, and to achieve a decent standard of living which I had always supposed to be one of the foundations of our great Republic, and which is certainly essential to the unity, strength, and health of our future.

You will note that I stress the word opportunity. I do not believe it is the Nation's function to guarantee the comforts and happiness of its citizens, but I do sincerely believe that our Constitution directs us to preserve for all our people the chance to work, live, and pursue happiness, free from discrimination, prejudice, or improper control from any source.

Mr. Speaker, the very nature of Americanism is the protection of the vital rights of minorities, both with respect to their political freedom, and their rights as individuals to live self-respecting lives. Among those important minorities are 13,000,000 Americans who are Negroes. Seven hundred thousand of them now serve in the armed forces, and millions are producing in our war plants. The future of these Americans depends largely on the wisdom with which we now act.

I, for one, will welcome the opportunity to support the bill. I hope that history may record that the Seventy-ninth Congress was responsible for this great social advance in America.

It is apparent that the hope I then expressed is not going to be realized. The Seventy-ninth Congress is not going to be given the opportunity of even voting on this question.

Quite early in the session the House Committee on Labor favorably reported H. R. 2232, "A bill to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, creed, color, national origin, or ancestry." A similar bill in the Senate was likewise favorably reported by a vote of 12 to 5. Every Republican Member except one voted in favor of this legislation. However, parliamentary maneuvers have since killed FEPC, and those maneuvers have reflected no credit on Congress or the rules under which we operate. If and when we pass a bill to reorganize the procedures in Congress, I hope we will prevent the recurrence of this year's spectacle. In the Senate, the bill was prevented from reaching a vote by a filibuster conducted by southern Democrats for nearly a month, which not only killed the bill, but prevented the Senate of the United States from transacting any public business of consequence for that length of time. In the House, the bill has never reached the floor even for debate, because of refusal of the Rules Committee—by a majority of one, again a Democrat—to grant a rule for its consideration.

Notwithstanding the action of the Rules Committee, proponents of FEPC, of which I was one, continued their efforts to have the legislation considered on a Calendar Wednesday. By the device of forcing constant roll calls on nonessential matters, again a small group of southern Democrats—what Woodrow Wilson might have called a "little group of willful men"—have succeeded in preventing the House from considering FEPC and again, as in the Senate, have succeeded in wasting a day a week of the time of the House since May 15. Despite the crowded and unfinished calendar of work which the House of Representatives had to do, persistent and continuous motions were made to adjourn, motions which were resisted, I am glad to say, by 95 percent of the Republican Members of the House.

Nevertheless, the tactics were successful in keeping FEPC off the floor, and there is no hope for the legislation, in my opinion, unless we change the political complexion of the House, as well as its antiquated rules of procedure.

Mr. Speaker, FEPC, which existed under Presidential decree, died on June 30, 1946. In its letter of resignation addressed to the President, the Committee said:

The Committee's wartime experience shows that in the majority of cases discriminatory practices by employers and unions can be reduced or eliminated by simple negotiation when the work of the negotiator is backed up by firm and explicit national policy.

FEPC unsolved cases show that Executive authority is not enough to insure compliance in the face of stubborn opposition. Only legislative authority will insure compliance in the small number of cases in which employees or unions or both refused, after negotiation, to abide by the national policy of nondiscrimination.

Studies made by and for the Committee since VJ-day show that the wartime gains of colored, Mexican-American, and Jewish workers are being dissipated through an unchecked revival of discriminatory practices. The future status of minority-group workers depends, the Committee believes, on the course of action to be taken by the Congress relative to the passage of Federal fair-employment legislation.

There are no requirements for fair-employment practices now, and there will be none until Congress acts. The work that the Committee did, even with its limited authority, was important. It is reported that during its 5 years of existence it settled 5,000 cases, including 40 strikes caused by racial differences.

It must also be remembered that minority groups among war veterans are meeting difficulties in school apprentice training and loans, often as the result of racial discrimination.

I have been and remain convinced that minority groups in excess of 20,000,000 in our country, including not less than 13,000,000 Americans who are Negroes are entitled to protection in their job opportunities. If the fight cannot be won in the Seventy-ninth Congress it must be won in the Eightieth, and we must put an end to practices which prevent the Congress from having at least the opportunity of passing on this important question of broad national policy. It can never be accomplished under our present leadership or with our present rules.

Price Control of Grain Means More Black-Marketing

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am just in receipt of a telegram from an experienced grain dealer in the wheat-growing section of Oklahoma. He has had 30 years' experience in buying, handling, and selling grain. His experience undoubtedly qualifies him as a witness on the subject of restoration of price controls on grain. The people of my section would rather trust his judgment than that of some theoretical "New Dealocrat." Here is what he says in a telegram addressed to me under date of July 13, 1946:

We understand Monday House will start consideration price-control legislation. In your vote on this legislation you face one of gravest responsibilities your career. Based on 30 years' experience grain and milling business, our sincere judgment is that if ceilings reimposed on grain and grain products the blackest and most disreputable market will immediately return and largest portion of milling and grain trade will be shut down and only operations that will continue will be those black-market operators who always make unconscionable profits from Government regulations that are impractical. Voting for price controls on grains and grain products means voting for black markets and higher prices than will exist under open competition. You are practical man and we earnestly urge you do all you can to defeat further price control on grain and grain products. We assure you the man who does legislate these controls back on grain and grain products will have to bear responsibility for chaotic and disgraceful aftermath that will inevitably follow. We fully realize many individuals are asking you for price controls. They are very sincere but they do not realize Uncle Sam has been paying their grocery bills through subsidies and they are too inexperienced in workings of economics to understand the inevitability of black market returning if price controls on agricultural products extended and the extent to which they as individuals will suffer. All chance for effective price control was lost when President Truman vetoed the recent bill.

Some Facts About a Famous Disease

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an editorial from the Star, the official organ of the patients of the United States Marine Hospital, Carville, La., of which Mr. Stanley Stein is editor, entitled "Further Facts":

FURTHER FACTS

Despite the fact that among the many leprosaria scattered throughout the world thousands of well workers, religious and lay, have been in daily association with the patients, the incidence of infection is very small. In some of these cases reasonable doubt existed as to whether the individual acquired the infection in the leprosarium. This is especially true when the infested person is a native of a section of the country where the disease occurs frequently, or when the disease is known to have existed in the family. During its 51 years of existence, hundreds of persons from neighboring communities have been employed at the Carville Leprosarium as plumbers, painters, cafeteria help, clerical workers, laboratory technicians, etc. With but one possible exception (a native of this endemic section) not a single member of the personnel has contracted the disease. This is a remarkable record, considering that this hospital is located almost within the heart of the most endemic section of the most endemic State in the Union, and one would expect more cases to develop by sheer coincidence. What tuberculosis sanatorium can point to such a record?

Facts, based on actual experience over a long period of years (the most valid scientific yardstick), furnish indubitable proof of the remoteness of the communicability of Hansen's Disease.

The transmission of the disease is the big problem in Hansen's. Once that is determined, the 6,000-year-old practice of imprisoning a person for life because he happens to be sick will be done away with.

Hansen's is not included in the list of quarantinable diseases in New York State and patients in that State are subject to no restrictions. (1 down, 47 to go.)

Since Hansen's isolation of the baccilus, hundreds of attempts have been made to grow it in artificial media, but to date none of these have successfully met the requirement for proof, and all attempted inoculations of animals have been unsuccessful to the same extent. No scientist in more than 145 recorded cases has been able to infect himself or other human volunteers, by attempted inoculation of the germ.

In 1874, G. Armauer Hansen, a Norwegian physician, announced his discovery of the germ which causes the disease. In appearance and size it closely resembles the germ which causes tuberculosis, the tubercle bacillus. In single organisms it is impossible for the "laboratory" to distinguish between the two germs.

A man or woman may remain in perfect health for years after contracting Hansen's disease. Half the patients now at Carville could sit unnoted in any social gathering.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am also including a letter from Assistant Surgeon General R. C. Williams, of the United States Public Health Service, to Mr. Paul A. Strachan, president, American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, and an article authorized by the Public Health Service, entitled "Medical and Social Aspects of Hansen's Disease":

FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY,
UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, July 3, 1946.

MR. PAUL A. STRACHAN,
President, American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, Inc., Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. STRACHAN: Your letter of May 29, 1946, addressed to Dr. G. H. Faget, medical officer in charge, United States Marine Hospital, Carville, La., has been forwarded to this office in order that the statement prepared by Dr. Faget concerning the medical and social aspects of Hansen's disease may be reviewed and approved.

The Public Health Service is, of course, interested in programs to aid the physically handicapped, and particularly any such program which would take into consideration persons afflicted with Hansen's disease. It is hoped, therefore, that the enclosed statement prepared by Dr. Faget will be of some assistance to you.

Sincerely yours,

R. C. WILLIAMS,
Assistant Surgeon General, Bureau of Medical Services.

MEDICAL AND SOCIAL ASPECTS OF HANSEN'S DISEASE

Hansen's disease (leprosy) is a communicable disease caused by a germ which closely resembles the tubercle bacillus. It seems less communicable than tuberculosis.

Hansen's disease is a chronic disease which attacks more men than women in this country in the proportion of two and one-half men for every woman. Patients hospitalized at the national leprosarium average 35 years of age on admission and have had the disease about 5 years prior to admission. As a general rule, therefore, the patient who is admitted for treatment is a breadwinner, who is thus separated from his family. Even the admission of a mother is a terrible blow to the family, particularly if the children are young. Leprosy being a chronic disease for which there is as yet no specific cure, the average patient remains under treatment for many years and often for life.

The family is left to shift for itself and often must rely upon State welfare funds for the necessities of life.

Hansen's is a family disease. It is not itself hereditary, but the germ is passed from one generation to another. Children are more susceptible than adults. A special lack of resistance in children seems to be an inherited characteristic. To separate the parent from the children protects them. There is greater likelihood of secondary cases in the family if living conditions in the household are not satisfactory. Financial distress causes overcrowding, poor sanitary home conditions, and undernutrition. These are all predisposing factors to leprosy.

Furthermore, mental unrest on the part of the patient due to worries over his family's financial distress obstructs the most efficient medical treatment and frequently results in advance of the disease. Also worry over the family is one of the chief causes of patients leaving the leprosarium against medical advice.

Hansen's is a mutilating disease. Often, when the disease finally reaches the arrested stage and the patient is no longer a menace to the public and ready for discharge, he is so debilitated that he is physically unable to earn a decent living for himself and family. The disabilities due to the disease are the results of anesthesia of the hands and feet, atrophy of muscles of the extremities, contraction of the fingers, and bone absorption in fingers and toes. Such hands are permanently disabled for any skilled labor. Such feet are often distorted and unable to support the patient at any ambulatory occupation. Furthermore, even patients who are discharged with little or no recognizable disability may carry the stigmata associated with leprosy in the public mind with them. Such individuals encounter difficulties in obtaining suitable employment at any trade or profession where past references are required. To say that they spent the last few years at the National Leprosarium will in most instances eliminate them from consideration for desirable employment.

Thus Hansen's disease patients may therefore be included in the handicapped group. Mention should also be made here of the fact that this disease leads to blindness in a considerable percentage of patients.

Much good from a public health standpoint would accrue from financial assistance to each victim of Hansen's disease. At present there are 1,000 or more patients at large slowly propagating the disease to the healthy. If, whenever one of these patients were isolated at the National Leprosarium, he received adequate financial assistance, many more patients would be induced to apply voluntarily for admission. The larger the number hospitalized, the smaller the yearly crop of new cases. Hence the eventual eradication of the disease.

Financial assistance would deter absconding since such absconders would forfeit their compensation. Assistance to the patients' families might also prevent development of new cases by bettering their home living conditions.

At present the United States Public Health Service employs 112 patients as attendants. This is considered as beneficial occupational therapy besides giving the patient some financial assistance for the useful work they accomplish. Patients who are too sick or crippled are not employed.

A Plea for Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM LANGER
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address entitled "A Plea for Justice" delivered by Rabbi L. Haufman at Fargo, N. Dak., on July 8, 1946, on the occasion of the National Prayer for Palestine.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At this twilight hour we gather to pray unto our Father in Heaven, to call unto Him in our anguish and pain, in our disappointment and resentment. "A-nei-nu" (answer us, O Lord, answer us, for we are in great trouble).

Never before have we been so shamefully degraded and betrayed as in this hour. To be sure, Jewish life for the last 2,000 years has not been a "bed of roses," for in every generation there have been those who have risen to destroy us. From the day Rome desolated the land of Judea, demolished Jerusalem, burned the temple, and drove our ancestors captive before them—our people have lived in a virtual captivity both dark and cruel.

Innocent Jewish blood was shed in every land of the Old World and in every century, whether the enemy was one of the fanatical Mohammedans or the equally unmerciful executioners of the Spanish Inquisition. The River Rhine flowed with Jewish blood from the cities of Mayence, Worms, and Frankfort, as did the Vistula, Don, and Dnieper in Poland and Russia. Each succeeding page of Israel's history added more and more names to the roll of men, women, and children who died "Al Kiddush Hashem" (for the sanctity of God's name).

The climax, the ultimate in cruelty, we ourselves witnessed in our day, when only yesterday, so to speak, we saw the deliberate attempt of the Nazis to obliterate the name of Israel from the face of the earth.

Yet, tragic as these centuries were, we had our consolation. If we had our torturers, we also had our rescuers; if we had our enemies, we also had our friends. If Spain drove us out, Holland welcomed us with open arms. If France and Germany pogromized the children of Israel, thousands fled to Poland and Russia, where they found refuge. And when those countries too turned against our people Israel, the Wanderer of the Ages, migrated to the New World.

Then came the time when the hopes and dreams engendered by 2,000 years of wandering, when the fervent prayers of our sacred literature, were crystallized into the one thought of "Shivas Zion" (the return to the land of our fathers). That desire to return became a driving urge, a burning passion, in the hearts of our people.

Thousands upon thousands of our best sons came to Palestine to rebuild it anew, drain its swamps, reforest its barren hills, reclaim its soil. Many fulfilled the words of the Psalmist—they sowed with "tears, sweat, and blood." Churchill was not the first to recognize the meaning of that phrase. Our pioneers in Palestine fulfilled those words years before Churchill's ascent to the premiership of the empire. Many of these pioneers, our sons, died in the attempt to make this neglected wasteland a place for human habitation.

But the tragedy of our day lies in the fact that those friends in whom we placed our confidence, the leaders of that nation professing to be God-fearing, Bible-loving, pious, and divinely-inspired—the British—and that party which we hoped would some day be the steward of the great commonwealth of nations—the British Labor Party—both have so brazenly betrayed us!

Only a year ago in the spring this party, in conference assembled, pledged—so to speak—its word, faith, and honor to uphold the just claims of the Jewish people relating to Palestine and adopted a resolution in favor of the Jewish commonwealth even on both sides of the Jordan. No sooner had this party come into power than, like the cupbearer of Pharaoh in the Bible tale, it forgot all its pious resolutions "Va-yish-ko-chai-hoo."

Now when after V-day the remnant of Hitler's victims still languish in the displaced persons camps with no place to flee except to Palestine; and after the President of the United States solemnly and sincerely requested that—for the present at least—100,000 of these unfortunates be admitted into Eretz Yisroel (which resolution was unanimously recommended by the Joint Anglo-American Inquiry Commission)—the political leaders of the empire "upon which the sun never sets" are found deliberately pursuing a policy of negation and frustration.

In order to justify this betrayal, the Palestine government—with the blessings of the modern Balak and Belaam twins (Atlee and Bevin)—set out on a chase for hidden arms. They contended that the Jewish settlement was armed to the teeth, ready to pounce upon the British Empire. So the full power of that empire (tanks, armored cars, infantry, airplanes) was unleashed against the peaceful agricultural Jewish settlements in Palestine and the cities of Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

When did this happen? The day was Saturday, June 29, the peaceful day of rest for the Jewish people—a day that will go down "in infamy" alongside Pearl Harbor. Simultaneously, the Jewish leaders of Palestine were unceremoniously arrested as dangerous individuals. One of these "dangerous men" was Rabbi Judah Leib Fishman, age 71, who was awakened in the early hours of the morning and "persuaded" to ride in a truck—thereby desecrating the Sabbath—by a blow from a British soldier, a soldier who in this manner felt he was defending the empire.

Thousands of others were arrested, men whose sons gave their lives at Tobruk, El Alamein, Eritrea, Ethiopia, etc., infiltrating into the Nazi lines in North Africa and holding the bridges of Syria to prevent their surrender to the enemy. All this for the sake of holding the lifeline of the empire!

Not since the days of Rome has Jewish Palestine suffered so unjustly. We can truthfully say with Jeremiah, "The ways of Zion do mourn." Agricultural settlements which had bloomed 10 days previous are in ruins; Tel Aviv is a beleaguered city; the offices of the Jewish Agency (the legally recognized representative of world Jewry as far as Palestine is concerned) is in shambles; the leaders of the Yishuv are imprisoned; the people bewildered.

What can be done? As righteous people and citizens of the United States, we can and must take two steps: First, we must turn to our God and pray. "Behold, oh Lord, what has befallen us," for the Guardian of Israel "sleepeth not nor slumbereth." Surely if we be worthy He will take up the cause of our martyrs since time immemorial as well as of today. Let us pour forth our hearts unto Him in fervent supplication and petition Him, the healer of all mankind, to heal Israel's wounds so our people may not perish from the earth.

Second, with the help of God, let us cry out unto the world. It may not be a voice in the wilderness. If there exists but one iota of nobility in the universe, if the world has not yet completely bartered its soul for oil, raw materials, and markets, there will be men and women who will recognize the justice of our cause and will come to our aid.

Let the conscience of the world be awakened so the martyr par excellence—Israel—who has found no rest even unto today, together with Palestine, that one island of light in the sea of a dark present, may receive surcease for its woes and balm for its troubled heart. We call out unto the diplomats and the architects of the world's future, "Release the leaders of Palestinian Jewry languishing now in prison. Cease the ruthless destruction of Jewish property in the land of our fathers. Admit immediately the minimum of 100,000 Jewish refugees into the Holy Land as requested by President Truman and recommended by the Joint Anglo-American Inquiry Commission." We call out to the gentlemen of the conference halls, "Gentlemen, open your hearts unto the suffering sons of Israel and grant them their cherished corner of the earth's surface which they may call their home and where they may be freely rehabilitated. With the help of God, permit them to help create and uphold a world based on righteousness, justice, and loving kindness, which principles—as the prophets of old enunciated—represent the only salvation for the children of man and the sons of God."

Opportunity for 5,000,000 "Dirt Foresters"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

OPPORTUNITY FOR 5,000,000 "DIRT FORESTERS"

(Based on an interview with Congressman FRANK E. HOOK, of Michigan, by Ellery Foster, research director, International Woodworkers of America, CIO)

Millions of ordinary people who love to work with trees and wildlife will have the chance to do it and make it pay when the Hook bill, H. R. 6221, or similar legislation, is passed.

Forestry has been shrouded in too much mystery, as far as the ordinary person is concerned. Actually there is nothing more complicated about it than gardening or farming once a person gets the hang of it. And forestry can be practiced on a half acre or 10 acres, or a "forty" or "eighty" of woodland. You don't need to be a lumber baron with a million acres to get all the thrills and satisfactions of growing and tending a real forest of your own. The necessary investment is less than in a small farm. Another advantage is that most forestry work can be planned to fit in with your slack time. It isn't regimented by seasons like farm crops and by chore time, like livestock and poultry raising.

PARTRIDGE AND QUAIL IN YOUR OWN FOREST

In fact, dirt forestry can be the answer to many a city person's land hunger without making him a slave either to crop seasons or to livestock. Just think of having partridge and quail in your own woodlot instead of merely watching the squirrels climb trees in a public park.

Forestry can also be a profitable and pleasant side line for farmers, and a full-time business for those who want to go into it on a larger scale.

DIRT FORESTRY NEEDED TO SOLVE NATIONAL LUMBER AND FOREST PROBLEMS

These bright prospects for people who like outdoor work tie right in with one of our big, unsolved national problems—forest conservation for abundant lumber production and for all the other public and private values which forests can yield. American forests are owned in tracts which fit the specifications for all of these different sized operations. They are owned by more than 5,000,000 people. About 70 percent of the privately owned forest land is in holdings of 5,000 acres or less. The greater part of these 5,000,000 tracts are modest holdings, ranging from a few acres to a few hundred.

These many small and medium parcels of forest land have great possibilities, not only for growing good, commercial timber, but at the same time producing more wildlife for sportsmen and nature lovers, providing enjoyable forest outings for the public, producing many minor forest products, yielding forage for livestock, protecting the soil from washing and helping to regulate and conserve water supplies.

What needs to be done to make forests yield these benefits in abundance and continually is a good job of practical "dirt forestry." That means such things as thinning and weeding stands of young trees and brush, planting trees, yes, and wildlife food and cover plants, as well, in openings and on deforested lands, selective logging when trees are harvested, control of forest insects and tree diseases, clearing fire breaks, and having some simple forest fire fighting tools on hand and knowing how to use them. That kind of work is real dirt forestry.

Not nearly enough such work is being done, and there hasn't been. That is one of the big reasons why lumber is so scarce today and will get scarcer in the future unless we have more dirt forestry.

FOREST OWNERS NEED HELP

Worried over the shortage of lumber for housing the returning GI's, Congressman HOOK searched for the answer to why there is so little real forestry, and he found them. They are, in the main, three. One is that dirt forestry requires technical know-how, which most of the 5,000,000 forest owners don't yet have. Second, is that forestry work frequently doesn't yield a return until several years—in the case of tree planting, many years. A larger part of the small and medium forest owners don't have an income to support them while they perform work—and invest money, that will not yield a return until several years later. Third, is that some forestry work, like making the forests produce more wildlife or improving them for public forest recreation, is difficult to return into private income. The owner who tries to cash in on these forest values finds himself unpopular with a public grown up in the American tradition of free access to forests.

The lack of dirt forestry isn't all that the progressive Michigan Congressman looked into. He also studied Government and industry figures on sawmilling and lumber manufacture, and found a great need—and opportunity—to increase production by introducing more efficient production methods and using more of the wood which the industry now wastes. In that way production could be increased to aid in meeting today's urgent housing needs without increasing the drain on our forests. In fact, HOOK found a scientific forestry and wood utilization program could increase the output of needed wood products for today, and at the same time speed the growth of wood for the future harvests.

But let's get back to the dirt forestry. That's the thing about the interview with Congressman HOOK which caught our fancy most. It appeals so much to the American love of the outdoors and of a life spent partly in our wonderful forests.

WOULD EXTEND FARM AIDS TO FORESTRY

Congressman HOOK's bill, H. R. 6221, would tackle the real reasons why we have so little genuine forestry on most of our forest lands. It would do the job with methods that have proved successful in upping food production and conserving our precious soil resources. Those methods, of course, are Government assistance to producers: expert assistance in improving production methods and marketing the crop, and financial aid for both production and conservation.

The Hook bill takes major features of the farm program and applies them to the problem of the 5,000,000 forest owners and operators. When such a forestry program is set up, the would-be dirt forester could get help from trained forestry experts in acquiring the most up-to-date know-how of forestry practices best suited to the soil and growth conditions of his own particular patch of woods. That is the same sort of expert help the dirt farmer can now get from Government farm experts and soil conservationists.

When it comes to financial aids, the Hook bill calls for "forest conservation practice payments" in the same way that the farm program now provides soil conservation payments.

Under this part of the scheme, a trained forester would help the dirt forester make plans for his forestry operations for the year. These might include any of the kinds of forestry work listed earlier in this article or others of similar nature. Upon completion of the work, the dirt forester would receive a check from Uncle Sam paying part of the cost of that work. It would be the same kind of check which most farmers now receive each year as the public's share of the cost of doing the vital soil conservation job, which is planned to fit the individual farm by dirt farmers and Government farm experts working together.

Part of the payment might be made in "kind" instead of cash. For example, it might be the use of a tree-planting machine owned by the Government or hired from a third party at Government expense. Or, it might be the services of a trained forester and forest soils expert in making a detailed survey, map and forest management plan for the forest. Or any one of a number of special items or specialized services needed in protecting, developing and managing a forest.

The amount of payment an individual dirt forester could earn under this plan would depend on the size of his forest and the amount of work he would agree to do. The small owner would be able to get somewhat more than the large in proportion to the size of his holdings, the same as in the present farm program. A top limit would be placed on the amount that could be paid to any individual in any State, again the same as in the farm program. The present limit is $10,000. To earn that much, an individual would have to do a great deal of forestry work on a big area of forest, amounting to full time work of several people.

Other kinds of financial aid would be provided as well, but none of it represents anything new or radical in American life. The Hook bill would simply broaden the present farm credit, crop insurance and tenant purchase loan programs to make forest owners and operators eligible for the same kind of aids that farmers have been getting for years. Under those programs a would-be dirt forester—say, a veteran who likes and understands the woods—could get a loan to buy a moderate-sized forest of his own. Forest owners and operators could get production and other kinds of credit at reasonable rates, the same as farmers now do.

Another feature of the plan is a system of permanent forest roads, similar to our farm-to-market road system, opening up tracts of forest which are now isolated and stagnant for lack of roads. Such roads are needed quick so that mature and overcrowded trees can be harvested for lumber to help meet the present housing shortage.

TYPICALLY AMERICAN APPROACH TO PROBLEM

Here is the kind of program that tackles our snarled-up forestry and log production problems in a typically American way. Under the program, most of our forest land would continue to be privately owned, in small and medium-sized tracts, the same as most of our farm lands.

Forest owners and operators would get the kind of aid they need to develop their forests into something they could take pride in and make an income from. "Dirt forestry" would provide a great new outlet for land-hungry and forest-loving people. For many people it would take the place of farming opportunities which are becoming fewer as mechanization reduces the number of people needed on farms.

Many of the 5,000,000 dirt foresters would be part-timers, such as the 3,000,000 farmers whose farm woodlands add up to one third of our total commercial forest acreage.

While these opportunities for enjoyable and satisfying work in developing and managing one's own forest will have great appeal for many outdoor-loving people, the chief purpose of the bill, of course, is to make our forests serve better in meeting the needs of all of us. In that respect the program will mean dependable supplies of trees for our logging industries, and supplies of logs for all the industries which depend on wood as their raw material. That, of course, means stable communities—no more ghost lumber towns. It also means the chance for loggers to realize their dream of permanent homes in good communities and commuting to work over good roads: No more logging camps. And the kind of logger who likes to be a "stump rancher" could become a "dirt forester" if he so chose. The plan means all the many benefits that well-managed forests can yield to the community and the Nation.

FOREST CONTROL SIMILAR TO SWEDEN'S

To protect the public in its stake in the forests, and in its investments in aiding the dirt forester, the bill provides a limited kind of regulation over the dirt forester. This part of the bill is simply to restrain over-eager individuals from destroying or badly damaging a forest by clear cutting or "high grading" to make a quick profi^ This part of the plan is patterned after the successful Swedish system where a trained forester must go into the woods ahead of the logging crew to designate the trees which may be cut, and the vigorous, healthy ones which must be left to grow for the future. The assistance provided by the bill includes the services of trained foresters to do that important job. That kind of control would apply only to commercial logging (for money profit). No attempt would be made to regulate cutting of wood for use on the farm or in the home, like fuel wood and fence posts.

COMPREHENSIVE PROGRAM

The broad program set up in the bill H. R. 6221 also includes assistance to logging and sawmill operators to increase their efficiency and thus help meet the current lumber shortage; a long-range scheme for financing the acquisition of lands to round out the present system of national forests (on lands better suited for public than for private ownership); a revised system for payments to local governments in lieu of taxes on national forests, to help stabilize the finances of local government; increased research in utilizing wood that is now wasted in logging and milling; and research and education to reduce the excessively high accident rates which now prevail in logging and sawmilling.

The program will cost money, but proportionally no more than the farm program. Like the farm program, the public's investment will be richly repaid by the individual, community, and national benefits of well-managed forests and abundant production of logs for commerce. Indeed, Congressman HOOK declared, this plan for doing most of the forestry job through Government assistance to private owners and operators appears to be the most economical of all possible ways of tackling the job. For it will depend chiefly on the initiative of some 5,000,000 "dirt foresters" in making their own forest tracts yield an income. As the program gets going, less and less Government assistance will be needed, because the dirt foresters will soon learn from the Government experts most of the technical "know-how" they need, and, in the course of 5 to 15 years, many of the forests will be yielding more and better logs to provide the dirt forester with a regular income.

INTERESTED PEOPLE MUST ACT

The Congress, however, has lots of irons in the fire. Action can be expected only on those bills for which there is a definite demand by the voters. For that reason, the next step in opening the door of opportunity for dirt foresters—and for a constructive lumber production-forestry program—is for those who want that opportunity (and all of us who want real forest conservation) to let Congress know that we are interested and want the bill passed. It is now in the House Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Letters or postcards direct to that committee and to your own Congressman are in order.

The urgency of Congressman HOOK's plan, of course, is that it is the practical, American way to increase lumber production for today's critical housing needs, and at the same time start building up our forests instead of further tearing them down. The promising opportunity for "dirt foresters," actually, is but a happy byproduct of a plan that is very necessary to public welfare and security.

Speaking of Booby Traps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I know that all those who have been caught in the OPA booby trap will be interested in what the distinguished Dr. Harley L. Lutz, professor of public finance, Princeton University, has to say on this subject. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting in the RECORD his observations:

SPEAKING OF BOOBY TRAPS!

(By Harley L. Lutz, professor of public finance, Princeton University)

(Dr. Lutz contends OPA itself is best illustration of an inflationary booby trap. Holds inflationary pressure began with Government's financing methods before and during war and was outgrowth of Keynesian theory of public spending to produce prosperity. Says inflation tide is not an irresistible force of nature but a product of foolish Government policies, such as low-interest-rate policy, fostering of higher wages, and "cost absorption" principle. Contends OPA abolition is most constructive step in curtailing inflation, since it will permit unhampered production to meet demand in a free competitive market. Describes as "prize traps" the doctrine that Government planning and control are superior to free-market decisions in advancing general well-being of the people. Says that National Labor Relations Act has actually promoted strikes.)

During the days when the action of the Senate provided accumulating evidence of an intent to clip the wings of OPA, Mr. Bowles repeatedly denounced the senatorial tactics by calling the bill an inflationary booby trap.

Literally, a booby trap is a trap for catching a booby. A booby is defined by Webster as a dunce or simpleton, hence a gullible person easily deceived and snared, however clumsy the trap. The act that was vetoed purported to permit some price increases while preventing wild and extreme price advances. Mr. Bowles insisted, however, that the measure would not only cause such increases but would, in fact, legalize them. The President accepted the Bowles line in declaring that approval of the bill would constitute statutory inflation. Thus, anything that purports to prevent price inflation while actually permitting it to happen is, by definition, an inflationary booby trap.

OPA A BOOBY TRAP

The OPA itself fits perfectly the Bowles definition of an inflationary booby trap. Its defenders have described it as our bulwark against inafition. This should deceive only the most gullible and unwary, for the inflation is here and has been here for a considerable time, and the OPA has been capable of only the most feeble gestures against it. If it had been a truly competent and effective defender of the people against inflation, why should there be all the talk about black markets? Why should there not be a reasonable supply of the various kinds of consumer goods that people want—meat, butter, white shirts, men's shorts, pajamas, and an interminable list of other goods—available in the market at ceiling prices? Reconversion has long since been accomplished, and there is no longer this alibi for the production lag. The plain fact is that the OPA long ago lost control of the situation.

It never had more than a negative control, which was somewhat effective during the war in combination with rationing, together with priorities on materials, capital, and labor. That is, its major function was to police prices by setting upper limits. It never had the authority to compel production to occur at these prices. As soon as the war ended, production took its own course and the administration's wage policy made observance of ceiling prices impossible. In consequence, producers, from farmers to manufacturers, short-circuited its futile orders and regulations. The OPA's protection against price inflation became formal and unreal. The manufacturer of a $2 white shirt was not permitted to sell his product above ceiling price. He didn't, for the reason that he made no $2 white shirts. Instead, he made a sport shirt, with short sleeves and a flaring collar, to sell at $5 to $10, with the blessing of OPA. The amazing mass of evidence presented to the congressional committees in demonstration of the failure of this kind of regimentation of an economy that must be free if it is to function properly and effectively was sufficient to convince any reasonable person of the folly of retaining a full-fleged OPA.

ONLY AN INCIDENTAL BOOBY TRAP

But OPA is only an incidental booby trap, as it were. There is a bigger and better booby trap behind OPA. For example, OPA set itself up as the St. George who was to slay the dragon of inflation, or at least hold it at bay. But the trap-wise citizen at once asks—Why should there be an inflation dragon to be killed or held at bay? And this brings us to the grandfather of all booby traps in this particular family line. The inflation, my children, was produced by the Government's financing methods before and during the war. It is a long story but it can be told briefly. Once there was an Englishman, a professor, who wrote many books, for which he was eventually elevated to the peerage. In some of these books he argued that government should borrow and spend in order to supply purchasing power. Without such action, the people would not have enough money to buy all of the goods produced, and for lack of a market there would be depression and unemployment. Government should not borrow by selling bonds to the people for that would divert current income without increasing the total. To be effective the borrowing must occur as an expansion, or inflation, of bank credit.

These doctrines reached this country in the early 1930's, when there was large unemployment, reduced business activity, relatively low prices, and uncertainty as to the future. The experience was a normal one and the country was well on the way out of it when the Keynesian revelations appeared. Since they offered a short cut and at the same time an opportunity for government to pose as the savior of the economy, they were accepted and applied. The Federal Government began to borrow and spend, not for the purpose of covering the regular and necessary costs of the public services, but for the purpose of inflating prices and national income. In order not to alarm the people over the cost of the borrowing, procedures and devices were introduced whereby the interest rate could be reduced. Now this, in itself, is a gigantic booby trap. The proposition that as the amount of debt increased, the cost of the borrowing should decrease, is against nature, against common sense, against all of the evidence of supply and demand. In 1930, when the Federal debt was $15,922,000,000, the computed rate of interest was 3.807 percent. As of June 30, 1945, the interest-bearing debt was $256,357,000,000, and the computed rate of interest was down to 1.936 percent.

BANK CREDIT USED AS MIRRORS

This was not done with mirrors. It was done by an enormous inflation of bank credit. The banks stood ready to buy all debt paper that the general public would not buy. During the 1930's the gold nationalization policy (suggested by another professor) led to large excess reserves which forced interest rates down. After gold imports stopped, because of the war, the Federal Reserve banks supplied the member banks with the credit resources that were used by the latter in absorbing debt at low and diminishing rates of interest.

The booby trap is clearly evident. The people were assured, over and over, by high administration officials and by some professors that here was the eighth great wonder of the world. Government could do so much for the people at so little cost. The path to prosperity and plenty lay along the road of further borrowing at rock-bottom interest rates. Such was the bait used, and it is hard to understand why even boobies were caught in it. The jaws of the trap were the inflationary forces created and promoted by the cheap-money policy. The trap has been sprung. The huge paper profits of corporations, the fancy wages paid to wholly unskilled workers on war jobs, the immense increase in so-called national income—all of these superficial evidences of prosperity had their origin in the credit inflation of the war financing. So our American St. George, the OPA, had a dragon ready-made.

BEATING THE WAVES BACK

The ancients had a story for it. They told of a king who was so puffed up with kingly vanity that he ordered the tide to stop, and sent his sheepish courtiers to beat the oncoming waves with whips to register the royal displeasure. But neither the royal decree nor the whips wielded by servants could stop the tide, and King Canute was lucky to escape with only wet feet.

Our inflation tide is not a remorseless and irresistible force of nature, but a product of the foolish policies of government. We do have a chance that was not available to Canute. We can stop the tide, but we cannot do it by setting more booby traps. Rather, we must get rid of the traps that have already been responsible for the mischief. Let us have a look at them.

The first booby trap to be exposed and thrown out is the policy of artificially cheap money. The Treasury and the President have declared that this policy must be continued. To do so, however, will mean that the impetus of the inflation tide will be sustained, even while the budget is balanced and the debt is being reduced. This result will follow from the enormous amount of debt refunding that must occur. At artificially low interest levels, the principal buyers of refunding bonds will be the banks. Thus, we shall continue to inflate bank credits. The public budget will not be required to provide increased payments for interests, but the private budget of every citizen will be required to sustain the impact of further inflation. An enforced cheap-money policy means price inflation. When money is cheap it will buy little, and when a dollar will buy only a little we have the concrete evidence of high prices.

A second booby trap to be sprung and thrown out is the administration's policy of supporting each and every demand for higher wages. There can be no question that wages were inflated during the war. Employers were under great pressure to produce war matériel. Many thousands of persons with no previous industrial experience or training went into factories and shipyards, where they were paid liberally while being taught and still more liberally afterward. Wage costs had no relation to the prices that the customer, which was the Government, would pay for the product. Taxes, and in particular, the excess-profits tax, were so high as to justify liberal wages since the Government would take a large share of any savings realized under a tighter wage policy.

Instead of following the sensible line of standing pat on wages and pushing for a rapid expansion of production aimed at reasonable cost and price levels, it was decided to give active support to the demands for wage increases. This would have led to higher prices even with no abnormal credit inflation in evidence. OPA contributed to the blunder by undertaking to compel absorption, along the line of the burden of the wage increases without permitting appropriate price advances. The failure of goods to appear provided the best evidence that OPA, like all other forms of public regimentation, can function only negatively.

HAVE GENERATED INFLATION TIDE

Thus, we have been generating the inflation tide which our modern King Canute tells us he can hold back, using price-ceiling orders as royal decrees, and fines against occasional violators, together with the Treasury's play against black-market incomes, as the whips. Yet there were few goods at the old ceiling prices, and the quality of those that were available was often so sadly inferior as to represent a serious degree of concealed inflation.

At this moment the third booby trap, the OPA itself, has been sprung. In recognition of whatever useful services it may have rendered during the war, as an offset to the foolish financing policies that made price control necessary then, let the dead OPA have a decent burial. Any resurrection of it would be, at best, inglorious. The first stage of the shock of termination is rapidly passing. Apart from a little hysteria, the country bore it well. The amazing thing was not the rush to buy, but the prompt movement of livestock and other commodities into the market. Having already passed over the hump so easily, it would be far better to proceed with the adjustment process than to snarl everything by a restoration of price controls that are certain, in any case, to be relatively ineffective.

FINAL REMOVAL OF OPA A CONSTRUCTIVE STEP

The grave shortages which developed in the weeks prior to June 30 were natural and logical. The final removal of all uncertainties regarding price control would be the most constructive step possible in the direction of putting both producers and consumers on notice that prices henceforth are to be determined in a free market. Producers would no longer hold back goods and there would be no black market into which to divert them. Prices would find their natural level. This level would be somewhat higher than ceiling prices but not anything like as high as black market prices. Most important of all, there would be goods available at the new, free market prices. The people have a choice to make here, and there should be no difficulty whatever about the right decision to be made. It is a choice between a free market in which there will be a liberal supply of goods at prices that will warrant production, or a return to a regulated market in which supplies for the legitimate trade will again dry up while the black markets flourish once more. By all means let us have prices that will stimulate production and legitimate trade. The forces of competition will level prices off on a plateau determined by costs of production, and the consumers can never hope for a better deal than this. When all production and trading are open and aboveboard, there is no opportunity to gouge in special deals. Black markets exist only when there are laws, rules, or regulations to be evaded.

The economic principles involved in a return to a free market are reasonably simple, yet there appears to be general lack of understanding of them. The commonest error is in the assumption that if price controls are retained, supply will eventually catch up with demand at these controlled prices. The fact is that whenever there is trading, whether in the open or under the counter, demand and supply are in balance at the price at which the trading occurs. The adjustment factor is the price. It is naively assumed that producers will eventually turn out enough goods so that there will be a balance between the quantity demanded and the quantity supplied at the controlled price, even if that price barely covers the out-of-pocket costs of production. But there is no reason at all to suppose that producers would ever take an interest in trying to produce all that could be sold at the fixed price as long as they could get better prices elsewhere. And it is precisely because so many producers have been able to get better prices elsewhere that the stocks of goods available at ceiling prices have so nearly dried up altogether. In part, these better prices have been obtainable in the export market; in part, they have been realizable in the domestic black market; and also, in part, they have been realized with the aid and comfort of OPA, through the device of shifting to a new line, in which the producer had no previous cost and price experience, a situation in which the newcomer could get price ceilings that were denied to the firm with a record of production.

Therefore, during all of the talk about holding the price line until supply caught up with demand, we have had a series of equilibria between supply and demand in many fields, largely at prices of which OPA knew nothing or about which it could do nothing. Supply has undoubtedly been in step with demand in the case of the $5 to $10 sport shirts, for example. No retailer handling these shirts has found it necessary to post signs saying, "Sorry. Only one to a customer." The most significant aspect of market equilibrium is freedom to find the price at which a given amount of an article will sell. If the producer can keep his costs below that price, he will earn some profit for himself. If he cannot get his costs down that far, he must be free to raise his price and still try to hold his market, or the sheriff will take his assets over in due course for the benefit of his creditors. There is no such freedom under a system of ceiling prices, however determined.

BOOBY TRAPS IN FEDERAL LAWS

If we accept Mr. Bowles' definition of a booby trap as something which snares the unwary by purporting to accomplish one result while actually permitting or causing other results to occur, then we can find numerous illustrations of these traps in the Federal statutes. The National Labor Relatons Act, for example, was sold to the people on the ground that it would prevent strikes. Actually, it has promoted bigger and longer and more bitter strikes. The subsidy program has been sold to the people on the ground that it doesn't cost anything, although even the dullest booby knows that nothing is really free. A Federal budget of more than $30,000,000,000 is a booby trap that will snare some 40,000,000 income taxpayers.

The list could be prolonged indefinitely but this is hardly necessary. There is one prize trap, however, which should be mentioned. It is the doctrine that Government planning and control are superior to the decisions made in a free market, as a means of advancing the general well-being. More suckers have been caught in this one than in all of the others combined. Once the people were able to detect and avoid this particular snare, they would have much less difficulty in sterring clear of the many lesser traps set to catch them in this or that bypath. The best protection against being caught by any of the booby traps set by the planners is a genuine faith in the efficacy of the private enterprise system to advance the general well-being. Any scheme to limit or hinder the full and free operation of this system would obviously be a booby trap.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. H. CARL ANDERSEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, may I request the Members of the House to read carefully the attached letter written by Mr. Gordon C. Sween, of Granite Falls, Minn. Mr. Sween, a postal clerk on a fixed salary, the head of a family of six, feels very strongly that the Nation as a whole would be much better off if price control was eliminated. Here is a man who is a consumer but who is fairminded enough to realize that the only answer to the threat of inflation and high prices now facing the Nation is production. Mr. Sween states that "after all, prices are only relative. Our physical needs are met only by production. Higher prices encourage production. Higher production means more goods. More goods means lower prices." The letter from Mr. Sween reads as follows:

GRANITE FALLS, MINN., June 29, 1946.

Hon. H. CARL ANDERSEN,

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am a postal clerk on a fixed salary which is adequate for my family of six. I surely would be affected by a general price rise in the cost of living but I do not wish to make my plea on a personal basis. Our territory here, as you know, is purely agricultural in character. How an agricultural community would be affected if we had a general price rise, I cannot say, but we all remember the boom and bust after World War I with its disastrous consequences. However, I do not wish to make my plea only for my own territory or State but wish to make it on a national basis. I cannot help but think that our Nation as a whole would be much better off if we had no further price control. A few items, no doubt, would go up in price if OPA were discontinued but I am sure they would be only temporary.

There has never been a time yet when a fair profit did not produce the desired goods. We can easily see that the reason certain goods are short is because there are more people who want to buy at the ceiling price than there are people who want to sell at the ceiling price. This creates an artificial price and the only way goods can be obtained at this lower than demand price is by spending long hours standing in lines and shopping around. I have also heard that a fifth of Scotch—or even gin—will do wonders in getting bacon for breakfast and steak for dinner. This "you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours" policy that we have entirely too much of certainly has had an era of universal expansion during the lengthy reign of OPA. I would much rather pay a few extra cents for a product than try to figure out how to get to the grocer or butcher first for scarce items so that I can beat my neighbor out of his share. If the price is too high I can go without it. That is what we have to do most of the time anyway. The buyer has his own price ceiling and I'm convinced that our economy will fare better under that system than by an elaborate mismanaged set of subsidies and price regulations. After all, prices are only relative. Our physical needs are met only by production. Higher prices encourage production. Higher production means more goods. More goods means lower prices. That is axiomatic. I am convinced that if all price ceilings were removed we would have a normal adjustment of prices near their present levels in a very short time.

Sincerely yours,

GORDON C. SWEEN.

Address by Hon. Claude Pepper of Florida, at the Win-the-Peace Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 16 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me on April 7, 1946, before the Win-the-Peace Conference held in Washington, D. C., in the auditorium of the Department of Commerce.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, my fellow lovers of peace, and my fellow Americans, as I have just listened to those most generous and kind words of introduction by your distinguished chairman, I am reminded of a story about a farmer down in my State who one day was driving a calf along a highway. The little rural calf suddenly balked as the farmer tried to drive him across a bridge which spanned the stream. The farmer got in front of him and pulled with all his might, but the little calf balked very subbornly, with his legs in front of him and his head firmly fixed between his knees. About that time a motorist coming from the rear, seeing this obstruction in the highway and trying to remove it, possibly thinking of assistance to the embarrassed farmer, blew his horn loudly. When he did that, the frightened calf stretched himself out, leaped blindly forward, went over the banister of the little bridge, and broke his neck on the creek bed below.

The farmer bent over the rail to look at his dead calf, and turned to the chagrined motorist peering over his shoulder, and said, "I appreciate what you were trying to do, but that was a heck of a big toot for such a little calf."

Lee knows I am profoundly grateful for his most magnanimous words.

This meeting has been a great inspiration to me, and a great comfort and confidence to all of us who, here in your Congress, have been trying to make the fight which has brought you here. I therefore thought it not only worthwhile but a great opportunity to fly back last night from that earthly paradise, Florida, so that I could be here today to draw upon the inspiration of all of you in this great meeting. [Applause.]

What brings you here is peace, the struggle and the fight for peace. It matters not what they who are our critics call us; it matters not the epithets that they hurl against us; it is of no significance that they level their vicious propaganda machine against us and our efforts; it matters not even if they say about us as many bad things as certain British people said about men like George Washington and Patrick Henry a long time ago, or even if they say as much about us as Mr. Churchill would; the important thing that people who love peace and love their sons will be asking in the future years is whether or not our efforts contributed to the maintenance of peace. [Applause.]

We all know that they will truly call us blessed if we succeed. Of course, it is the threat of war which brings us here to talk about peace. A little while ago some of the people in this country were encouraging us to engage in blunt speaking. Later on, when some of us began to speak a little more bluntly, I am not sure they really meant it. [Applause.]

What they mean by blunt speaking is the kind of blunt speaking that is their kind of blunt speaking. They don't want you to speak bluntly about anybody about whom they don't speak bluntly. They don't want us to make any noise in the Senate except against those toward whom they make very loud noise. Sometimes those noises sound sinisterly akin to the sabers which they rattle. Well, there is war talk or we wouldn't be here. It is in the papers, it is from the mouths of high officials. There is in many of our people themselves, in most of them, truly great fear and concern. Each of us has his own experience as to how the people are disturbed by this talk of war.

I mentioned in the Senate the other day an experience of my own in a taxicab here in Washington a few days ago. There was a young man driving his cab and two passengers in the back seat when I entered. They were engaged in lively conversation. The young man was saying, "Isn't it just my luck, back home from the Pacific after 3 years, back so I can take those dirty little kids in my arms again, just beginning to pay for my cab, and now I have to chuck it all and go off to war once more. The elderly gentleman in the back seat said, "Well it is bad, but it looks as if things were turning that way."

Then the taxi driver, who had revealed he was a sergeant in the Air Force in the Pacific, said, "I had some Representatives in the car this afternoon. I asked them about this talk of war, but they didn't seem to be very disposed to commit themselves about it."

Evidently he hadn't recognized me, and I spoke up for the first time. I said, "Listen, my friend, I have got one vote in that body. Just keep on clinging those dirty little kids, as you call them, to your heart. You just keep on paying for this cab. We aren't going to send you to war." [Applause.]

I have said on the floor of the Senate that that war talk grew so serious and so disconcerting that even United States Senators were disturbed by the rumor that spread through the halls of the Capitol a few days ago, that the Army had canceled all leaves, that they had changed their plans of demobilization and we were literally upon the verge of hostilities; and it was so violent and credulous that the War Department officially had to deny it.

Yes; there are some people even in Government, there are some people in the War Department, if report can be relied upon, there are some people in our General Staff who think there should be war, and they think that war should begin now, and that that war shoud be directed against our ally, Russia. Why do they say so? In the first place, because we have the exclusive mastery of the atomic bomb; in the second place, because we have a mighty Army that could be recalled into the fighting forces with little delay and difficulty; and then we have vast supplies and factories which would support a gigantic war machine; and then they know that there is a certain psychology that would support that kind of a war.

Then there are some in Britain who would like to see a war, if we would fight it. [Laughter.] They are the Tories who helped build up Hitler against Russia. Yes; they are the people who have fought Russia since the Russian revolution, save during the war itself. And even while they were fighting the war, they tried to fight it in such a way as would be most unfavorable to Russia.

History will tell the story of the struggle which went on during the war to let Russia fight the whole land war and certain other powers contribute on the sea and in the air. At most, history will tell you that there were some powers who, if they had to invade the Continent, were distinctly opposed to invasion across the channel and wanted only to go through the Balkans in order that at the end of the war they might have that area within their military grip and control and the Allied armies might lay a barrier against Russian penetration into the Balkans or eastern Europe.

Yes; and history will also tell the story that it was nothing save United States military demand that ever made possible an invasion across the channel, and had there not been a change in the over-all Allied Commander in Chief from the one first appointed to an American, there probably never would have been an assault across the channel in military form upon the continent of Europe.

And history will also tell the story of how the British preempted the Turkish area and used American lend-lease with which to do it; and how they have for generations preempted as exclusively theirs the Mediterranean and shut in all those who were behind those strategic waters.

There is such war talk from some in the United States who hate Russia. They hate Russia not because they have seen it, not because they have talked to the Russian people, not because they have made a critical analysis of Russian history, not because they have any tangible evidence of Russian aggression, not because there is an iota of evidence that Russia threatens the United States, her interests, or her system, but because Russia happens to have the system of internal government called communism.

When I was in Paris, I had a talk with a good many people. I read some of the public statements of a great Frenchman, Mr. Leon Blum. I had the privilege to talk to Mr. Blum himself, and in the course of my private conversation, Mr. Blum reiterated his previous statement that the Socialists of France would not consult with or cooperate with the Communists of France because the French Communists were directed from Moscow.

Later on, I had the privilege to be in Moscow and to talk to Generalissimo Stalin. I had been told already that you could speak frankly to Stalin, and that I chose to do. So I said, "What comment have you to make upon the statement of Mr. Leon Blum, that the Socialists of France cannot cooperate with the Communists of France because the French Communists are directed from Moscow. Generalissimo Stalin looked me directly in the eye and said, with fixity of purpose, "Leon Blum wishes he could prove that."

I made a careful inquiry in every capital to which I went, including American military and civilian representatives, if they had any proof which would stand up in an American court that the Communist parties of the world, without their knowledge, were directed from Moscow, notwithstanding the disorganization of a few years ago of the Comintern, and I have one yet who was able to tell me that he had the proof which in his opinion would stand up in an American court of law. I have yet to see a credible witness who could convince a fair jury that that is true.

I could astonish the American people by telling you the witnesses whom I have heard say that Moscow does not direct or dominate the Communist Party of China in Manchuria. Yet, I don't suppose, of course, that you could get any of these people of whom I have spoken to believe that. On the contrary, we have experienced in recent weeks a veritable deluge of accusations against Russia. It came from all sources, from all directions, from all kinds of people here and abroad, and it certainly reminded me of a story that I heard down South about a farmer who was riding in his wagon with one of his colored men, who was an expert at popping the whip. He watched the driver, with his artistry at popping the whip, pluck a fly off the ear of one of the mules. He saw a shrub by the side of the road and he said, "Mose, can you cut that shrub off?" Mose cut the shrub off. Then he said, "Mose, how about cutting down the hornets' nest up there?" Mose said, "No, sir. Dem hornets is organized. Let me tell you sumpin', Captain, dem hornets is organized."

All "dem" talks were organized it seemed to me; it looks to me as if they fitted into a great pattern of some sort for it all came with remarkable contemporaneousness and it was all obviously going with great velocity in the same direction.

Well, the culmination of this crusade came with our distinguished visitor coming to pay us a visit, Mr. Churchill. It came when Mr. Churchill became a spokesman of all those who believed in a fraternal alliance, as he later modified it. I don't know whether it should be called a fraternal alliance, suggesting the masculine, or a sororal alliance, suggesting the feminine. If it did have the characterization of the feminine, then I could compare it to the Siamese twins in its character. Or maybe he intended to emulate the Holy Alliance. It was very obvious, however, that the purpose of the suggestion was to protect British imperialism in the world. [Applause.] It was very obvious, also, that Mr. Churchill was the spokesman of all those who wish to make America the great defender of that imperialism. Although it was built in British blood, they want to secure it with American blood.

Well, history will write of the greatness and the grandeur of Mr. Winston Churchill. As long as heroic words shall be read, his eloquence shall be an inspiration to men who fight great causes and follow great crusades, but the voice they will remember and be thrilled by is the voice of the Churchill of the early war years. I am no psychoanalyst, but just as a lay observer, it seems to me that something happened to Mr. Churchill as the war went on.

I also remember—and I reminded the gentleman who told me that story a few evenings ago—a story a friend of mine told me. He went over to London in 1941 and had luncheon with Churchill, then Prime Minister. As they sat at the luncheon table, he was moved by Churchill's spirit of democracy. Mr. Churchill, rather philosophically reminiscing over British history, said to my friend, talking about the great heroic epics of the British people's defense against Hitler, "You know, at one time the aristocracy ran Britain, and I guess history will say they did a pretty good job of it. They built a great empire." Then, he said, "They passed off the scene, and then the businessmen took over. I doubt that history will write very creditably of their effort to run this country." Then, my friend said, he leaned forward to him and with really moving emotion in his face and voice, he said, "Today the aristocracy doesn't run Britain, the businessmen don't run Britain, it is the little people who run Britain." That was the Churchill who was thinking in terms of those great phrases for democracy that he was uttering to move the world. That was in the days of Coventry when those little people whose homes had been battered into nothingness told the same friend of mine that they were deferring the rebuilding of their homes. My friends said, "Yes, I understand. You can't get the materials. You don't have the manpower now." The said, "Oh, no; when the war is over we are going to build a new Coventry." Mr. Churchill understood that then and he felt it as did those little people of Coventry.

But the war progressed, and so did his reputation, and so did also some of the attitudes in his counsels and in his party. And then one day when bloodshed, sacrifice, heartache, and countless treasure had been poured upon the altar of victory and the sacrifice was winning its reward, then we don't hear this humble spokesman who echoed the sentiments of the little bombed-out people of Coventry speaking of the new world. We hear a proud and arrogant man, making the boast of empire, "We shall hold our own. I did not become the King's first minister to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire." That is what has seemed to me to indicate a change in Mr. Churchill. His transformation and transfiguration reflected itself in British domestic policy as well as her foreign policy, for we hear him a little later, speaking about the Labor Party of his own country, many of whom had been his colleagues in the cabinet, as "in the vanguard of a gestapo," and saying about his fellow countrymen the same kind of thing he had said in the international forum about his ally, the Soviet Union. [Applause.]

I could not help but speculate in some of these later speeches in the United States of this great Briton of the war days, had he lived in the time of feudalism what he might have been saying about that institution. My mind could just carry me off to such a far century and I could imagine myself hearing him addressing a great rally composed of the feudal lords, and hearing him say, "There may be those who shall cast their wicked aspersions, but I ask you, sirs, where in all history have women been so fair, has the tournament been so glorious, has the manor house been so magnificent? Never before have the vassals been so loyal to their masters, which will linger to the end of reminiscenses." [Applause and prolonged laughter.]

Now, let us journey down to a later day. I can imagine this great warrior, living in the days of Abraham Lincoln and the War Between the States before 1863, and I can hear him saying, "Sirs, they who would propose to abolish this institution of slavery do not merely liberate men; they would disorder a whole social structure. For surely they who would uproot this institution have not sat beneath the magnolias as even steals with slippered feet upon the earth, surely they have not heard these loyal retainers strumming those gentle and dulcet notes of folklore upon their eloquent instruments, surely they have not seen them gathered around the fireside on the Sabbath to receive the benediction and the religious instruction that have been so graciously provided for their spiritual unlift by their kind masters." [Laughter and prolonged applause.]

So I can hardly imagine that, either in the days of feudalism or slavery, Mr. Churchill would have been leading the kind of crusade that would have brought emancipation either to the serf or to the slave

Well, all these people to use Mr. Churchill's analogy, may not want war but all that they have said indicates that they want the fruits of war. They want to contain Russia within the system of western imperialism, and now they want the UNO to be the guaranty of such a policy. That has always been the danger in any world organization and order, that it would be used to preserve the status quo.

I shall remember Mr. William Bullitt in Paris in 1938 telling the story of the last minutes before the signing of the Covenant of the League of Nations by Woodrow Wilson and the others at the peace conference. I quote Mr. Bullitt merely as a historian and not with approval. Mr. Bullitt said that the night before the signing of the League Covenant, Mr. Wilson had firmly told his counselors that he would not sign because there were seeds of war in that document; it did not reflect the spirit for which so many had died. But the next morning, just before 11 o'clock, Mr. Wilson finally said "Yes." He had determined to sign because the League Covenant had within it the power of change, and he had painfully concluded that it would be best to begin and he would pin his hope upon the wisdom of the nations to make it flexible and pliable enough to allow for necessary transition and change.

But they who dominated the League did not vindicate Mr. Wilson's confidence. On the contrary, they used it as an instrument to preserve the status quo. There are a lot of people today who forget or have not learned that the old order has perished. It has just as definitely disappeared from the hearts and minds of men as did monarchy in Europe after the end of the last war. There are a great many people who have not been able to understand that there is a new distribution of power in the world and that they who stand against it, stand against fact, progress, and history.

I proclaim, my fellow Americans, that there cannot be a new world with the old empires. Now, the burning question is this: Where do we, the United States of America, stand? Are we the leader of the new or the defender of the old? Or are we becoming the newest and the most dangerous imperialist?

Our President says that our foreign policy is universal, that our interest is everywhere, that no part of the earth, however remote, can escape our scrutiny, and, by implication, our interference. Today we lead the UNO, and in that way we manifest this new found and fought for power of ours. We have great strength in appearing as the spokesman for the organized world, as our Secretary of State has assumed the role of doing at the Security Council meeting. So in that respect, as the leader of the UNO—and my mother has always taught me the virtue of humility—I am afraid that some of those who read the speeches of our great leaders when they tell the world about our power and our position will feel that they have not practiced that old virtue of humility.

If we are disturbed at home when we think we can hear the clanging of the sword and the rattle of the saber, I wonder how people at peace in other parts of the world must react and what impressions and feelings they must get of us. Of course, it is so difficult, I realize, for us to achieve the prayer of Bobbie Burns:

"Oh wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!"

So we lead the UNO, but we also act unilaterally in every part of the world, in the acquisition and in the maintenance of bases that presume the control of the western Atlantic to its northern and southern reaches, east to the Azores, as well as the Caribbean, the whole Western Hemisphere with all of its vast scope; almost the whole Pacific Ocean, with bases that actually touch upon the Orient itself. In that mighty mastery of that mighty sea, we have gone a long way afield, just to protect the security of America, I am afraid some think. I am afraid some found that to be true at San Francisco. There was not only our delegation appointed by the President at San Francisco; there was a gratuitous visit paid to the Conference on the United Nations Charter by representatives of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, if report be true, that laid down the unconditional demand for those bases by the United States delegation.

A few days ago here in Washington at a luncheon I said to the Prime Minister of New Zealand, "What have you people in your part of the world to say about our policy in the Pacific and our bases? Are we misunderstood by our policy?" In his characteristically honest way, he said, "Well, Senator, you realize that all of them belonged to the Japs and you took them in war, but two groups of islands which you occupy were mandated territory which were given by the League of Nations to Japan. We are waiting to see what you do with the Marianas and the Carolines." I had never thought about those people making that distinction, which just confirms my fear that other people's eyes are intensely focused upon us, watching all that we do, and appraising day by day our intentions and designs.

We not only are reaching out for these bases for our security, but in addition to that we have unhesitatingly and without any apology, and, so far as I know, permission from any other power, entered upon the unilateral settlement of the situation in China. Now, I know we have been a long-time friend of China. I know it was our great President, Franklin Roosevelt, who made them, over vigorous protest, one of the Big Five, and I know that the American people love the people of China. But it is a little difficult for me to reconcile unilateral action in an empire of 400 million people by a nation who holds itself up as the leading representative of collaboration through the UNO or the Big Three. Ours is unilateral action in China, however magnificently it may be carried out by one of the truly great men of his time, Gen. George Marshall. I am not speaking of General Marshall except with the utmost and unbounded admiration and compliment, but I am asking the question of whether Great Britain, whether other powers, have ever given or recognized our exclusive right to become the official arbitrators of the 400,000,000 Chinese. While everybody knows that it was American blood and treasure which struck down with just retribution the dastardly Japs, the world also knows that we have unilaterally controlled and directed Japan, and it is we who are making its character for the future.

It was only by a form of either demand or coercion that we finally broadened the Advisory Council so the other powers might have a voice, although no authority over General MacArthur.

It is again a little difficult to recognize the distinction in character between Japan and Germany. There is relatively unilateral control in Japan by the United States and multilateral control in Germany, in spite of the fact that the Russians killed more Germans than all of us together and suffered more losses than all of us together in that struggle. At the very time I was in the Balkans last year and hearing the great fuss stirred up out there by our people exclaiming that we didn't have fair representation upon the military councils of those countries, the United States was exercising exclusive military control over a number of enemy territories, and acting alone in other most important areas.

Then, in our loan policy, we are acting not with impartiality in our influence upon the other nations of the earth. To whom are American loans available? To everybody upon the same terms? Well, if you think so, you didn't sit by my side and hear Generalissimo Stalin when I said to him, "Generalissimo, you have applied for a $6,000,000,000 loan from the United States. Will you tell me what use you propose to make of the money if it is lent to you? It is said you will use it to build up a big war machine; is that true?"

He said, "Before I answer your question, let me tell you that my Government filed an application for a loan 6 months ago and we haven't even had an acknowledgment of our application." I knew nothing about the matter, of course, but there with me as my interpreter was the gentleman who was acting as ambassador in our embassy in the absence of the ambassador.

The next day that gentleman caused a letter to be written to the Russian Foreign Office advising them that there had been a letter written previously to the Soviet Government in which we had advised the Russian Government that we had not formulated a loan policy. When I got back to London, I had lunch with Ambassador Gromyko. I said, "The President has just stated in the press that there has not been an application for Russian loan to the United States Government; what have you to say?" He said, "Of course there was." But when I got back to Washington and asked members of the Cabinet they said there wasn't an application made. So on one side I had the statement of Generalissimo Stalin and the Russian Ambassador, whom I thought fairly well informed about Russian affairs. I noticed that Stalin seemed to have considerable influence there and considerable acquaintance with what went on in Moscow. It would have seemed to me that even Cabinet members could have found out about a $6,000,000,000 application in the United States if it had been very seriously received.

Maybe the Russians thought they were applying for a $6,000,000,000 loan, but it wasn't in the right form; maybe it was not made out on form XYZ-24, or some such form that was set aside for those matters. Of course, a little billion-dollar loan application was admittedly made correctly to the Export-Import Bank, unfortunately it got lost in a pigeonhole and lay 6 months in the pigeonhole. With all this, and all that is said in the Congress and the country, I am afraid that the Russians have got the impression that we aren't very anxious to lend them any money. I am not sure that the impression is justified, but they might be sensitive about a matter like that. [Laughter.]

Yet our real sentiments may have been as clearly conveyed as the impression that the little boy expressed when he lost a quarter. All of a sudden, in a little bit, his boy friend who was with him doubled up his fist and started to hit him. The boy who lost his quarter said, "What are you hitting me for?" The other boy said, "You accused me of stealing your quarter." His companion replied, "I did not accuse you of stealing my quarter. I said that I would have found my quarter if you had not helped me look for it." [Laughter.]

Well, a few days ago in the Senate, I proposed one way by which I thought we might realize this peace for which we all so earnestly desire. I suggested that the United Nations was based upon the unity of the Big Three, and that that unity molded by Franklin Roosevelt should not be lost. [Applause.] And by implication, I meant to say, if the Soviet Union had as much confidence in the American Government of today being its real friend as it had confidence in the real friendship of the American Government headed by Franklin D. Roosevelt, there would still be the unity of the Big Three.

I found out from men like General Eisenhower, Gen. Bedell Smith, and many other American commanders who had worked and fought with the Russians, that the essential criteria of their attitude toward you is if down in their hearts they have confidence in you or not. I heard General Eisenhower say that he would go to an allied-control council meeting with Marshal Zhukov and they would disagree violently; they would verbally clash and fight, but when the meeting was over they were friends again because Zhukov had confidence in Dwight Eisenhower.

I found out a long time ago that if they do not have that confidence, if their suspicions are whetted and excited, they never do really give you the firm handclasp of unconditional friendship. What we have to do today, is to restore the belief of the Russians that we are in peace and in the future the kind of uncompromising friend we were in the desperate days of the war when we extended to them lend-lease. What we have also got to make the Russians believe with all their heart is that we have not been jockeyed and maneuvered and schemed into becoming an appendage to British foreign policy, that our primary purpose is not to preserve the old imperialism in the world and to become the defender of the status quo.

I do not say we ever had such intentions, but like Caesar's wife we must be above suspicion. In order for the confidence of the spouse to be complete, she must act above suspicion. She must not act fast and loose in suspicious places with strange and wolfish people, if she expects a spouse's confidence not to become troubled.

So I suggested that the Big Three needed to get down at the council table and to take cognizance of the new distribution of power arising out of the war, of this new order on the earth. I don't mean the vicious and vile new order that the Nazi talked about or the Fascists dreamed of, I mean the new order of those little people who told my friend after Coventry that they were going to build a new England, like our people here, like you who want to build a new America worthy of the dead, who all through our centuries have died for it. In that new order, there cannot be the elect and the elite of the earth, based upon some arbitrary differential of color or country, because I have found in my little experiences that liberty is an inspiration that finds an echo in every heart.

I have thought it ill-becoming of a great many nations in Europe, recently liberated by American boys, some of whom have not come back, so soon to impose their imperial will upon other people in other parts of the world, sometimes through lend-lease equipment.

I would have a lot rather heard the President yesterday stir hope in every human heart that was not free by saying, "Be calm and be assured American might is behind you." [Applause.] Many enslaved people in the world do have the impression that America might be against them, because it would embarrass our relations with some great power if we gave any encouragement for the emancipation of their colonials.

Well, I thought when the Big Three should meet they might discuss, first, the utter destruction, as your distinguished chairman has said, of the war-making potential of Germany and Japan. Isn't it rather striking to you that there has been such delay in a proposal to divide up Germany, to internationalize the Ruhr, to set apart Bavaria, to separate the rest of the country into at least two parts along some significant line, giving the individual German a chance for a good life but keeping the whole Reich incapable of waging war? I thought the second thing the three powers might discuss was the occupation jointly of strategic bases in the world. In a world where there is collective security, that doesn't strike me as strange. Yet Russia asks for a base in the Dardanelles and in the Bosporus to be sure of its being open to ingress and egress. What answer did we give them? "We, Great Britain and the United States, will guarantee you the right to come and go." What answer would we give if Great Britain and Russia said they would give us the right to come and go through the Panama Canal? What do you suppose the British would say if we told them the United States and Russia would guarantee them the right to come and go through the Suez; if we said, "Be assured you will have no interference in coming or going, because we, the United States and the Soviet Union, will guarantee you will not be molested either in war or in peace."

When the Russians talk about getting a little base down in Tripolitania, there is a mighty howl raised about aggression. As the lady said to me when I was in London, with the utmost earnestness, "What do you think about these Russians wanting a navy, and everything?" She said that in all earnestness. The lady really meant it. She just couldn't understand why Russia needed a navy. I hope I didn't shock the good lady by saying tolerantly, "If the Russians have the money and men and material to build a navy, and there is no treaty to the contrary, I suppose we will just have to let them build it." I don't know whether I was being a good guest to make such a strong statement or not, but I thought I would mention it.

Even if they got a base in the Dardanelles, I wonder how far they would get past Cyprus, past the Greek bases? I don't blame the Greeks, because I love the Greeks almost enough to believe I have Greek blood in me? How far would they get past Alexandria? How would they get by Malta? What state would they be in when they got to Gibraltar, not to speak of the Azores, if they were going anywhere at all? I mention these, my friends, simply to suggest that Bobby Burns was so right when he said:

"Oh wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!"

I am sure you couldn't get an Englishman anywhere in the world to believe that the British had any aggressive desires. They didn't think that the other day when they first liberated, without authority, into an independent state and then made a mutual assistance pact with Trans-Jordan. Under the terms of the treaty with Trans-Jordan they had the right to keep all the troops there that they now have there and to put any more there at any places they can agree upon, and, of course, to direct the foreign policy of this sister empire, Trans-Jordan.

I am sure they had no thought of aggression, in the case of Iraq. The British had a mandate from the League of Nations after the last war over Iraq. Iraq wasn't altogether pleased with it and protested to the extent that the British recommended Iraq for membership in the League of Nations. Then at once the British entered into a treaty with Iraq, a mutual assistance pact, by which they could keep troops in Iraq and continue to run the country as they were doing when I was there last fall, by common knowledge.

I will tell you a story I told in the Senate the other day. The British sent a doctor along with the Regent of Iraq when he came over here to visit the President. They didn't expect the doctor to look after the physical but the political health of the regent. One evening the President had the regent and his party to dinner at the White House; the Secretary of State, the Iraq ambassador, the regent, the doctor, and perhaps others. As the President is prone to do, after the dinner he invited the regent, the Secretary of State and the ambassador to his private study upstairs, but he hadn't been tipped off that the doctor was supposed to hear everything the regent said and heard, and didn't invite him. They were laughing about it in Baghdad when I was there, saying that the doctor was the most miserable man in the world that he hadn't been able to sit in and hear what the President of the United States said to the regent of the country. Of course, British troops are still there under military power which they have technically legalized in a treaty.

Well, I wonder if there is an essential difference in a nation going in and taking another country without a treaty and exerting coercive influence upon another country to get a treaty which in its fall gives a right of control and occupation. When the British get into a country it is hard to get them out. They have been in Egypt since 1882.

Somebody asked me in the Senate the other day, "What about this declaration about freeing India? Don't you think they deserve credit for that?" My answer was that they would have gotten a lot more applause if they had said when they were going to free India. [Applause.]

I realize that there was a promise of freedom, but we have listened so long to such promises. We wish the British had done what we did when we said in our statute that the Philippines would be free in 1946 anno domini.

Well, I was speaking about the Big Three getting together, and I was speaking about the joint occupancy of strategic bases, and I was about to speak of an agreement with respect to the access to raw materials that will give, as the Atlantic Charter assured, equal access to all peoples, so you wouldn't have to fight in order to get oil, in order to get other critical materials. The third thing was so to use atomic power that it will be in the interest of peace and prosperity, rather than that it should be used as another weapon that might strike fear to the heart of the world and raise suspicions in other people's minds about America's future course in the world. I never proposed that the United States unilaterally abandon all priority in atomic power. I did think it would be an evidence of good faith if we showed that we were really willing to enter into a common pact for the common destruction of this ghastly weapon. I still think so. I have been very much heartened by the report from the Department of State recently. On the whole, the proposal is excellent and I hope it will be adopted and that those who espouse the most dangerous form of new isolation will not thwart it in the Congress and in the country.

I also spoke about economic collaboration, our working together with all peoples, regardless of race, color, creed, or politics, to help them repair the damage of war and to contribute to our own full employment and prosperity.

I wanted them to talk about disarmament. I wish that some of our declarations were more in the spirit of an appeal to the nations of the world to reduce armaments [applause] rather than that we should be constantly telling the world what great armaments we propose to retain. That is not conducive, it seems to me, to other than an international armaments race. I think if we cannot have disarmament now, with the enemy conquered, when can the human race ever hope to be spared the awful armament burden and threat? It is a burdensome cost and it is a threat to peace.

Now, my friends, I just want to warn you about one more thing besides this propaganda for war. I want to warn you about those people who use a false philosophy for their part either for war or for imperialism of one kind or another, either military or economic. I want to warn you about those people who get behind little states, little nations, and use them as the front behind which to advocate the preservation of the status quo and existing imperialism in the world. [Applause.]

I speak not only of the imperialism of the British but of every other nation where one exists in the world today. Some of these people who in the international parlance come to the rescue of little people remind me of those so-called defenders of little people, in the Congress, who defeated the 65-cent minimum wage behind the facade of the small farmer, ignoring the fact that they proposed a policy which would give 54 percent of $4,000,000,000 to 10 percent of the commodity producers of this country. Yes, I warn you about the kind of people who in domestic politics hide behind the screen of States' right—to defeat the abolition of the nefarious poll tax, or a health bill, or maternal and child care, or all the other things for which all of us have been fighting and will continue to fight to make our fellow human beings healthier, more prosperous, and happier.

Mr. Chairman, I proclaim my disagreement with the statement attributed to the President that it is not a matter of Federal concern that millions of Americans are disfranchised from voting in Federal elections because they don't pay a certain sum of money. You either believe in democracy or you don't. There are some who tell us over there in the Congress that if we advocate democracy we will split up political parties. [Laughter.] Any party which cannot embrace the true doctrine of democracy can hardly call itself representative of democracy. If it doesn't believe in democracy it has no right to the name of Democratic spokesman.

There are some people in the other party who proclaim their own virtue. I don't acknowledge their superiority. They are as far away from Abraham Lincoln as many in the Democratic Party are from Thomas Jefferson, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

If they claim to be better as the spokesmen for democracy, let them vote for cloture when we bring up the anti-poll-tax bill. Let us restore democracy to the United States Senate by the abolition of the power of filibuster. What is the difference between filibuster and somebody who walks out of a conference. Yet you can't get a lot of newspapers to see very much bad about the one who filibusters in the Senate against deliberations of the body, but they are right ready to jump on somebody who may absent himself from another body for some reason.

My friends, I am pleading for the kind of democracy you are fighting for and for which those who died in the war gave their lives. I am talking about a spirit of real democracy at home and abroad—in our domestic and in our foreign affairs. I am talking about a new spirit among men and among nations, an honest, earnest willingness to be unselfish if we can save the peace of the world.

I warn nations against a repetition of their policy after the last war when they thought not of keeping their debt to the dead but about getting new territory, gaining new bases, acquiring new trade routes, and building greater economic and military might. I am talking about a spirit that would make nations kneel down around the council table in a dark hour when war is threatening, as in that dark hour in our own Constitutional Convention, when it seemed an impasse had been reached and an infant could not be born that might save the earth democratically, and Benjamin Franklin turned and said, "Mr. President, for days I have been sitting here listening to these discussions. I propose that we pray." Later he was able to say, "Mr. President, as I have sat here through these dark hours of disagreement, I watched that sun behind the chairman's desk. There were many times when I could not tell whether it was sinking or whether it was rising. Now, Mr. President, with God's help, I am sure that it is the rising sun of a new nation and a new spirit in the world."

I got a letter this morning from Col. Raymond Robins, a great citizen of the world, and, my friends, a resident of my State. He just quoted the two paragraphs from a poem with which all of you are familiar.

He didn't know I was coming here, but he knew I had spoken in the Senate, and you know what he did in the days of the Russian revolution to gain recognition for the new government, to enable them to continue the war against Germany, and how all of his great efforts were thwarted by the people who didn't want to make peace—even to turn them against the Germans—with the new government in Russia.

"When a deed is done for freedom through the broad earth's aching breast,
Runs a thrill of joy prophetic, trembling on from East to West,
And the slave where 'er he cowers, feels the soul within him climb
To the awful surge of manhood as the energy sublime,
Or a century bursts full blossom on the thorny stem of time.

"Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide
In the strife of truth with falsehood for the good or evil side,
Some great cause God's new Messiah offering each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand and the sheep upon the right,
And the choice goes by forever twixt that darkness and that light."

We pray that America will choose the good side in the world. [Applause.]

Job Openings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM C. COLE
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the St. Joseph (Mo.) News Press:

JOB OPENINGS ARE GREATEST IN 4 MONTHS

Job openings, listed with the local United States employment service office, reached a new high this week as compared with figures compiled during the past 4 months.

Unhampered by Government restrictions, many firms in the city have started adding to the number of personnel in a drive to return to former production standards. The bulk of the job openings filed with the USES came from meat packing plants and grain milling companies.

Fred O. Street, supervisor of the labor supply division at the USES, reports that during the past several months the only requests for employees were received in the office on Monday and Tuesday. He said, however, that recent requests for workers have continued to pour into the office during this entire week.

Tuesday, July 9, there were 172 job openings listed, while a count today revealed orders for 365 workers. "There is a demand for workers in almost every type of occupation," Mr. Street added.

Clear Thinking Exposes OPA Fallacy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, of the many letters I have received recently concerning the resurrection of the dead OPA, I believe one I have just received from Mr. Charles H. Garnett, an attorney of Oklahoma City, Okla., is one of the best reasoned and most logical of the thousands I have received and read on this subject. The author of this letter presents clear, cogent, convincing, and unanswerable arguments against the revival of OPA. Clear thinking exposes the fallacies of OPA, and Mr. Garnett has exposed these fallacies in language that we Americans can understand and appreciate. I quote from Mr. Garnett's letter, as follows:

I urge you to do all in your power to prevent in the House the removal or limitation of any of the provisions in the Senate bill for removing certain commodities from the price-fixing powers of the OPA or cutting down its powers in any respect. In my considered judgment you will be doing the country a valuable service if you help to restrict the OPA further or to eliminate it entirely. The quicker OPA is put out of existence, the quicker will our economy be stabilized. The current 2 weeks of freedom from it have already gone a long way in that direction. Six weeks more would restore practically normal conditions, even though on a level of higher prices.

The economic law of supply and demand fixes values and prices. This law is not a precise mathematical formula, but it is as inexorable as the law of gravity. When suspended or interfered with by statute law, it still works through black markets.

Price fixing is an arbitrary method of making certain citizens pay the living expenses of other citizens. Subsidies make the taxpayer do this. Both throw the economic organization out of joint and render it unstable.

It is axiomatic that as prices rise demand decreases and supply is stimulated. A price-fixing ceiling holds down supply, because it tends to depress production, and at the same time it stimulates demand, because there will be more buyers for a commodity at the ceiling price than there would be at a higher price.

Subsidies create artificial demand because they permit prices below cost to the producer. They are an admission that government is appropriating the property of the producer and to the extent of the subsidy donating it to other citizens. The bill for this is paid by the taxpayers. This cannot be defended on any economic ground nor on any ground of simple justice. There is no reason why any citizen should be relieved of paying his own way unless he is an object of charity.

Cases of individual hardship resulting from repeal of OPA can easily be found. These are played up by its supporters. There has never been a time since this country was founded when similar cases of hardship could not be found. Certainly the operation of OPA results in as many and as dire cases of hardship as would result from its repeal.

Most of the popular support for the OPA is mass hysteria induced by propaganda put out by that organization at the expense of the taxpayer plus the support of some of those who are now getting part of their living expenses donated to them. The termination of it would save probably $100,000,000 a year in expenses and some billions in subsidies and permit some 34,000 people now on its pay roll to engage in useful employment.

I have merely touched on the subject, but consideration of space forbids more. I may add that I have no commodity or property in any form for sale or rent. I make my living from fees for legal services, but I am willing to pay the open-market price for what I need, or if that price is too high, to do without.

Opportunities for Service to Mankind—You and I Can Help Rid the World of Leprosy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following statement by Col. G. H. Rarey, United States Army, retired, entitled, "Opportunities for Service to Mankind—You and I Can Help Rid the World of Leprosy."

This material presents the most comprehensive picture of the difficulties experienced by those who are afflicted with Hansen's disease—leprosy—which I have ever seen. The information has been compiled by long study and observation of those having the disease over a period of many years, and unquestionably, the American people should know the terrible ravages and the sad after effects. I feel sure that study of this statement will go a long way toward eliminating in the public mind the misunderstanding which impels those who are ignorant of the real facts to regard the victims of Hansen's disease as persons to be shunned as "unclean."

This matter was called to my attention by Mr. Paul A. Strachan, president, American Federation of the Physically Handicapped, who states:

The need for a real overhaul of the entire, so-called rehabilitation system was never more manifest than in the appalling plight of victims of Hansen's disease. Here, we have a situation about which, manifestly, the general public knows nothing at all, and it is time to open wide the doors of factual information and show that these unfortunate people should not be condemned to a life of isolation, misery, and very often, want, when many of them can be cured, or, at least, become arrested cases. This having been done, they are no more dangerous to public welfare than would be, for example, arrested cases of tuberculosis, or other communicable diseases. In fact, medical research shows that even the doctors themselves agree that leprosy is only feebly communicable, and there is little proof evidenced that would lend any weight to belief but that those who have recovered sufficiently from Hansen's disease to warrant discharge from our public institutions, should not be treated exactly as are any other persons or groups who have been rehabilitated. A great public crusade is necessary to bring the truth to our people, and I believe Colonel Rarey's article the most enlightening, over-all presentation I have yet seen in that respect.

Colonel Rarey's statement follows:

OPPORTUNITIES FOR SERVICE TO MANKIND—YOU AND I CAN HELP RID THE WORLD OF LEPROSY

(By Col. G. H. Rarey, U. S. Army (retired))

We will start the list of opportunities for service to mankind with a brief explanation of the human needs and some of the unsolved problems inherent in one of the oldest diseases known to man. We will take a look at the present status of this disease and canvass the opportunities presented to each of us who enjoy our freedom and good health, by this age-old sickness, and see what we—you and I—can do to help supply the needs, and solve the problem.

The modern name for leprosy is "Hansen's disease" in honor of Gerhard Hansen, a Norwegian physician, who isolated the Bacillus leprae in 1874.

Did you know that this disease exists in practically every country in the world; that there are from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 victims in all; that approximately 15,000,000 persons are exposed to and subject to contracting it; and that among its victims 1,200 to twice that many are in the continental United States?

While Hansen's disease is most prevalent in India, Africa, Burma, China, the Pacific Islands, including the Philippines and Japan, certain parts of Europe, the West Indies, and South America, our home land is by no means immune from the danger of further contamination. Commercial and other intercourse between the United States and the countries named, presents frequent opportunities for introducing additional germs of the disease into many of our States. In addition, military service in the endemic areas of the above-mentioned countries will undoubtedly result in the contraction of Hansen's disease by a certain number of our men, millions of whom have served in such areas during World War II.

Approximately 32 American veterans of the small war known as the Philippine Insurrection, 1896–1902, contracted leprosy as a result of their military service in those islands during that period, according to the record of reported cases. Due to the long incubation period frequently noted with the disease, many of the veterans were unaware of their misfortune until many months or even years after their release from military service.

While the consensus appears to be that leprosy is not one of the serious health problems at present in the United States, a comparison of the estimated number of victims of the disease in this country, viz, 5,000, with the number of patients undergoing treatment at the national leprosarium, which was less than 400 at any one time in 1945 and early 1946, shows that a large number of the victims are unaccounted for. In view of the fact that neither the location or condition of the unreported victims are known, it is not clear to the lay student how anyone can determine and state that this disease does not present a serious health problem in this country. The estimated total has been reported as being 1,200 to 5,000. If we reduce the major estimate by half, with a view to presenting a conservative picture of this problem, we find that there are approximately 2,100 unreported victims of Hansen's disease in the United States. The question occurs, Where are the unreported sufferers? Forty of our forty-eight States have sent patients to the United States Marine Hospital, Carville, La., our national leprosarium. One also wonders how many of the unfortunate unreported victims may be communicating the disease to children and other persons and how many of the latter are also going unreported?

Our common sense tells us that, in the interests of the sufferers themselves, their families, and the communities in which they live, all of our citizens who have contracted the disease must be located and given proper treatment; that all members of our medical profession must be trained to diagnose correctly the disease whenever located, as well as to properly treat and advise the patient. However, before these sick people can be located there must be a change in our methods of handling them. A new approach to this problem is essential and no good is accomplished by further delay in recognizing the fact. The essential changes required in our policy and methods are briefly discussed in the following pages.

With reference to the disease itself, there is no known definite and positive cure for it at this time. Since Hansen isolated the bacillus in 1874, a great many attempts have been made to grow it in artificial media, but to date none of these efforts have successfully met the requirements for proof, and all efforts to inoculate animals with the germ have been unsuccessful to the same extent. No scientist, in more than 145 recorded cases has been able to infect himself or other human volunteers by attempted inoculation of the germ.

While it is very encouraging to note that progress is slowly being made in the development of medicine and methods for arresting the disease when applied during its early stages, it has not been possible to cultivate the germ progressively, from one generation to another, for study and experimentation. Therefore, means for determining exactly how it is transmitted from one person to another; positive means for its arrestment; and the development of preventive medicine and methods must remain the principal objects of medical research as well as the stars of hope for every victim of this disease.

That these means will one day be discovered by our scientists is strongly indicated by the progress they have made to date in providing treatment now available in the modern leprosaria of the various countries, including our own, which, when taken in time and for a sufficient length of time, is resulting in the arrestment of the disease in many cases and in the return of these fortunate persons to a normal life of usefulness. So, there is hope for our people afflicted with Hansen's Disease, who will present themselves for treatment. This fact of progress in the fight against the ancient scourge must be made known to all of our people including those who, through no fault of their own, have contracted the disease.

It is interesting to note that the bacillus leprae and the tuberculosis bacillus are so nearly alike that in single organisms, they cannot be distinguished one from the other. It therefore seems possible and probable that research into the cause and habits of the leprosy germ, its methods of transmission, etc., may result in improved means for combatting tuberculosis.

Having taken a brief look at some of the factors in the present status of leprosy, the question may occur as to the main problems presented by this mysterious malady which offer definite opportunities for serving mankind. Among many such problems, the following, which are expressed as needs, are outstanding:

The need for research into the cause of and method of transmitting leprosy.

The Leonard Wood Memorial (American Leprosy Foundation) is the main leprosy research agency in the United States and is the only agency whose efforts are devoted strictly to research work in the field of leprosy. This vital activity is dependent upon public contributions for the funds needed to carry on its work.

Briefly stated, the plans and purposes of the Leonard Wood Memorial are to the extent of its financial ability to leave no scientific step untaken that holds any promise of finding the ultimate solution to this age-old curse of the human race.

Opportunity for service: The imperative need for expanding research work in this field with a view of advancing the happy date when positive fast-acting arrestment and preventive medicines and methods are found presents an outstanding opportunity for service to mankind. By contributing financial support to this research agency you will help rid the world of leprosy.

The need for this support is given special emphasis and importance by reason of the expected increase in the number of its victims as a direct result of military service in leprosy-infected areas during World War II.

You may identify yourself with the vital work of this splendid agency by sending your contribution to the Leonard Wood Memorial, 1 Madison Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

How OPA Worked

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, we have heard many expressions of contempt for the manner in which the Office of Price Administration has been administered. Almost everyone we talk to and almost every speaker in the well of the House who has stood either for or against the OPA has had something to say about its maladministration, either condemnatory or apologetically. But all seem to know and admit that there was something wrong somewhere in the way price controls were administered. I have always maintained that the principle is un-American and therefore wrong. There are a goodly number of the Representatives in Congress who think this way. Then there are a number who think and say that it might have been necessary and important during the days of hostilities, but that it is not needed now. Still others say except in very few instances, OPA should not be resurrected from the dead. There are still others who want OPA revived and price controls placed on everything. We all know that the longer bureaucrats are on the pay roll the harder it will be to get them off the pay roll.

Small business concerns which cannot afford to pay high-powered and high-salaried accountants, auditors, and administrative law experts and specialists, find it most difficult to survive under OPA or any other form of planned economy. The larger concerns can live under OPA regulations better than the smaller ones. However, all have suffered and the longer bureaucratic control is exercised over people, the more difficult it will be for the same people to regain the freedom they have lost since bureaucracy was put in charge of their economy.

I am just in receipt of a very clear statement of what OPA has done for a representative firm in my district. I think this is one of the most concise statements I have seen. The letter is dated July 12, 1946, and follows:

We are manufacturers. We buy metals and other raw materials. OPA has done four things to us:

1. Set ceilings above prevailing prices. Suppliers immediately raised to the ceilings. Result: Inflation.

2. Caused mills to neglect standard materials and run on special grades (alloys, etc.) with their greater material-to-labor ratio, and consequent greater margin of profit. Result: We pay higher prices for substitute materials which, in some cases, are not as good as standard grades.

3. Made some much-needed materials impossible to get. Result: Some items of our manufacture are dropped from our list; customers in dire need and disappointed.

4. Prevented our matching prices to costs. Result: We are forced to limit production. We could hire more men if this were corrected.

We need freedom of action instead of controls. Please try to eliminate all chance of OPA revival.

American Bar Association and the Patent Provisions of S. 1717

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a resolution submitted to the House Military Affairs Committee members by the American Bar Association during the hearing on S. 1717:

It is respectfully requested that the House take favorable action upon the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the American Bar Association approves the principles of S. 1717 to establish a Civilian Commission for the control of atomic energy, its materials, material sources, production, and weapons, and the dissemination of information thereof for insuring national security; and further that the association disapproves the bill: (a) insofar as it fails to provide for the review, in camera if necessary, by a constitutional court upon petition of an aggrieved party of any act, declaration or failure to act of the commission; and (b) furthermore disapproves the patent provisions of the bill: (1) relating to compulsory licenisng; and (2) to prohibiting the creation of patent property for certain subject matter."

PATENT PROVISIONS OF THE BILL

"PATENTS AND INVENTIONS

"SEC. 11. (a) Production and military utilization:

"(1) No patent shall hereafter be granted for any invention or discovery which is useful solely in the production of fissionable material or in the utilization of fissionable material or atomic energy for a military weapon. Any patent granted for any such invention or discovery is hereby revoked, and just compensation shall be made therefor.

"(2) No patent hereafter granted shall confer any rights with respect to any invention or discovery to the extent that such invention or discovery is used in the production of fissionable material or in the utilization of fissionable material or atomic energy for a military weapon. Any rights conferred by any patent heretofore granted for any invention or discovery are hereby revoked to the extent that such invention or discovery is so used, and just compensation shall be made therefor.

"(3) Any person who has made or hereafter makes any invention or discovery useful in the production of fissionable material or in the utilization of fissionable material or atomic energy for a military weapon shall file with the Commission a report containing a complete description thereof, unless such invention or discovery is described in an application for a patent filed in the Patent Office by such person within the time required for the filing of such report. The report covering any such invention or discovery shall be filed on or before whichever of the following is the latest: (A) The sixtieth day after the date of enactment of this act; (B) the sixtieth day after the completion of such invention or discovery; or (C) the sixtieth day after such person first discovers or first has reason to believe that such invention or discovery is useful in such production or utilization.

"(b) Use or inventions for research: No patent hereafter granted shall confer any rights with respect to any invention or discovery to the extent that such invention or discovery is used in the conduct of research or development activities in the fields specified in section 3. Any rights conferred by any patent heretofore granted for any invention or discovery are hereby revoked to the extent that such invention or discovery is so used, and just compensation shall be made therefor.

"(c) Nonmilitary utilization: (1) It shall be the duty of the Commission to declare any patent to be affected with the public interest if (A) the invention or discovery covered by the patent utilizes or is essential in the utilization of fissionable material or atomic energy; and (B) the licensing of such invention or discovery under this subsection is necessary to effectuate the policies and purposes of this act.

"(2) Whenever any patent has been declared, pursuant to paragraph (1), to be affected with the public interest—

"(A) The Commission is hereby licensed to use the invention or discovery covered by such patent in performing any of its powers under this act; and

"(B) Any person to whom a license has been issued under section 7 is hereby licensed to use the invention or discovery covered by such patent to the extent such invention or discovery is used by him in carrying on the activities authorized by his license under section 7."

The owner of the patent shall be entitled to a reasonable royalty fee for any use of an invention or discovery licensed by this subsection. Such royalty fee may be agreed upon by such owner and the licensee, or in the absence of such agreement shall be determined by the Commission.

"(3) No court shall have jurisdiction or power to stay, restrain, or otherwise enjoin the use of any invention or discovery by a licensee, to the extent that such use is licensed by paragraph (2) above, on the ground of infringement of any patent. If in any action for infringement against such licensee the court shall determine that the defendant is exercising such license, the measure of damages shall be the royalty fee determined pursuant to this section, together with such costs, interests, and reasonable attorney's fees as may be fixed by the court. If no royalty fee has been determined, the court shall stay the proceeding until the royalty fee is determined pursuant to this section. If any such licensee shall fail to pay such royalty fee, the patentee may bring an action in any court of competent jurisdiction for such royalty fee, together with such costs, interest, and reasonable attorney's fees as may be fixed by the court.

"(d) Acquisition of patents: The Commission is authorized to purchase, or to take, requisition, or condemn, and make just compensation for (1) any invention or discovery which is useful in the production of fissionable material or in the utilization of fissionable material or atomic energy for a military weapon, or which utilizes or is essential in the utilization of fissionable material or atomic energy, or (2) any patent or patent application covering any such invention or discovery. The Commissioner of Patents shall notify the Commission of all applications for patents heretofore or hereafter filed which in his opinion disclose such inventions or discoveries and shall provide the Commission access to all such applications.

"UTILIZATION OF ATOMIC ENERGY

"SEC. 7. (a) License required: It shall be unlawful, except as provided in sections 5 (a) (4) (A) or (B) or 6 (a), for any person to manufacture any equipment or device utilizing fissionable material or atomic energy or to utilize fissionable material or atomic energy with or without such equipment or device, except under and in accordance with a license issued by the Commission authorizing such manufacture or utilization.

* * * * *

"Where activities under any license might serve to maintain or to foster the growth of monopoly, restraint of trade, unlawful competition, or other trade position inimical to the entry of new, freely competitive enterprises in the field, the Commission is authorized and directed to refuse to issue such license or to establish such conditions to prevent these results as the Commission, in consultation with the Attorney General, may determine."

REASONS

1. The Commission has many powers and duties, including the right to license the manufacture and use, for nonmilitary purposes, of fissionable material or atomic energy to applicants who may be deemed by the Commission to be qualified. One reason for refusal of a license would be a finding by the Commission that the grant of the license sought might serve to maintain or to foster the growth of monopoly, restraint of trade, unlawful competition, or any other trade position inimical to the entry of competitive enterprises into the field (see the portion of sec. 7 quoted above). No court review is provided.

2. The bill places important areas of technical development wholly outside the patent law. In providing that inventions and discoveries relating to the production of fissionable material and atomic weapons shall not be patented (sec. 11 (a), subdivisions (1) and (2)), and in providing for the condemnation of any patents and applications covering any atomic energy inventions (sec. 11 (d)), the bill unwisely destroys the impetus to progress contemplated and authorized by article I, section 8 of the Constitution. Tremendous further potential developments in those fields are to be anticipated. Such developments should be encouraged to the maximum. No reason is apparent to justify treating inventions relating to atomic energy differently from other inventions; and every reason which justified the application of the patent system to other inventions applies with equal force to inventions relating to atomic energy.

The promotion of progress in this field, as in other fields of science and engineering, can best be accomplished by operating within the framework of the established patent law. Granting that the matter of atomic energy is of vast consequence, we should not assume that a radically new invention should require different treatment with respect to the patent law, which was designed to deal with radically new departures and has always successfully done so.

3. The bill aims (Rept. No. 1211, p. 26) "to provide inventors with financial inducements in lieu of patent rights." Thus mandatory reports of certain atomic inventions are required (sec. 11 (a) (3)); patents relating to certain atomic inventions are barred (sec. 11 (a) sub. (1) and (2)); all atomic energy inventions and patents are subject to condemnation (sec. 11 (d)); and all patents relating to the utilization of atomic energy to the extent that they are permitted, are subject to compulsory licensing (sec. 11 (c)). To offset these provisions, a Patent Compensation Board is established to determine awards and reasonable royalties. Such arrangements are deemed far less likely to stimulate progress effectively than would operation of the patent system. Destruction of patents in this field can only serve to remove a valuable spur to progress.

4. Normal patent procedures are not inconsistent with the maintenance of secrecy where required for security reasons. Secrecy orders suspending prosecution (R. S. sec. 4894) have functioned effectively throughout the war, and the same procedure continues to be available. Destruction and elimination of patents "to eliminate risks of disclosure of restricted information" (Rept. No. 1211, p. 26), is therefore unnecessary.

The granting of patents is not at all inconsistent with appropriate exercise of the governmental police power, to the extent necessary to protect against the impact of potentially dangerous activities. (See Carbice v. American Patents, 283 U. S. 27, 33; 8 U. S. P. Q. 211, 213, footnote 3 and authorities cited.) Accordingly, the forbidding and destruction of patents on any such basis is unnecessary; Government policing and regulation would suffice to accomplish all that is necessary along this line.

5. The provisions of section 11 (c) (2) (A), licensing the Commission to use patented inventions relating to nonmilitary applications of atomic energy, and the provisions of section 11 (c) (3) denying injunctive relief against the Commission, are unnecessary. The Government, by existing statute, already possesses ample power to practice any patented inventions for governmental purposes, and is not subject to injunction in respect thereto.

6. Compulsory licensing of all patents relating to nonmilitary utilization of atomic energy (sec. 11 (c)) is highly objectionable. As to licenses to the Government, see the paragraph immediately above. As to private agencies operating in this field, there is no more and no different reason favoring compulsory licensing than in any other field of invention. The association has consistently opposed proposals of compulsory licensing of patents. (See the Annual Reports of the American Bar Association, vol. 53, pp. 72, 672, 673; vol. 54, p. 64; vol. 60, p. 133; vol. 63, pp. 172, 173; vol. 65, p. 104; vol. 67, p. 135; vol. 68, p. 153.)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT F. RICH

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, Frank J. P. Cleary, oldest employee of the Department of Agriculture, has retired after 54 years of service. He will be missed by his many friends and especially those on Capitol Hill. We wish him well and may God in His wisdom bestow upon him His richest blessings and may he have many more useful years ahead of him.

I am inserting herewith a poem entitled "Frank Cleary," by Horace C. Carlisle, who for many years has served on Capitol Hill in the office of the Architect of the Capitol, and who, it is believed by many, has earned the title of poet laureate of Congress because of his inspiring poems which have appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from time to time:

FRANK CLEARY

The great Agriculture Department
Has never had in its employ
A man more devoted to duty,
One who in it took greater joy,
Than did the congenial Frank Cleary,
Who for fifty-four happy years
Was counted as no ordinary
Man by his coworkers and peers.

From sixteen to seventy, daily,
This true benefactor could be Found in the pursuance of duty,
For none was more faithful than he—
He never grew tired of well-doing,
And had, to the last, no desire
To be relieved of his loved labors;
But much preferred not to retire.

He must have had for his life slogan
"Keep on keeping on, keeping on"—
He faithfully followed his conscience,
As follows the sunrise the dawn—
The Golden Rule he loved to practice
In everything he tried to do—
Yea, "likewise do ye unto others
As ye'd have them do unto you."

General Housing Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NED R. HEALY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. HEALY. Mr. Speaker, the more I study the provisions of the Wagner-Ellender-Taft general housing bill the more convinced I become of the urgent necessity for Congress to pass this bill before adjourning for the summer recess. It is very encouraging to note that the New York Times, in a recent editorial, has urged that the House of Representatives take speedy action on this bill. A copy of the editorial follows:

GENERAL HOUSING BILL NEEDED

Near the top of this Nation's list of urgent necessities are places to live—homes for returning veterans, millions of homes for families now living under slum conditions. The Wagner-Ellender-Taft housing bill, which has passed the Senate and is now stuck in the House Banking and Currency Committee, is a practical and thoroughgoing attempt to meet this need. It attacks the problem on all fronts. Over a 10-year period it proposes to stimulate the construction of at least 12,500,000 family dwelling units in urban areas. If we allow an average of three and a half persons to a family, this would be equivalent to rehousing about one-third of the present population of the United States.

About one-tenth of this total would be public housing. The other nine-tenths would be privately constructed, with the backing of various incentives. The area between public and private housing is sharply marked off. There is no possible competition between them. Federal aid, rising to a maximum of $135,000,000 a year and backed by local subsidies in the form of tax exemption, would go only to those who would otherwise be compelled to live in physically and morally unwholesome dwellings. The bill specifically requires that "private enterprise shall be encouraged to serve as large a part of the total need as it can."

In brief, the bill creates a new National Housing Agency, taking in all national housing units under one roof; provides for research, market analysis and local planning; streamlines existing Federal agencies intended to stimulate private investment in housing; offers liberalized mortgage insurance to aid low-income families; expands the low-rent public-housing program; defines conditions under which local communities can ascertain their needs and qualify for aid; offers loans and small grants for farm improvements; makes special provisions for veterans; and in other ways strives to keep a proper balance between present and future needs and between private and public enterprise.

This bill has been obstructed in the House committee, and it is possible that it will not pass before Congress adjourns. We believe that failure to act on it favorably this month would set back the housing program.

Booby-Trap Bills

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 13, 1946

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following timely editorial from the July 8 edition of the Chicago Herald-American:

BOOBY-TRAP BILLS

There are three bills pending in Congress which had better be laid aside until the heat of summer—and of left-wing New Deal propaganda—subsides.

One is the national health bill, which would establish socialized medicine under Federal domination.

The second is a bill to create a National Science Foundation, which would regiment all inquiry in the fields of physical sciences under a powerful Federal bureaucracy.

The third is the McMahon bill for the control of atomic energy, which would destroy the historic and fruitful incentive system of the United States Constitution and the patent laws and would make our laboratories mere workshops of world socialism allied to Russian communism.

These bills, as their common subject matter indicates, are closely related to one another.

Each of them is full of danger and deceit.

They are separate but interlocking parts of a single pattern.

None of them is being presented to Congress or to the people on its honest merits, if it has any; and, in the case of the atomic-energy bill at least, positive efforts are being made to conceal the truth.

Probably few persons would recognize the national-health bill for what it is under the disguising title that it now bears.

It is not before Congress now in its original form.

It was first presented as a section of the so-called general-welfare bill, sponsored by Senators WAGNER, of New York, and MURRAY, of Montana, and Representative DINGELL, of Michigan.

The PAC, the Communists, and numerous other left-wing elements were its vehement supporters.

But the Wagner-Murray-Dingell bill, on inspection, proved to be such a monstrosity that even the New Deal lost hope of its enactment.

Its socialized medicine section was therefore abstracted and sent to Congress as the national health bill with an inaccurate Presidential message blandly asserting that it is not a socialized medicine bill, an assertion which the text of the bill itself disproves.

The National Science Foundation bill would enable the Federal Government to commandeer the equipment and services of every scientific laboratory in the country, including all colleges and universities and private industries, and would establish a Federal monopoly of any and all patents in the development of which any Federal money might be traced.

The atomic energy bill has two major faults.

It would put absolute control of atomic energy in the hands of a small civilian board of scientists, excluding the national defense forces entirely.

In this phase, the bill is enthusiastically approved by the left-wing scientists who want to share all atomic knowledge with Soviet Russia at once.

The bill would likewise void the existing patent system, being similar in this respect to the National Science Foundation bill.

In a recent secret session of the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, Mr. Conder C. Henry appeared as an expert witness against the bill.

Mr. Henry was for 17 years the chief examiner of patent applications in the United States Patent Office and for 5 years was Assistant United States Patent Commissioner.

As a witness, he represented both the American Bar Association and the House Committee on Patents, being a member of the committee's national advisory council.

Discussing six pages of the McMahon bill pertaining to patents alone, Mr. Henry said:

"By removing the incentive provided by our patent laws the bill is a radical departure from anything known in our history.

"The only parallel I can find to it is a Soviet patent law."

This testimony—which the New Deal has tried to suppress in the House Military Affairs Committee—is applicable to all three of the pending bills.

The national health bill, the National Science Foundation bill and the McMahon bill are all portions of the persistent attempt that is being made under unscrupulously false pretenses to sovietize the United States by means of misrepresented legislation in Congress.

Should We Merge the Army and Navy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio debate on the American Forum of the Air June 25, 1946:

ANNOUNCER. What kind of military establishment should we have? Is the present Army-Navy set-up adequate? Should we merge the Army and Navy?

Once again, the vital issue of the week, discussed on your American Forum of the Air. [Applause.]

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. From the Shoreham Hotel in your Nation's Capital, Mutual proudly presents America's pioneer public service radio program, the American Forum of the Air, founded 18 years ago by Theodore Granik, attorney and moderator. The Forum presents every Tuesday night at this time the vital issue of the week, both sides of that issue, and the men who effect the decisions.

And now here is your Chairman, Theodore Granik.

Chairman GRANIK. Good evening.

President Truman's message to Congress outlining a plan for unification of the armed forces makes this subject once again a vital issue. The question of unification of the Army, Navy, and Air Forces, affecting as it does our national welfare, has been argued for many years. During the war, cooperation between the three branches of our military reached a high stage of perfection. As a result, any formal proposal for merger was relegated to the future.

The President's most recent message would eliminate one debatable point—a single Chief of Staff for the Army, Navy, and Air Force. Instead, the Joint Chiefs of Staff are to continue in the proposed reorganization under a civilian cabinet member.

This evening you will hear debated the opposing views of the Army and Navy on unification. The Navy feels that each branch of the military service should be a separate Department, and that each should have its own Secretary in the President's Cabinet.

Another highly controversial subject is the status of Naval Aviation. If air, land, and sea are to have equal status in the new Department of National Defense, what will happen to Naval Aviation? Will it be absorbed by the Army Air Forces? Will there be Air Forces control of aircraft carriers? These are questions which Navy spokesmen claim must be fully analyzed to understand the magnitude of the proposed merger.

Those who favor unification point out that these benefits must be considered: Economy of operation; the inter-related training of personnel; and coordinated planning.

The position of the Marine Corps in the new Department of National Defense is also a point of disagreement. The Army and Navy take differing positions as to where the Marine Corps fits, since the new Department will have only three major subsections: Air, land and sea.

This evening we have invited four congressional authorities to debate the question: "Should we merge the Army and Navy?" And now here are the speakers. First, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, former Admiral THOMAS C. HART. Senator HART:

Senator HART. I oppose the merger of the Army and Navy because any advantages possible to the Nation would be far outweighed by the future disadvantages. Of those disadvantages, I particularly deplore the full separation of the Army's ground forces and air components. There is less reason for that separation now than there was before the war, because the massed air attacks which comprise area bombing are things of the past. The future essential employment of the Army's air components must be in close cooperation with troops, maintaining control of the air, handling airborne troops, and direct tactical use. To that end, intimate and close association of ground and air components must obtain throughout peace and war. Otherwise, our entire Army will deteriorate, just as the Navy would go down if its air components were separated from it. That is what happened to the British, and we should not copy that error.

A large part of the motivation behind entire Army and Navy merger project comes from the effort of the Army Air Force to separate, duplicate, and swallow. Apart from the menace to the Navy, the most dangerous feature of the proposed merger lies right in that proposed divorcement of the Army Air from its ground forces.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Senator HART. Next, the Representative from West Virginia, who introduced the first resolution in the House of Representatives calling for unification of our armed forces, JENNINGS RANDOLPH. Congressman RANDOLPH.

Representative RANDOLPH. Mr. Granik, bitter experience makes us realize that unification of our Army, Navy, and Air Forces under a single, and of course civilian, executive department is the safest and surest guarantee of security. Now we must profit from our shortcomings in the last war. Consider the costly delays, tragic duplications, endless disputes, and unwarranted wastages. These occurred not only in the top level strategy in Washington, but in uneconomical use of our manpower, raw materials, production, and transportation, because no single agency, other than the President, could direct, reconcile, and balance the numerous and complicated requirements and plans of the War and Navy Departments.

The brilliant record of our armed forces is all the more amazing when we consider how long after Pearl Harbor it took to get into full military and industrial operation. Such a period of preparation cannot be counted on if we are to have another and a final war. Such successful cooperation as was achieved between the armed forces under pressure of national emergency, by patriotic military and civilian leaders, serves to emphasize the urgency of instituting by law a system of defense with the greatest likelihood of success.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman RANDOLPH. Next, a member of the House Naval Affairs Committee from the State of Louisiana, Representative F. EDWARD HÉBERT. Congressman HÉBERT.

Representative HÉBERT. The so-called merger of the armed forces of the United States proposed by President Truman is a misnomer. It fails to accomplish its expressed purpose by reducing the status of the present Cabinet members who have jurisdiction over the Army and Navy, and superimposes on these positions a so-called Civilian Defense Secretary, who then takes unto himself the powers not only of the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of the Navy, but also takes over the powers and jurisdiction of a separate Air Force.

In the national security and the future protection of this Nation against invasion or a common enemy, any effort to increase the power and effectiveness of one armed branch of the service to the detriment and eventual destruction of the other is undesirable, impractical, illogical, and untenable. As long as wars are fought there will be need for the foot soldier to occupy the land after it has been captured from the enemy. As long as the transportation of men and matériel is a requisite of war there shall be need of a Navy to deliver the goods.

The functions of the Army and Navy are separate and distinct and require each unto themselves peculiar talents. The United States has never lost a war, and through all the wars of success it always had a separate and distinct Army and Navy. So why break up a winning combination and merge it into an unknown fusion?

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, Congressman HÉBERT. And now a Congressman from Wisconsin, a member of the committee investigating the Pearl Harbor disaster, FRANK B. KEEFE. Congressman KEEFE.

Representative KEEFE. Mr. Granik, having served for months as a member of the committee investigating the Pearl Harbor disaster, I believe I can state with assurance that one of the major conclusions that must be drawn is that there must be a unified direction of our land, sea, and air forces. The principle of unified command in theaters of operation is agreed upon as sound by all our military leaders, even those who have opposed the creation of a single department for all of our armed forces here in Washington. If the land-sea-air war needs unity of direction in the theaters, it needs unity of direction here in Washington.

The proposal for unification of the armed services now before the Congress preserves the integrity of the Army and Navy, and recognizes legislatively what every American knows is true, that air power is coequal with land and sea power. Unification of the armed services does not mean the destruction of the Navy or its magnificent Marine Corps, but does mean that there shall be coordination and unification of command at the seat of government of all forces upon which the security of our Nation so vitally depends.

Chairman GRANIK. Thank you, gentlemen. There we have the issues, and the sides are clearly drawn. And now to start our discussion, gentlemen, your views seem to indicate that the heart of this question concerns the coequal status of the Air Forces. Congressman RANDOLPH, just how do the Air Forces fit into this picture?

Representative RANDOLPH. Mr. Granik, Representative HÉBERT speaks about the necessity, if we are to fight another war, of the foot soldier. He speaks about the necessity for a Navy to deliver the goods. Yet he makes no mention whatsoever of the Air Forces of the United States, the first line of defense in any war that we may fight in the future.

Now let's see. A coequal status of land, sea, and air forces means just that. We do not bury the Navy. We only lift the Air Forces to a parity with land and sea forces and that, gentlemen, is what the country desires.

Senator HART. Congressman RANDOLPH, I take it that you mean that this Department of Air shall include the Navy's Air; is that right?

Representative RANDOLPH. I think that Congressman KEEFE is just ready with that response.

Representative KEEFE. I expected that question to be asked. It seems to me that anyone who is familiar with the plan must have the answer himself, because it is clearly embodied in the plan and contemplates that the Air of the Navy, with its carrier-based planes, shall remain with the Navy. The only question that is involved is whether or not the Navy shall take over the function of operating land-based aircraft. I think that is a function for the United States Air Force, and I do not want to strip the Navy of its protective forces, so far as its carrier forces are concerned.

Senator HART. Then you do not believe that this is to be all-inclusive? Does it occur to you that in this war, and probably in the future, the Navy Air Forces, since the water of this world is 70 percent of the entire earth, if we are going to be properly defended, will be quite as large as the Army Air Forces?

Representative KEEFE. It has never so occurred to me under this plan, if I may answer your question, Senator HART, because I do not think that that is the plan. There is no need of building up straw men here for the purpose of arguments in order to knock those straw men down.

Representative HÉBERT. May I interrupt? I am happy to hear you say that about straw men, because I saw a great haystack around you when you were talking.

Representative KEEFE. Perhaps not straw. It is all right for you to refer to it as hay.

Representative HÉBERT. You appreciate that in my part of the country, straw is hay.

I want to answer both you and my good friend from West Virginia, JENNINGS RANDOLPH. To begin with, of course, I did not specify in my opening statement the Air Force of the Army and the Navy as one separate and distinct body, because the Army Air Force has its job to do with the Army and the Navy Air Force has its job to do with the Navy. It is part of it.

Representative KEEFE. Let's get to the haystack.

Representative HÉBERT. I am sure I won't find your needle in it.

It would be very interesting for you to know—perhaps you do know already and maybe you wanted to bring it out but I will bring it out now: Do you know that the tonnage alone in the Pacific War revealed that the Navy—and I am giving these only in round figures for the purpose of understanding—sank 2,125,000 tons of Japanese shipping, a total of 23 percent plus, as compared to the Army's 600,000, or 6.88. In the merchant shipping, the Navy sank 1,500,000 tons—I am talking of Navy aircraft as compared with Army aircraft—and Army aircraft sank 500,000 tons. Of the major combat vessels, the Navy sank 569,000 tons—let me finish this, Mr. Granik, because this is very interesting—and the Army sank only 19,000.

I think we should reverse the position. Instead of the whale swallowing Jonah, you would have Jonah swallow the whale.

Representative KEEFE. Mr. HÉBERT, those figures are, indeed, very interesting, but they prove nothing. It is a fact, is it not, that you had unification of the services in the Pacific? Those same forces that you are talking about, that did such a magnificent job, were operating under a unification of command in the field.

Senator HART. Oh, no; they were not. What about General Arnold's insisting on commanding all the B–29's all over the Pacific right from his desk in Washington? Do you call that unity of command?

Representative RANDOLPH. I should like to say that, of course, the best bricks are made with straw, and, of course, Congressman KEEFE will do his part in presenting the arguments.

We agree that land-based aircraft, which you apparently depreciate in World War II, would be preeminent if we have World War III. What would be the place, Senator HART, of land-based aircraft in another war? You have said that bombings are a thing of the past. That was in your opening statement.

Senator HART. All right, how do you like General Arnold's statement?

Representative RANDOLPH. I like it fine. I am for General Arnold.

Senator HART. All right, last February he published in the National Geographic Magazine, "Of great potential importance is the long-range ground-to-ground guided missile. This will be the strategic long-range bombardment airplane of the future." That is from General Arnold. He said it repeatedly.

I would like to ask a question of someone on that side. Why should the Army Air Corps seek to duplicate in those weapons, rockets, guided missiles, what is really flying ordnance, what is being done by another organization? You say you don't like duplication. How about that?

Representative RANDOLPH. Won't you speak to him about duplication in a vote he just cast? Won't you do that, Congressman KEEFE?

Representative KEEFE. We will get to that in a few minutes. If you want to talk about duplication, that is one of the things I am exceedingly interested in and one of the reasons why I take the position for unification of command. I have never been able to understand, Admiral, why it is that the services of the Medical Corps, the services of hospitalization, the services of procurement—which draw specifications of rockets, for example, where the Army's specification will be 4¼ inches, perhaps, and the Navy's will be 4¾ inches, so that they cannot be used with the same projection material—should be duplicated. If we are going to fire rockets in the next war, or any other kind of missiles, why is it that unification of command could not have unification of specifications, so that we would not have this tremendous duplication that we now have, and which we experienced in the last war?

Senator HART. As far as the Air Forces are concerned, you might search for your answer in the fact that the Army Air Corps during this last war insisted upon duplicating such facilities as medical, legal, and chaplains. They even had to have their own chaplains.

Representative KEEFE. I think that is a case of the pot calling the kettle black, so far as that is concerned, and solves nothing. But here is the type of duplication I am talking about, where I am told very authoritatively that on Okinawa the competition between the two services was so severe that they had to draw a line down through the center of that island, and in combat the Army took the west side and the Navy took the east side, so to speak, and a Marine aviator who needed a quonset hut that was right across the line on the Army side couldn't get it because that belonged to the Army and was subject to Army regulations.

Senator HART. There is a lot of volume to that.

Representative KEEFE. It is true, isn't it, Admiral? You were there.

Senator HART. No; and neither were you.

Representative KEEFE. I thought you were.

Representative HÉBERT. Mr. Keefe, may I ask you this question: Would your so-called bill have allowed the Marine to get his quonset hut?

Representative KEEFE. This isn't my so-called bill, Mr. HÉBERT; this is the bill that is the suggestion of the President of the United States, your President, and it is not my bill.

Representative HÉBERT. He is your President, but I am glad to see a good Republican championing a Democratic program.

Chairman GRANIK. I have a question addressed to Congressman RANDOLPH. Congressman RANDOLPH, where do you expect to find a man who alone can do all the work which engages the full capacity of Secretaries Patterson and Forrestal?

Representative RANDOLPH. Eisenhower in Europe commanded a greater number of forces, of individuals, than would be commanded under this program.

Senator HART. That is not a parallel at all.

Representative RANDOLPH. It is a fact; that is the point.

I want to go back to Okinawa for just a minute. When General Doolittle arrived there, he found a lack of uniformity, no unification, and the so-called commander of the island couldn't even regulate the traffic violations.

Senator HART. Jimmy is a great stunt flyer; he would find anything.

Representative RANDOLPH. You will never forget that first attack in the Pacific. What was it that electrified the American people and the world to the power of this country? It was Doolittle and his raid in the Pacific, we know that.

Senator HART. Principally, it was Navy carriers.

Representative RANDOLPH. I want to go back for just a moment. When the Richardson committee made its report in 1945, that report was drawn up 95 percent with the approval of the senior Army commanders and the top flight Navy people on the ground; that is, in the Pacific theaters we found Nimitz and Halsey for unification. Why did they reverse their testimony later, Senator HART?

Senator HART. Oh, they saw the light. They saw what was going to happen.

Representative RANDOLPH. Where was the light best seen, when they were actually there in the Pacific or when they had returned to Washington?

Senator HART. Well, my champion here spoke about haystacks, and so on. I have now to remind you that we ought not to throw dust around, either. We are talking about the merger, not the unification but merger, of the War and Navy Departments. You are talking about unity of command in the field, which everyone grants and with which there is no quarrel whatever. Don't throw the sand around.

Representative KEEFE. May I ask you a question, Admiral? Do you believe in unity of command in the theater of operation?

Senator HART. Yes; and I don't think that "Hap" Arnold should mix in with it from Washington.

Representative KEEFE. You have answered the question. Do you believe if there is necessity for unity of command in the theater of operations, that there should be unity of command at Washington?

Senator HART. Oh, yes, there is unity of command in the President. That is constitutional, and you want to take it away from him.

Representative KEEFE. Let me ask you this question. A bill was presented to the Senate not long ago known as the La Follette-Monroney bill. You voted for that bill, did you not?

Senator HART. Yes; and I hope you will.

Representative KEEFE. I shall. You voted for it. Under the terms of that bill, there is a merger or consolidation and unification of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Military Affairs.

Senator HART. Following your argument, one man on that committee should run the whole show. The chairman should do the whole thing and he shouldn't need any committee members.

Representative KEEFE. You voted for unification of the legislative committees on military affairs and naval affairs in the United States Senate, did you not?

Senator HART. Oh, yes.

Representative KEEFE. And you likewise voted for unification of the subcommittee in charge of naval appropriations and the subcommittee in charge of military appropriations, did you not?

Senator HART. Well, there is a lot of sand flying around, but that is all right.

Representative KEEFE. You believed in that, did you not, Admiral? When you cast that vote, you so believed?

Senator HART. I was hopeful.

Representative KEEFE. All right. Now the point that I want to make, Mr. Granik, is this: The Admiral, voting for unification at the legislative level, which is one part of this team, by the way——

Senator HART (interposing). Yes; that is committee stuff, too.

Representative KEEFE. That is committee stuff, you bet it is. Now I ask, Is it not fair to ask you whether or not there should not be a unified budget submitted to the unified finance committee of the House and Senate as provided in the La Follette-Monroney bill?

Senator HART. That is a very small matter, one way or the other. You can do it either way.

Chairman GRANIK. I have a question——

Representative HÉBERT (interposing). May I continue this? I know my colleague doesn't need any counsel to come to his defense, but I want to keep the record a little straight here. Now, of course, the Senator voted for the so-called La Follette-Monroney streamlining bill over in the Senate, but because he has great confidence that the House will rectify the errors of the Senate when it gets over there, and he was perfectly willing to get the bill on its way out of the Senate so it could be perfected in the House, and my colleague from Wisconsin knows very well that that bill will never pass the House of Representatives and the entity of the Naval Affairs Committee and the Military Affairs Committee be destroyed. And mind you now, that bill does not set up any particular specification for the combination of the so-called Army Air Force now in this merger.

You have had your say. Let me talk a little bit myself.

Representative KEEFE. You are kicking up an awful lot of hay, I can tell you that, and you aren't getting to the point at all.

Chairman GRANIK. I have a question directed to Congressman HÉBERT. Congressman, why shouldn't air power be recognized as coequal with land and sea power?

Representative HÉBERT. I am recognizing air power as coequal with land and sea power, but divided each one to the other, the Army supporting its own air power, the Navy supporting its own air power. And in connection with that, let me tell JENNINGS RANDOLPH I do not depreciate the value of land planes in war. It was my good fortune and privilege to be in the South Atlantic when the last German submarine was erased from the waters of the Atlantic, under the command of Jonas Ingram, and it was erased with a land plane, but the plane was commanded by the Navy.

Representative RANDOLPH. May I have the opportunity of answering my colleague, Mr. HÉBERT, by saying that General Karl Kohler, of the German Air Force, said, "Everything depends on air supremacy; everything else must take second place." We are not going that far tonight. We are saying to you that, in the words of General Kohler, the country that has air supremacy vigorously strengthens its air power over all other forms of armament to maintain its supremacy and rule the land and sea.

Representative HÉBERT. As a result of the last war, we do not have to refer to German authorities. I prefer to take our American authorities and the success they had.

Representative RANDOLPH. Let's take General Arnold and General Eisenhower.

Representative HÉBERT. Certainly, take them both.

Representative RANDOLPH. Let's take General Marshall; take Nimitz; let's take Halsey in the field.

Representative HÉBERT. But when they got back and saw the light of day, they saw what was going to happen and they saw how the Army tried to swallow the Navy. The people now think that the Pacific war was an Army show, and it was strictly a Navy show, because the Army had good press agents.

Chairman GRANIK. Did you want to finish your question, Mr. RANDOLPH?

Representative RANDOLPH. I want to say, Senator, take a naval commander with 17 years of experience; take his letter to me, written from Corregidor, and what does he say? It is only going to take a moment to read it. "It is not for this war that I ask unification. It is to protect us from the next war." That is a naval commander. The letter was written from Corregidor in 1943.

Senator HART. I will bring forward 4,000 other Navy commanders who will take exception to that.

Representative RANDOLPH You couldn't bring forward Nimitz and Halsey in 1941; you know what they told the Richardson committee.

Senator HART. I want to answer what you said about the German Navy, and so on.

Representative RANDOLPH. I never mentioned the German Navy.

Senator HART. You mentioned the German Air and Navy. It is in the testimony over there at Nuremberg that the reason for the comparative failure of the German submarines was that they could not get the single separated air force to work with them in their campaign.

Representative RANDOLPH. We are not advocating a separate air force.

Representative KEEFE. I would like to get a question in here, Mr. Chairman. I have asked a question of Senator HART.

Senator HART. I answered it.

Representative KEEFE. He did not answer it and Mr. HÉBERT took him off the hook, so to speak, and threw a lot of dust into the picture. I want to ask you this question: You are speaking for the Navy in this thing?

Senator HART. No, I am not.

Representative HÉBERT. The President has muzzled the Navy.

Representative KEEFE. Under this unification program, what is being given up by the Navy that is not being given up by the other two arms? What is the Navy giving up under this program?

Senator HART. They see what is coming now.

Representative KEEFE. Just speculation, that is all, and talk.

Senator HART. They see what is coming.

Representative KEEFE. Answer my question. Let's get an answer. What is the Navy actually giving up under this unification program that the other two services are not giving up?

Senator HART. It is giving up its shirt.

Representative KEEFE. You can't answer anything that answers the argument. If that is the type of argument, we can go on with it.

Senator HART. You are very much concerned and interested in this Army Air. Is this not about the argument that you have: The Army must have a separate air force now because pretty soon there won't be any heavy bombers. The guided missiles are supplanting them. What will the Army aviators do unless they control that program, too, even if the program is one of ballistics and physics rather than one of aeronautics? There won't be anything left for them to do, will there? They have to get it while the getting is good.

Representative RANDOLPH. You repeatedly refer to the Army Air Forces. That is not contemplated in the legislation or plan of the President of the United States. We speak about the Army, the Navy, and the United States Air Forces. Why do you try to make the Air Forces an appendage of the Army always?

Representative HÉBERT. Mr. RANDOLPH, call a rose by any name. Why do you quibble about the United States Air Forces or Army Air Forces? You and I both know what it is going to be. To answer my good friend from Wisconsin, the rudiments of arithmetic tell me two can always out vote one. With two generals against one admiral, what chance has a poor admiral got?

You just showed me a picture there that answered the question: General Spaatz on one side, General Arnold on the other, and Admiral Nimitz in the middle, and underneath, the Navy in the squeeze play.

Representative KEEFE. What have you got now? You have a Navy and an Army.

Representative HÉBERT. That is correct.

Representative KEEFE. And an impasse; whenever a question for decision comes up, you refer it to the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Senator HART. And it always gets decided.

Representative KEEFE. My experience has been, in reading the record, that ultimately it gets decided, I may say, Admiral, after a lot of discussion and a lot of delays. But in this program that we have, set up by the President of the United States, he has the final word, but he has a civilian secretary of common defense, and an under secretary for common defense, and you have a secretary for the Army, you have a secretary for the Navy, you have a secretary for the Air Force, you have a commanding general of the Army, you have a chief of naval operations, and you have a commanding general of the United States Air Forces.

Representative HÉBERT. If you keep on going, you will have no unification, but a multitudinous tree spreading out.

Representative KEEFE. You have no such thing. You have a stream-lining program that the President has asked for, and I as a good Republican think at least in that one respect, he is absolutely right, and I am surprised a good Republican from Louisiana can't see the President's suggestion.

Representative HÉBERT. A good what?

Representative KEEFE. A good Democrat, that is right.

Chairman GRANIK. Senator, I have a question directed to you. Senator HART, which is the more important to the future security of our country, the creation of one fighting team under one department, or the retention of individual team members under separate departments which must be combined in the event of an emergency?

Senator HART. You see, Mr. Granik, I have been up on Capitol Hill for some time and I have come to believe in the committee system. I believe Mr. KEEFE doesn't like it. He wants a czar. I do believe in a committee system at the seat of the government, where there is time to make these proper strategic decisions. I think two or three heads are always better than one. Mr. KEEFE thinks it ought to be a czar. I don't agree.

Representative KEEFE. Just in view of that last crack of the distinguished Senator, let me say that for 7 years now I have been a member of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, which has two subcommittees, a naval and a military subcommittee, each one passing upon the budgetary requests of the separate services, the whole committee never seeing the whole picture. We have the Military Affairs Committee of the House and the Naval Affairs Committee of the House; the whole committee never sees the whole picture. That is why you voted, with me and with my idea, when you voted for the La Follette-Monroney resolution, because I do not want a czar. I want a committee of the Congress that can appropriate after they see the entire picture and have one single budget submitted to the Congress, and save some of the taxpayers' money instead of boondoggling it away as has been done during the past few years. If that is a czar, then I want a czar.

Representative HÉBERT. Mr. KEEFE, if the La Follette-Monroney bill comes before the House, are you going to vote in favor of it?

Representative KEEFE. I certainly will. I very much favor it.

Representative HÉBERT. And after that fine speech you made just now about wanting separate committees to look into it you are going to vote to merge it?

Representative KEEFE. I have not said that. I said I want one committee to look at one budget for a unified command.

Representative HÉBERT. That is splendid, and to carry your thought on through, you would do away with all committees and have one committee looking at all the expenditures.

Representative KEEFE. I think it would be a lot better than the way it is done now.

Chairman GRANIK. Congressman KEEFE, here is a question directed to you. Are you aware that Canada merged all its arms in 1923, and then during the war years reestablished the former system of separate cabinet departments?

Represenative KEEFE. I don't know anything about what they have done in Canada.

Senator HART. It is a good thing to look these things up.

Representative KEEFE. It might be a good thing to look them up, and I might suggest to my distinguished friend that I do not pose as an expert on this, as does the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, but I have asked you a few very definite, pertinent questions tonight, and your distinguished colleague, and all I have got is an answer that I want to be a czar. You haven't answered a single question that has been asked tonight in this debate.

Senator HART. There are so many words we can't get them out.

Representative KEEFE. You haven't given a single answer that really touches upon the real issue. I want to get an answer to this question, Mr. Granik, and it is a partial answer to the question that you asked: Why does everyone agree that unity of command in the theaters is sound, but they oppose unity of command here at Washington? Why is it?

Chairman GRANIK. Do you want to take it, Senator HART?

Senator HART. There isn't time to answer that. Mr. KEEFE knows the answer.

Representative HÉBERT. We will answer it, Mr. Granik. Mr. KEEFE reminds me very much of my high school debating days when, if I couldn't think of anything else to say, I said, "'Tisn't so." The Senator and myself have been up here for the last half hour giving explanations, and the only refutation we have is, "'Tain't so," but let's find out if it is so.

Representative KEEFE. Read your opening statement and if that isn't a "'tain't so" argument, I never heard one.

Representative HÉBERT. That is a splendid argument.

Representative KEEFE. Your opening statement is a splendid example of a "'tain't so," without proof.

Representative HÉBERT. We have not objected to unification of command in times of war in the field, and I don't think anybody else objects to it—it is a sensible, direct approach—for the same reason that we as Americans object to governmental controls during peacetime but we do not object to them during war, as a war measure. There is absolutely no reason in the world to confuse the issue of unification as against merger. You gentlemen continue to use the word "unification," when, in effect, what is proposed is a merger; and let me follow this through with one thought. As I said before, if you get two generals against one admiral, you will have the generals running the Navy, and if you look at the history of the world, you will find out every time the landlubber or the general or the army man ran the show with the navy, that that country lost, and I refer you back to the time of Napoleon when he tried to direct the crossing of the Channel with a navy which he didn't have or couldn't get together; I direct your attention to the Germany of the First World War which was controlled by the army; I direct your attention to the Germany of the Second World War which was controlled by the army; and then the Japanese Navy which was controlled by the war lords of Japan.

Representative KEEFE. I can see the kind of politics they have down in New Orleans. You take the whole show. Just make a sensible argument. Under the proposal, you have the Secretaries of the Army, the Navy, and the Air Forces. Who is above them? Who makes the final determination?

Representative HÉBERT. The President of the United States.

Representative KEEFE. Under this plan, is it the two generals against an admiral sitting in between? Certainly not. It is the Secretary of Common Defense, and above him is the President of the United States.

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry; we pause for summation of the arguments. Congressman RANDOLPH, will you sum up?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Granik, we know that had we had before World War II a single Department of Common Defense, we would have saved millions of dollars—that will be denied; it could well have been billions of dollars—the war would have been shortened, and tens of thousands of lives would have been saved. We cannot afford another Pearl Harbor, and we know that if World War III comes, an enemy or enemies will strike directly, not on land or sea, but by air at the very heart of the United States. Such an attack would not be made by land armies or battleship fleets, it would come from the skies.

We know that it is for economy in peace and efficiency if we go into another conflict that this unification of the armed services, with coequal status for land, sea, and air should become a part of the fabric of the law of the United States. Now when the lessons of World War II are still impressed upon the people of this country, just as the lessons were impressed upon Nimitz and Halsey in the Pacific during the fighting, our Congress should take courageous action.

We remember, also, regardless of the unification that took place after a costly delay in the field, that in the procurement alone, 25 percent would be saved because of the duplications and overlappings of purchases and installations that would be eliminated. In the words of Secretary of State Byrnes himself, millions of dollars in procurement alone, and an increased and workable intelligence, would be the result.

The American people are ready for unification. A cross section of our national thinking, conducted by unbiased polls, indicates at least 70 to 75 percent in favor. Congress had better get in step.

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry, Congressman RANDOLPH, your time has expired. Senator HART, will you sum up?

Senator HART. Mr. Granik, there is no proof of the extent of these various economies that have been set forth by the proponents for the merger. I think that anyone who understands this question, who has thought about it for a long time, believes in cooperation and unification, but they do not believe in a merger and then hoping that unification can be forced into the picture afterward. Those figures about economy that have been given are so loose. General Eisenhower stated one time that 25 percent of the cost of the war would have been saved. When you figure that up, that means $6,666,000,000. Economists have gone to work to try to discover where even a small part of that could have been saved by eliminating duplications. They have wholly failed to discover much of it.

Now this discussion has come out very clearly in the open. I used the word "swallow" as the design of the Army air components, and our opponents this evening have shown that that is just the intention. At one time it was clearly the intention that the Marine Corps would be swallowed. The country would not quite stand for that; the marines have made too good a record, they are too close to the hearts of the people, and the Army backed off and gave that up and it is not in the President's message. As a matter of fact, it is the other way; the provision is that the Navy shall retain the marines. However, that will not be long. The idea is to swallow instead of unify.

Chairman GRANIK. I am sorry, gentlemen, our time is up. [Applause.]

Flint Rent-Control Ordinance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, during the discussion during the last few weeks on the question of the continuance of OPA and of rent control, a great deal of attention has been manifested in Congress toward my home city of Flint, Mich., and the rent-control ordinance which was adopted by that city. Flint, as you know, is a city of approximately 160,000 people and is the home of the Buick, the Chevrolet, the A-C Spark Plug Co., the Fisher Body, and many other kindred institutions.

Flint is a city operating under a commission-manager form of government of a nonpartisan nature and consists of nine commissioners; one of whom is elected as mayor. The political personnel of the city government comprises both Democrats and Republicans, and includes representatives of labor and industry.

The written ordinance adopted by the city of Flint, ordinance No. 509 as amended, is a striking example of efficiency with which local government can operate when unhampered and unrestricted by Federal agencies.

In the Seventy-seventh Congress, second session, the acts of January 30, 1942, and October 2, 1942, declared it to be in the interest of the national defense and security and necessary to the effective prosecution of the present war that speculative, unwarranted, and abnormal increases in rent be prevented.

On April 28, 1942, the Administrator of the Office of Price Administration designated the city of Flint to be a defense-rental area and recommended March 1, 1942, to be the maximum rent date. Delay on the part of the OPA authorities to set up proper enforcement machinery after Flint had been declared a critical rental area was the reason for the action taken by the city of Flint in passing their own rent ordinance. The cost of administration of this ordinance is a small fraction of what the cost of Federal control in Flint would have been had the OPA promulgated and administered its own OPA set-up.

The Department of Labor surveys show that rents in Flint have been stabilized and held in line as successfully as in any city in the country. The Flint ordinance was passed pursuant to emergency powers under their city charter and their local municipal judges were designated as rent arbitrators and the facilities of the police department, city attorney's office, and other city officials were used to enforce the ordinance.

A most striking cooperation existed in Flint with particular reference to their rent ordinance because the local real-estate board and both the landlord and tenant committees approved the measure.

In these days when the Federal Government has been endeavoring to interfere with State and municipal matters, it is refreshing to think that here is a city who formulated its own city ordinance with reference to rent control; put the same into successful operation; and met with the practically universal acceptance and cooperation on the part of the citizens of Flint.

It demonstrates beyond a shadow of a doubt that when our municipalities apply good judgment and common sense in the passing of their ordinances and in the administration thereof, they will get greater efficiency from local self-administration than would have resulted had the authority emanated from Washington.

Those responsible for the formation of Flint's rent-control ordinance, and those who have so successfully administered the same, and the citizens who so willingly complied with the ordinance, are entitled to great credit.

It clearly demonstrates that under our republican form of government, the citizens of our local communities are the best judges of conditions in their communities, and the best judges of the ways to improve those conditions.

Canteen at North Platte, Nebr.

REMARKS
OF
HON. A. L. MILLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, before it has receded too far into the past and is forgotten in the excitement of the war's aftermath, I want the Members of Congress to know of a voluntary project whose successful operation should renew our faith in the individual initiative that has made America great.

Out at North Platte, in western Nebraska, the good folks of that community, assisted by others from 125 towns in Nebraska and Colorado, set up a canteen in the Union Pacific Railway Station, where day and night all through the war, they met all trains, serving food, refreshments, and dispensing good cheer to more than 6,000,000 men and women in our armed forces.

This was a great community undertaking and received no help from the USO or any other national source.

Churches, service clubs, and many other organizations in 125 towns took their turn in donating their services and food to this splendid undertaking. It was a remarkable outpouring of the good will and hospitality of the people who live close to the soil and sun in western Nebraska.

On August 14, the city of North Platte will hold a celebration doing honor to those in the community and the surrounding towns who took part in this unselfish undertaking.

All trains both from the east and the west stopped in North Platte, and the service men and women on these trains will never forget their happy experience in North Platte, Nebr., the gateway to the cattle country, because here they met real honest hospitality.

The story can best be told by a card sent to me by the committee who is sponsoring this celebration. It follows:

A RECIPE FOR HOSPITALITY—WESTERN STYLE

One hundred and twenty thousand servicemen (from all branches) during a 10-minute stop, 1,000 volunteer workers from 125 towns in Nebraska and Colorado, 90,000 sandwiches (homemade), 40,000 cookies (homemade), 150 crates of oranges, 31,000 hard-boiled eggs, 16,000 candy bars, 20,000 bottles of milk, 1,400 pounds of coffee, 20 boxes of apples.

Place heaping plates of food on long tables. Invite servicemen to all they can eat. Station smiling workers behind tables to replenish depleted supplies. Send other workers onto trains with baskets of food. Witness astonishment on faces of servicemen when they learn "its all free." Give all men a cheery send-off as train pulls out of station.

Do this every day, as high as 30 times a day, and you have a skeleton picture of 1 month's activity at the North Platte Canteen. But it was much more than 1 month. The canteen latchstring was out for 52 months—from December 1941 until April 1946. Over 6,000,000 servicemen shared its hospitality.

This was not a USO project. It was just plain hospitality—western style.

Mr. Speaker, again I say this represents the true sentiments and a real outpouring from the hearts of the people in 125 towns in western Nebraska and Colorado. I doubt if this record can be equaled any place in the United States.

OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, many of us have remarked concerning the OPA that it stubbornly fought to perpetuate the economic fallacies it had created, even after it had been made quite clear that they were fallacies and contained nothing good. This has been one of the amazing manifestations of the bureaucratic mind of OPA. It has shown that it is incapable of distinguishing between right principles and wrong.

But it is not even original in its wrongness. It is following a pattern established long ago, very early in the days of trying, under the guise of stabilizing the economy, to regiment industry.

We might all read with profit an article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of July 15. The author, Mr. Edward H. Collins, associate financial editor, provides the perspective on OPA. The thoughts of OPA are the same as the NRA. The hysterical cries that all is lost unless Congress abdicates to the amateurish tinkerers and meddlers are echoes of the screams of the blue eagle.

As Mr. Collins remarks, none of the dread consequences that were predicted did actually follow the death of the NRA.

The article follows:

THE WEEK IN FINANCE
(By Edward H. Collins)

NRA, OPA (OR THROUGH THE LOOKING GLASS)

If anyone doubts that history repeats itself, let him turn to the newspaper files for the first half of 1935, and let him browse for an hour or two among the stories of the dying days of the National Industrial Recovery Act, 11 years ago. He will rub his eyes in disbelief at the striking parallel he will find there for the current historical phase of the Office of Price Administration.

Everyone knows, of course, that the NRA died at the hands of the Supreme Court; but, men's memories being what they are, not everyone remembers that if the Court hadn't done so, the Congress undoubtedly would have. The NRA was enacted June 16, 1933, and was scheduled to expire June 16, 1935. Long before then, however, much the same revolution against this national experiment in the cartelization of industry had developed that we find today with respect to the OPA and its activities.

The criticism that the OPA is obstructionist, rather than helpful, in its effects on production, which we hear today had abundant precedent in editorial comment on the NRA a little more than a decade ago. The New York Herald Tribune of April 13, 1935, likened the American economy to Gulliver in Lilliput, pinioned by little men who "swarm all over him, driving in pegs, tying him down."

Discerning students were not slow to see the economic fallacy which underlay the NRA. "It has operated," wrote Walter Lippmann about that time, "on the theory of a high hourly rate paid for by monopolistically administered high prices." The high nominal wage rates were promptly swallowed up, he pointed out, by higher costs and higher prices, and in consequence, labor as a whole was as badly, if not worse, off than it had been before.

The Brookings Institution, a formidable critic of price-control policies under OPA today, was no less critical of the NRA in 1935. One or two excerpts from a report issued by Brookings on April 18 of that year remind us that the political administration of bureaucratic controls did not come in with Mr. Truman. The report observes:

"The NRA has done much to propagate the fallacy that raising wage rates is itself a good thing. So far as we are aware, it has made all its wage adjustments in one direction—upward. It has gone far to spread abroad the notion that wage rates should never be reduced. * * *

"The freezing of the wage structure has involved a very considerable freezing of the price structure. To price rigidities resulting from this factor have been added those resulting from permission granted to business to 'stabilize' prices through concerted action against 'cutthroat competition.' "

Despite the fact that the unemployment situation showed little or no improvement under the NRA, it had the support of labor, and the spectacular Gen. Hugh B. Johnson, like Mr. Bowles a decade later, had succeeded in persuading many persons that the vast bureaucracy which he headed was all that was keeping the Nation from falling into a bottomless pit. With one or two name changes the following paragraph written by Mr. Lippmann at the end of May might well have been written in 1946:

"The agency set up * * * was allowed to call itself by the * * * conceited and untruthful name of the National Recovery Administration. By the time General Johnson had occupied the front pages for a few months, the people at large had it impressed on them that the NRA was the whole recovery program."

All these things headed up into a fight on the renewal of NRA strikingly similar to that on OPA. As the time approached to start action on such a measure the President demanded a renewal for another 2 years. The answer of the Senate Finance Committee suggested the attitude of Congress and of much of the Nation toward the NRA. It voted out a measure which would have shorn the agency of much of its powers and terminated its existence April 1, 1936—10 months later. In the fight that ensued the weapons used by the bureaucrats and the administration again will seem familiar to those who have followed the desperate effort of the OPA to cling to its wartime powers. If OPA had its staged rallies, the NRA planned and carried out an equally spontaneous march on Washington by businessmen from various parts of the country—this march, incidentally, differing from Coxey's more famous one in the fact that it was made by pullman.

As to the fear campaign of Messrs. Bowles and Porter, here, again, General Johnson anticipated them. The Senate's action, the general warned the country, "means the death of the NRA," and would "plunge business into blank uncertainty." Anticipating Mr. Bowles' battle cry of "crippling amendments," he declared dramatically that it would be "better to kill NRA now. That would at least end the uncertainty."

Before the fight for which the lines were then being drawn could be decided, the issue was lifted out of the arena for good and all by the Supreme Court on May 28 with its decision in the Schechter case. From General Johnson that decision invoked a dire and bitter warning. "The lowering of wages and the firing," he told reporters in an interview, "will begin tomorrow."

Strange as it may seem, General Johnson proved wrong, and the Brookings Institution proved right. Hourly wage rates, which had been 53 cents in 1934, averaged 55 cents in 1935 as a whole, and 56 cents for 1936. What is more important, pay rolls rose from 70 in 1934 to above 80 in 1935 and to 93 plus in 1936. And industrial production, which stood at 65 when the NRA was—shall we say "murdered"?—in late May, had reached 80 by the end of that year and by the end of 1936 was at 120. What General Johnson had taken to be a bottomless pit turned out, in fact, to have been a springboard.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Alabama, FRANK BOYKIN, is running for the United States Senate to fill the unexpired term of the late John Bankhead.

Everybody in this House knows FRANK BOYKIN as a man of astronomical ability and unbelievable energy. A short time ago he singlehandedly got through the House the Tombigbee project, which will mean more to the people of the South than anything in recent history. FRANK BOYKIN has more friends in the House and in the Senate than any man who has ever served in either branch since the inception of our Congress. This is an accepted fact in Alabama and in the Nation.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am delighted to enclose herewith an editorial which appeared in the Mobile Press Register on Sunday, July 14, 1946. This editorial was written by my dear friend, Ralph Chandler, who is the publisher of this fine newspaper:

MOBILE'S UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVE FRANK W. BOYKIN, WORTHY SUCCESSOR TO SENATOR BANKHEAD

After due consideration of the candidates and issues involved, the Mobile Press Register has reached the conclusion that the interests of south Alabama and the State would best be served by nominating FRANK W. BOYKIN for the United States Senate in the Democratic primary of July 30.

Representative BOYKIN has served this district and the State well in his five terms in the House at Washington and to our point of view deserves as near unanimous an endorsement of south Alabamians as is possible. The Press Register urges all-out support of his campaign.

When 2 years ago the Press Register vigorously supported Jim Simpson in his campaign for nomination to the Senate, we did so in the profound belief that the best interests of Alabama and the Nation would be served by having in Washington men with too much intestinal fortitude to permit themselves to become rubber stamps for any minority or well-organized pressure group.

The need, as the Press Register saw it then, was for another Senator to serve with the lamented Senator John H. Bankhead who in his public career had maintained a degree of political independence that left him bound to no self-seeking group, and that enabled him to cast his Senate vote in behalf of all the people.

Alabama needed another Senator who would not forget that his primary obligation was to the people of this State, not to some relatively small but politically powerful group whose chief interest was in other sections of the country and who in order to further their selfish causes in other sections were willing to offer Alabama and the rest of the South as a sacrifice on the altar of political expediency.

The Press Register's views have not changed in these 2 years.

Nor has our respect and admiration for Jim Simpson, and the things for which he stands, been reduced one iota.

Two events since that campaign of 2 years ago have brought the Press Register to a decision to cast its lot with another candidate, rather than Jim Simpson, in the current Senate campaign.

The first event, which brought on the current campaign, was the death of Senator Bankhead.

Emergence of Mobile's Representative BOYKIN to a position of first-rate influence in Washington was the second event.

A combination of the two, leads the Press Register to the decision that all Alabama, and particularly south Alabama, would be best served by sending FRANK BOYKIN to the Senate as the best possible replacement for Senator Bankhead.

Throughout his five terms—10 years—in the House of Representatives, FRANK BOYKIN has worked closely with Senator Bankhead and many other Members of the Senate. He was credited by Senator Bankhead with an important part in the passage of much legislation bearing the Bankhead name and resulting in untold benefit to the farmers, and consequently to all the people of the United States.

FRANK BOYKIN is prepared by training and experience and his political philosophy is enough akin to that of Senator Bankhead, to admirably equip him to carry on where Senator Bankhead left off.

He has served Mobile, south Alabama, all Alabama, and the Nation well, has FRANK BOYKIN.

A man of tireless energy and exceptional ability at getting things done, FRANK BOYKIN is one of the most popular men among his colleagues in Congress. His friendships have not been confined among the House membership. He knows and commands the respect of many Members of the Senate, and of men in key positions in the administrative branch of government.

FRANK BOYKIN'S 10 years in the House of Representatives have won for him not only the confidence of the people of his district but have made him countless friends in other sections of Alabama as well. He has been instrumental in obtaining benefits not only for his own district but for other sections of Alabama, and his record in this respect entitles him to State-wide support in his candidacy for Senator Bankhead's unexpired term.

His record in the House qualifies FRANK BOYKIN to go with absolute justification before the voters of all Alabama and ask promotion to the Senate in order that he might be in better position to continue serving. FRANK BOYKIN deserves that chance.

FRANK BOYKIN'S record in Washington has been an exceptional one. He has voted in the House as a free man, unfettered by the chains of subservience to any one group. He has been one of the true independents who have managed, against the temptations of the times, to express his own convictions of what is best for all the people against the selfish desires of the few who attempt to run roughshod over the rights of the many.

On that basis, FRANK BOYKIN stands an ideal choice for nomination to the Senate.

On another basis, that of ability to get things done in spite of the maze of red tape and bureaucracy that is Washington, FRANK BOYKIN has no peer, in the Press Register's opinion.

FRANK BOYKIN knows Alabama and its needs. He knows its traditions, its wishes, and its hopes. He is admirably equipped, by personal experience and by his Washington training, to capably represent every segment of Alabama life in the Senate of the United States.

As its champion of the democratic way of life, as its spokesman in behalf of the rights of all, as its protector of that cherished something known as free enterprise, Alabama ought to send FRANK BOYKIN to the United States Senate.

One Road to Socialism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to call to the attention of my colleagues an editorial from the Huntington Advertiser, published in Huntington, W. Va., and edited by Mr. Clyde A. Wellman.

While the editorial in a general sense is a discussion of an article by the eminent political observer, Mark Sullivan, the editor emphasizes with great force and clarity the major and fundamental political and economic problem that confronts the electorate of this country at the moment.

The issue is clear-cut and warrants open and free discussion to enable us to make a proper decision, and it is imperative that that decision be made before "private ownership can be destroyed without conscious intent to destroy it." This statement by the editor is worthy of particular emphasis:

We already are at that point where the controls are so oppressive that private industry is finding it increasingly difficult to function under them.

Private industry is being told what to do, when to do, and how to do on such a scale that it no longer is allowed to act on its own initiative. It is no longer permitted to exercise its own judgment and grow and develop in a manner that will best serve the national economy.

Your serious study of this statement, I assure you, will be helpful and inspiring.

The editorial follows:

ONE ROAD TO SOCIALISM

Mark Sullivan, veteran and astute observer of the American scene, discussed in one of his columns the other day two approaches to a socialized economy.

The one, he cited, England followed deliberately, and the other he described as that being followed in the United States by some citizens who want to nationalize industry and by others who unwittingly are giving aid to nationalization.

In England, he pointed out, the principle of socializing industry was adopted deliberately and by a single step. The issue was put before the people in a national election. It was the program of the Labor Party. By voting the Labor Party into power and evicting Winston Churchill and his Conservative regime, the people embraced the program and gave the signal for government to begin taking over private industry.

In the United States, he observed, the number of people wanting nationalization of industry is infinitesimally small, adding that "neither of the two great parties wants it—the only parties avowing it are the Socialists and Communists."

But the smallness of the number favoring and working for nationalization doesn't mean there is no danger of private industry being taken over by Government in the United States. It is as Mr. Sullivan remarked, "private ownership can be destroyed without conscious intention to destroy it." What Mr. Sullivan had to say along that line American citizens will do well to read and remember. He observed:

"Congress feels the danger exists, and is on guard against it. One way to save private ownership is to affirm and live up to a fundamental principle, that government never enter into industry in competition with its citizens. There is nothing that government can do in industry that industry itself cannot do."

Another excerpt from Mr. Sullivan's column:

"Watchfulness has been a definite trait of this Congress. It is directed against proposals which are or may grow into Government operation of business. It is directed also against a control of industry so minute and repressive that under it privately owned industry could not function, and a condition would arise which would give color and justification to the idea that industry be carried out by government."

Mr. Sullivan has laid his finger on the danger inherent in the multitudinous controls set up in the Federal Government in recent years. We already are at that point where the controls are so oppressive that private industry is finding it increasingly difficult to function under them.

Private industry is being told what to do, when to do, and how to do on such a scale that it no longer is allowed to act on its own initiative. It is no longer permitted to exercise its own judgment and grow and develop in a manner that will best serve the national economy. Under these conditions, it may find itself in a position where it feels it cannot survive, throw up the sponge and quit the fight. Then it would be necessary for the Government to take over and make up for the deficiency in supplying the things and services the public requires.

In the end, we would have traveled the same road England has traveled, not deliberately as England did, but by tolerating a repressive government-control system to grow up that makes it impossible for private industry to function efficiently and profitably.

Socialists and Communists would welcome such a forced capitulation of private industry. The only way to avert such a catastrophe is for Members of Congress, who in some instances are unconsciously supporting the trend, to rip out the repressive controls that are hamstringing and terrifying business and industry as fast as the emergency created by the prosecution of global war will permit.

Extension of OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Mark Sullivan.

Most certainly we have a very difficult problem to face in deciding what is best to do regarding the continuation of the Office of Price Administration. When President Truman vetoed the conferees' report, so overwhelmingly passed by both Houses of the Congress, he opened the gates for trouble if we do not provide for those merchants who have purchased and contracted for merchandise during this interim without controls. If June 29 prices are restored, I can see nothing but the most chaotic and widespread black markets. In this melee the firms still trying to do business legally will be in an absolutely untenable and pathetic position. If June 29 prices are restored, I can see an ever-broadening disrespect for law and a break-down in enforcement. Rather than have such a catastrophe, I would prefer to see the abolishment of the OPA.

I wish the propaganda and news releases would tell the truth on the present price situation. In most cases prices have not exceeded the former OPA price plus subsidies allowed. Where surveys have been fair and have shown OPA prices, black-market prices, and present prices, I find no case where present prices in a free competitive market have reached the former black-market prices. And the beauty of it is, we are getting many items that were scarce or seldom in the market.

The article follows:

TRUMAN'S VETO OF THE CASE BILL CALLED A FACTOR IN RISING PRICES—MARK SULLIVAN TERMS BALKING OF LABOR LEGISLATION WORSE FOR PRICE STABILITY THAN OPA'S END, OVER WHICH PRESIDENT IS MORE CONCERNED

(By Mark Sullivan)

WASHINGTON, July 16.—Throughout the fight over extending the Office of Price Administration, an immense majority in Congress felt that the OPA should be continued in some form. About the form, these had a wide variety of ideas, ranging from the OPA intact as it had been to an OPA reduced to not much more than regulating rents. Yet many who wanted the OPA limited were willing to make, and did make, concessions toward strengthening it, in the interest of retaining some kind of OPA.

This point of view and the number who held it is suggested by a vote in the House taken during the furor immediately following President Truman's veto of the OPA extension which Congress had passed. By more than four to one—in exact figures 283 to 61—the House voted for a 3-week stop-gap extension of the OPA as it had been, in order to permit opportunity for writing a permanent measure that would be satisfactory to the President.

In the writing of this new measure in the Senate, there was real effort toward accommodation to the President's views, to the end that some kind of OPA should be preserved. There had been the same spirit in the writing of the earlier measure which the President vetoed. Many Members who objected strongly to certain features of the OPA as it had been, and to some features of the administration of it, sacrificed their viewpoints. This attitude of many in Congress continues to the present moment, in spite of what they regard as evidence that the President did not share the spirit of accommodation.

A TWOFOLD STRAIN

The strain between Congress and the Administration has a double cause. Congress overwhelmingly wanted modification of the OPA, but the President vetoed it. Congress overwhelmingly wanted labor legislation, but the President vetoed that, too. Between the two, legislation about the OPA and about labor, there is a relation, and recognition of it brought discouragement to many in Congress who earnestly wished continuation of some form of OPA.

The purpose of the OPA was, and if it continues, is, to restrain price increases. A specific cause of many price increases has been wage raises. Congress saw the administration, over a period of months, follow a policy of encouraging wage raises, in some cases directly bring about wage raises. And Congress then saw the OPA decree price increases to pay the cost of the wage raises.

In an example that came before the eyes of Congress during the very days when the OPA was being debated, the administration granted a wage increase to coal miners, and the OPA decreed an increase of 40½ cents a ton in the price of soft coal, 91 cents in hard coal. Along with all that, Congress saw prolonged strikes preventing full production of goods, which would have been a better preventive of high prices than the OPA could possibly be, and which was the one most promising cure for all our economic troubles.

The labor legislation which Congress passed and the President vetoed would not have prevented demands for wage raises and strikes to get them. But it had one feature which would have assured some stability of labor relations, and by that assured fuller production of goods. This was the provision in the Case bill which would have made contracts between labor unions and employers enforceable during the time of the contract, usually a year.

LABOR FRONT IN STATUS QUO

For the future, whether the OPA is continued or ended or modified, labor relations remain as they were. Excepting one measure dealing with one industry, radio, and in effect with one labor leader, Mr. Petrillo, of the musicians' union, and another measure, the Hobbs bill, dealing with one practice of labor unions—excepting those two extremely limited measures, all the proposals for labor legislation and all the uproar about them has come to nothing.

What Mr. John L. Lewis and his United Mine Workers did, they are free to do again. What the leaders of railroad brotherhoods did, they are free to do again. What the leaders of the Automobile Workers' Union did, they can do again. The frustration of labor legislation, mainly by the President, is a greater threat to restraint of prices than could possibly be offset by any continuation of a strong OPA, which the President insists upon.

The comprehensive labor measure, the Case bill, was vetoed by the President. The emergency legislation which he himself proposed at the time of the railroad strike has come to nothing, and the President shows no such concern about it as about continuation of the OPA. Even his proposal for a congressional committee to study labor relations remains not adopted and likewise is without pressure from him in its behalf.

The Farm Machinery Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the Civilian Production Administration has issued limitation order L356 to the Minneapolis-Moline Power Implement Co. requiring 7½ percent of all monthly production of tractors by this concern to be delivered to UNRRA. This ratio to continue until 500 tractors have been delivered.

The farmers of the Nation are placed in an embarrassing position. First they are called upon to produce in unprecedented quantities vital foods for Europe. This we should do. We must not overlook the fact that a long span of time has passed since any new production of farm machinery has occurred in this country.

While we must be sympathetic to aid all of Europe we cannot at the same time produce food in America without farm machinery including tractors and at the same time ship machinery to Europe. I can readily understand that the sooner Europe can be placed in a position to produce her own food the quicker we can discontinue producing for her.

This produces a vicious cycle. The difficulty is that our side of the cycle is breaking down. Speaking for the farmers of the Northwest, which I feel I can do with considerable authority, they are desperately in need of new farm machinery of every class, including tractors.

It is my personal belief that we must discontinue the shipment of farm machinery to Europe until we have rehabilitated the farm machinery situation at least in part in the food-producing areas of the Nation.

Building Soviet Germany

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, the recent suggestion at Paris by Mr. Molotov that the Potsdam policy of a divided Germany be abandoned in favor of a so-called united Germany gives fresh meaning to the following discussion as to the kind of united Germany Russia seeks to build. The article is from the weekly Human Events and was written by Wolfgang von Eckardt. Mr. von Eckardt, son of a distinguished German scholar, came to the United States in 1936 as a refugee from nazism, fought in the United States Army during the war, and was assigned to intelligence work in Germany:

BUILDING SOVIET GERMANY
(By Wolfgang von Eckardt)

I

Speaking to the text that it is time to "discard cant and humbug," Winston Churchill, on June 5, told the House of Commons that "every effort is being made to communize every part of the Russian zone in Germany." On June 10 the New York Times charged editorially that, in violation of the Potsdam agreement, "Russia * * * is now preventing economic unification by organizing her occupation zone as a more or less Sovietized unit integrated with her own economy." Indeed, the development of Soviet Germany demands attention.

The Red army entered Germany to the tune of Ilya Ehrenburg's hymns of hate. There was widespread looting and raping; wholesale removal of machinery and even railroads; terror and lawlessness. The hopes which many German anti-Nazis had pinned on Russian realism, under the influence of the propaganda of the Free Germany Committee in Moscow, were as shattered as were the initial expectations of the German Communists.

Yet, while Red army discipline seemed to have broken down completely, Soviet military government was quick to initiate intensive political and cultural reconstruction. When Americans came to Berlin, last July, they were surprised to find that cafes, nightclubs, and cabarets were open and that, 2 months after surrender, a number of theaters and good concerts entertained the masses. In the western zones there was then still deadly, gloomy silence. While we drove home the doctrine of collective guilt, the entire Russian zone was plastered with almost conciliatory propaganda—the Hitlers come and go, but the German people and the German State remain.

A new unified trade union, with compulsory membership, was soon organized by the Russians on a zone-wide basis, while a like development in the western zones was prevented, on the argument of Sidney Hillman and the World Federation of Trade Unions, that German labor leaders could not be trusted. Under the Russians the disillusioned young people of Germany are cared for and guided into a new free German-youth movement. We treated Nazis and anti-Nazis alike, but the Russians elevated the victims of fascism to a privileged class. The sweeping land reform and other measures were promoted by enormous propaganda campaigns and organized demonstrations in their favor. Communists were, of course, put in key positions in the zonal administration and other official occupations, though the appearance of proportionate representation of all parties was for a time maintained.

II

The German Communist Party reciprocated by making a temporary peace with free enterprise and private ownership. Its leader, Wilhelm Pieck, who, like most other leading German Communists returned from exile in Moscow with the Red army, declared on June 6, 1945: "We are of the opinion that it would be wrong to force the Soviet system on Germany, as this does not correspond with the present possibilities of German development."

Equally interesting is the fact that Communist propaganda in all of Germany has become increasingly nationalistic. While other parties may not even imply any criticism of allied policy, the Communists announce: "We fight for Germany's unity." They have come out strongly for retention of the Ruhr and Rhineland. Walter Ulbricht, Communist deputy leader, declared in the presence of Russian officers: "The Ruhr belongs to Germany and will and must remain German."

Communist propaganda in Germany is all but indistinguishable from that of Dr. Goebbels. The call is always for new banners, for new drummers to awaken the people, and for new marchers. Communist leaders are acclaimed with an artificial frenzied enthusiasm reminiscent of Nazi fuehrer worship. On Wilhelm Pieck's birthday celebration, which culminated in a huge mass meeting, the Berlin radio commented: "How deeply moving are the warm waves of adoration which rise up to him (Pieck) from our ranks."

Communists and fellow travelers accuse western occupation authorities of insufficient de-Nazification. But Nazi officials who were ousted by American military government now hold prominent positions in the Russian zone. Former Nazis and members of the Hitler Youth, who are openly urged to join the Communists, need to make only slight mental adjustments. With its stress on totalitarian nationalism, the international character of communism has been pushed into the background and a German National Bolshevism emerges. It appeals strongly to adherents of the spiritually almost identical national socialism.

A secret, inner party Communist directive, issued in May 1945, as the party was first reorganized after Russian occupation, reads in part:

"We can consider as on our side * * * part of the middle classes and the youth who are concerned about the further national existence of German * * * and are afraid to be swallowed up by American imperialism * * *. Our own organizational weakness within Germany and toward the imperialist occupation powers does not permit us under any circumstances to go ahead independently for the time being. The 'Communist' Party * * * must dissolve in the anti-Fascist movement * * *. Comrades, do not be afraid to approach even the sterile leadership of Social Democracy. Only if we force * * * a united front from above will we be able to drive them out of the field."

Accordingly, the political parties and various organizations were molded into a totalitarian pattern as soon as they had gained a foothold. Once independent leaders, like Andreas Hermes of the Christian Democratic Union, were ousted, the "bourgeois" parties all but lost their identity within the Communist-dominated "anti-Fascist" front. In May, 1945, the Social-Democrats had offered "organizational unity of the German working class" to the Communists. The offer was then refused. A year later the Communists were ready on their own terms.

The fusion, enforced by the Russian-appointed executive committee of the two parties, was accomplished by May Day of this year, as planned. Socialist resistance was overcome by a combination of methods: the famous caviar-and-vodka treatment; suppression of all adverse public utterances; outright terror, such as the "disappearance" of prominent Socialists in the reactivated concentration camps of Sachsenhausen and Buchenwald. The courageous rebellion of Socialist rank and file in Berlin who, on March 31, voted 7 to 1 against the Communist-indorsed merger, proved the anti-totalitarian sentiments of the majority.

Nevertheless, the Allies sanctioned the new Socialist Unity Party, which is now actually the Communist Party, on a mass basis, with the same nationalist propaganda. It alines, dominates or absorbs all other organizations, particularly trade and farmers' unions and "Free German Youth." In 1933 the Nazis called the identical method Gleichschaltung. "Russia," says the New York Times lead editorial of June 10, "is reaching out for control of the rest of Germany through a Communist-dominated 'Unity Party.'"

IV

This Soviet policy is bound to have strong effect on the western occupation zones. As Mr. Churchill says, to divide Germany and write off the eastern part will not lessen the danger. Western Germany would have to embrace the eastern ideology in order to reunite.

Russian propaganda and exploitation of American blunders in the west encourage such German "realism." Many Germans in the British and American zones already regard the Soviet zone as better off, for no food-ration statistics are published there. Even more important is the fact that the east begins to offer employment, as the Russians revive German industry.

The Socialist Unity Party is designed to split social democracy in the west and may still succeed in doing so. This outcome will be the more probable if fellow travelers in American Military Government continue to plant Trojan horses, such as the Communist-influenced DANA, monopolistic news agency in the American zone. National bolshevism and totalitarian "unity" hold a strong appeal to thousands of denazified Nazis and to the increasing number who are disillusioned with western democracy as it presents itself in Germany today. Moreover, the Russians make the best of arguments that they did not bomb German cities into rubbish heaps and that the capitalistic west wants to deindustrialize Germany to eliminate its competition, while Russia seeks to develop German production.

Persistent rumors now make the rounds in Berlin to the effect that the Russians would even approve the return of the wholly German territory annexed by Poland. "Poland," it is stated, "is unable to absorb the German east * * * [and is] creating a desert between the future great powers, Germany and Russia." Russia might well reward a Soviet Germany with an invitation to participate in another partition of Poland.

Time is short if, as Winston Churchill says, "we must strive * * * to redeem and reincorporate the German * * * people in a world system of free and civilized democracy."

Food Plank for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALT HORAN

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am pleased to include a copy of an essay written by Miss Marilyn Ann Tinkey, a student in the Manson High School, of Manson, Wash.

This was a winning essay in the national contest conducted by Pillsbury's Institute of Flour Milling History, and is entitled "Food Plank for Peace."

At this time when we are having shortages, when the need for production is apparent everywhere, Miss Tinkey's thoughtful observations are certainly worthy of our serious consideration.

FOOD PLANK FOR PEACE

Millions of the world's people are poorly nourished or actually starving! Peace cannot be permanent if this situation continues. Nations weakened physically, mentally and morally by hunger are discontented and ready to follow any potential dictator who promises change. Poverty and the lack of food that goes with it breeds criminals and children capable of becoming the dictators of the future.

Feeding the world is not a one-country job. All nations must cooperate in sharing and distributing their food resources. Rationing should be continued as long as necessary and, certainly, prices should be controlled so that rich and poor alike may eat.

As a first step in fair distribution of food, a survey must be made to determine where need is the greatest and what surpluses can most quickly be obtained to fill that need. The Americas and other countries least affected by the war can be expected to supply the greater part of the food needed now. War-ruined countries must also be supplied with feed for cattle, seed and machinery for their farms, and livestock so that they may begin to be self-supporting again.

In addition to emergency measures taken by the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, we need a long-term food plan. As the population of our earth increases, we will have to grow more food and distribute it better or fight over what we do have.

One possible way to share and extend knowledge along these lines is by a world-wide exchange of educators, students, scientists, engineers, and agricultural and nutrition experts. Such an exchange, on a larger scale than ever attempted, will encourage research. Study may bring out better ways to grow and use foods as well as methods by which waste lands can be made productive. If the various countries will follow up their educational programs with practical projects, we should produce more and better food. Irrigation and flood control may make home building possible in places once uninhabitable. New food industries will provide work for men and women, enabling them to enjoy better standards of living.

Transportation of perishable foods to non-agricultural regions has been slow and expensive. We have had oversupplies of food in some places, near starvation in others. Many things learned recently in war can be useful in peace. We have discovered that a great variety of foods can be dehydrated, stored in small space, kept indefinitely. It should be possible to put dried foods of all kinds on markets everywhere at reasonable prices. Air lines that brought death can improve life by transporting fresh meats, fruits, and vegetables great distances in a few hours. People, especially in hot climates, may have better health because of things we have learned about food refrigeration.

If the United Nations will work as hard to put over a food plank for peace as they did to win the war, their efforts should result in a better diet for the whole world.

Future of the New Italian Republic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 17 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on July 16 last at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., the establishment of the Republic of Italy was celebrated under the auspices of the Committee for a Just Peace with Italy, Inc. On that occasion I delivered a brief address which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, distinguished guests, and friends of the Italian Republic, I should like to add but a few words to the splendid tributes and inspiring thoughts which have already been voiced in this gathering and which will be given later tonight.

It is more than fitting that the eyes of all those who are gathered here tonight are turned to the future of the newly born Italian Republic. As a member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I personally, as well as you, have every faith that the Italy of the future will be as inspiring a model to the world as has been the Italy of the past. Moreover, we have the faith that the Allied powers will cooperate and will restore the Italian people to their rightful respected place in the family of nations.

ITALY AND THE FUTURE

We are well acquainted with all the difficulties in the way of these "consummations devoutly to be wished." It would ill behoove any one of us, however, to sell Italy short, to underestimate the miraculous recuperative powers of this people which has given so much to the world and will yet give so much more.

We know that any foreign observer looking upon the troubled American scene of July 4, 1776, would well have doubted the chances of our infant Republic surviving. Since then we have blazed a way to the world through our system of checks and balances, thanks in large part to the contributions made to our land by the sons and daughters and grandsons and granddaughters of Italian soil. We owe much of our thinking, too, to the inspirational creeds of the great Italians, Mazzini and Garibaldi, to name but two, which provided stimulation for much democratic thinking throughout all the world.

ITALY AND AMERICA

It is no mere platitude to say that the America that we know today would lack much in its music, its art, its literature, its industry, its science, and government, if we did not have the advantage of the contributions made to us by the descendants of Italy. It is not merely to praise what these Americans of Italian descent have done for us in the past; all that they have meant to America is but a symbol and a sure sign of all that they will mean to the America of tomorrow.

ITALY'S STATUS IN WORLD AFFAIRS

Tonight all those of Italian blood and ancestry, and all other friends of the Italian Republic, are watching closely the status of Italy in world affairs. We have been watching the developments in Paris, and we will be looking forward to the peace conference to open later this month. We have been watching the developments over Trieste and over Italy's colonies.

We know the many obstacles in the path of true cooperation between the Big Four over Italian questions and other questions. We want such cooperation, but we don't want it at the price of sacrifice of the principles of the Atlantic Charter and the four freedoms. We don't want to be unduly critical of the results so far over Allied negotiations of Italy, but at the same time we would be unrealistic and not frank if we failed to admit our serious concern over the Allies' handling of Italy's welfare.

We state these points:

(1) That the God-fearing Christian Italian people must not be sacrified at the altar of any pagan foreign "ism."

(2) That we will not tolerate a peace of revenge which will bleed Italy and attempt to keep her cowed and submissive instead of rising to her fullest dignity in the world community.

(3) That prolonged and unnecessary foreign interference of any sort in the internal affairs of the Italian Nation must be opposed.

(4) That the historical needs and territorial rights of the Italian people must be respected

It will be our aim to bring into specific reality these general points. That, we hope, will be the mission of America in international relations.

OUR MISSION AND ITALY

I am reminded of the words of the celebrated Italian patriot, Giuseppe Mazzini:

"Life is a mission. Every other definition of life is false and leads all who accept it astray. Religion, science, philosophy, though still at variance on many points, all agree on this—that every existence is an aim."

Yes, every existence is indeed an aim—the existence of the humblest American and of the humblest Italian, the existence of the American Nation and the Italian Nation. Each of us here tonight has a mission and each of the citizens of Italy has a mission to be worthy of the inspiring Italian past and to be adequate to the challenging Italian future.

The Secretary of War Is for Veterans' Housing—But and But and But!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. ROWAN
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. ROWAN. Mr. Speaker, everyone is for housing for the veterans but the veterans are not getting any housing. The Secretary of War, Hon. Robert P. Patterson, is evidently in that category and has refused the plea of numbers of veterans of World War II to provide approximately 300 living units for men who fought and sacrificed much in the war which was terminated almost a year ago.

The Gardiner General Hospital, located on the lake front in Chicago, is being abandoned by the War Department and veterans' organizations, supplemented by many civic groups, made numerous appeals for the reconversion of Gardiner General Hospital into a housing unit for veterans. An appeal which I personally made to Secretary of War Patterson brought the following reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 7, 1946.

Hon. WILLIAM A. ROWAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROWAN: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 25, 1946, in which you enclosed a letter from Mr. Lyle Gum, chairman, Hyde Park Chapter, American Veterans Committee, 1303 East Fifty-third Street, Chicago 15, Ill., and a telegram from Mr. Ferd Kramer, president of Metropolitan Housing Council, 69 West Washington Street, Chicago, in regard to plans for the reconversion of Gardiner General Hospital, Chicago, for veterans' housing.

We in the War Department are well aware of the urgent need for additional housing in Chicago and have given the matter a most careful study. After due consideration, however, we have been compelled to conclude that in the interests of efficiency and economy the Army must retain the premises for use as Army and area headquarters.

There appears to be no alternative unless it is to move the headquarters to another city. Such a change would not be consistent with effective operations.

The present site, the Civic Opera Building, is leased property and urgently needed by civilian concerns. To lease other property, even if it were available, would prove costly and inconsistent with the policy of retrenchment which the War Department is following.

The War Department has made an exhaustive survey of all Government-held facilities in the entire Chicago area, including the Chicago Army Service Forces Depot and Fort Sheridan. The former is not deemed a practicable location and would require a 4-month period to vacate at a cost of approximately $1,200,000. It is estimated that the move would require 3,500 carloads.

The use of Fort Sheridan would necessitate relocation of the Army Personnel Center, Reception Center, and Separation Center to a new site which would have to be leased or one inconveniently remote from the population area of Chicago, which would incur the expenditure of additional funds for construction and operation of a separate installation. Such facilities must be maintained in the Chicago area so long as there is a program of recruitment and discharge. Moreover, the cost of conversion of existing facilities at Fort Sheridan to accommodate the combined headquarters would amount to $862,000.

Under the circumstances and with great reluctance, I must, therefore, advise you of the decision of the War Department to retain the premises occupied by Gardiner General Hospital for use as the Army and area headquarters.

Sincerely yours,
ROBERT P. PATTERSON,
Secretary of War.

Prior to World War II the Chicago Beach Hotel, now the Gardiner General Hospital, located on the lake front at Fifty-first Street on the south side of Chicago, was an apartment hotel with approximately 300 living units. Most of these units were equipped with kitchenettes and facilities for light housekeeping. When word was received that the Army planned to abandon the hospital it was the consensus of thousands of individuals and scores of groups and organizations that these were ideal facilities for housing veterans with a minimum of expense and likewise a minimum of delay. The fact that the kitchenette apartments were numerous in this hotel appeared to be a very effective argument for immediate reconversion. National Housing Expediter Wilson W. Wyatt joined in the plea but all to no avail.

Gardiner General Hospital is within a short distance of the University of Chicago, where there are hundreds of GI students, large numbers of them married men without family living facilities. Secretary Patterson, however, insists that the Sixth Service Command should be housed in this very delightful lake front hotel. In a word, the men who fought and sacrificed in World War II, having finished their task, were denied these facilities because of the insistence that the peacetime army should be given the priority.

In my opinion, and in the opinion of hundreds of others with whom I have discussed the matter, veterans of World War II should have preferential rights over everyone, including the peacetime army.

The Sixth Service Command has been housed in the Civic Opera Building in Chicago, but the Secretary of War contends that this space is urgently needed for civilian concerns. I submit there is no more urgent need in the country today than that of housing for the men who fought and won World War II. Certainly if the Sixth Service Command must remain in Chicago there are other offices than those that are so sorely needed by the ex-servicemen and their families. Legislation is passed, and then the servicemen are told that more legislation is necessary before they can have adequate housing. The proposal of the ex-servicemen for the reconversion of the Gardiner General Hospital into living quarters for veterans offered a plan for comparatively inexpensive and expeditious handling of the need for this housing, and naturally they expected that the War Department would cooperate.

What is wanted now is the elimination of "buts" from all of the oratorical pledges of assistance for veterans' housing, and certainly the War Department, in my humble opinion, should take the lead rather than join in the chorus "We are for veterans' housing, but and but and but." Why not adopt a slogan, "We are for Veterans' Housing, Now, Period."

Article by Mr. J. Peter Healey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALT HORAN
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am pleased to include an article by an attorney from the State of Washington, Mr. J. Peter Healey.

Mr. Healey raises the point of a proper and balanced consideration of the whole principle of States' rights. Certainly no chain is stronger than its weakest link. Our Nation will never be any stronger than the sum total of the parts composing it.

Our hopes for and our progress in achieving a sound world economy and society must ever be dependent upon sound geographical units and divisions of society the world around.

In the end, of course, we can merely assist from the outside. We cannot by domination improve anyone.

Mr. Healey's article follows:

The first question in any discussion of government is this: Shall the people serve the government? Or shall the government serve the people?

For 157 years after the Declaration of Independence, America followed the high principle, that the people are supreme, and government must serve them. Harken.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Again, in 1787, the Constitution:

"We, the people of the United States, * * * do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Both the theory and the origin came from the people, and are for the benefit of the people.

Stalin, Mussolini, Hitler, and Hirohito, each had the opposite notion, to wit: That the state is supreme, and that the people must be subservient to it. World War II resolved that issue against them; now, the whole world can unite in the theory made positive by republics following the lead of the United States of America. This country is a nation, ordained and established by 13 sovereign States, and these States, and those added to the Union, have never surrendered nor diluted their sovereignty, except by the terms of the Constitution and its amendments.

By the terms of the Constitution, the State surrendered certain rights and powers to the Federal Government, concerning foreign affairs, finance, postal service, and necessary revenue. And in 1791 the first 10 amendments were adopted—by the last one of which it was forever made plain, that the powers not delegated to th United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Hence, the Federal Government is one of ceded and limited powers; having no power nor authority, except such is derived from the express words, and the necessary implications definitely traceable to those words, of the Constitution. Now 48 Sovereign States, under one limited central authority.

For 142 years following 1791, that concept of the fundamental law of this country was definitely followed—and following it, the Nation grew strong in every way, to unquestioned leadership among the nations of the whole world.

After reviewing that record of progress, why should the United States depart from that concept of the Constitution? I challenge the existence of any logical or satisfactory answer.

Can any one doubt that we have, for over a decade, departed from the plain, unambiguous interpretation of the Tenth Amendment? Let us examine:

Is not every State in the Union, almost fully subservient to the Federal Government? In food to eat, in clothes to wear, in buying, in selling, in employment of labor, or in being employed; what can one do that is not ruled or regulated by the Federal administration? Just what powers are now reserved to the States, or to the people? And is not the administration seeking further control over the private affairs of the people, in education, in health, in peacetime military service, in voting, and in the squandering of funds raised through taxation?

Has the Constitution been amended in that respect? It has not. Has any State abdicated its sovereignty? It has not. How can the plain words of that fundamental compact between the States and the Nation mean one thing for 142 years, and thereafter, in the self-same words, mean just the opposite? How can those words mean States' rights, and freedom of action in the people, for nearly a century and a half, and then distorted into centralized Federal control, restriction, and limitation of both such rights and such freedom? Is not the change a manifest and tyrannical usurpation of power by Federal officials?

Did you realize such change had taken place? Who could authorize such perversion? And without any amendment of the Constitution? Are you now in favor of a dictatorship by bureaucrats? Or do you favor a republic, where officers carry out the will of the people, under law? Do you think the American people are now so weak that they must be saved from themselves, by officials who have lost confidence in the ability of their constituents to govern themselves? Do you want the people to be supreme; or shall they be vassals of the Government? Are you a lover of America? Or a foreign ideologist?

In the November 1946 elections, are you going to sanction this phoney administration, with an alleged mandate to continue depriving you of your constitutional rights? Or do you desire a change of administration? Speak up!

The Silver-Tongued Orator of the Platte

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it has been given to me, as to few individuals now sitting in this House, to span the sweep of American political history across more than half a century in my own active political life. Some of the giants of my early political life are now half forgotten; and names which evoke vivid memories to me are to many of you, my younger colleagues, merely names.

Therefore, when there was recently brought to my attention a newspaper column written by my old friend, the Honorable Josephus Daniels, for the newspaper which he has published at Raleigh, N. C., and maintained as a militant organ of democracy, for half a century, strong memories were evoked. This column from the Raleigh News and Observer was published on July 9, the fiftieth anniversary of the 1896 National Democratic Convention at Chicago which first nominated William Jennings Bryan, the "silver-tongued orator of the Platte," and reviews the history of that epoch-making convention.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS SERVED THE PEOPLE

We were all young men then—Josephus Daniels, William Jennings Bryan, and I. After Bryan's nomination my friend Daniels became secretary of the National Democratic Committee, and I recall that I was one of his many assistants, assigned to look after publicity activities among Americans of foreign birth or parentage. Having been so closely associated with him, and having learned at close range of his great ability and his capacity for work in the interest of the people, I was highly gratified when his services to the party were recognized by his appointment by President Wilson as Secretary of the Navy. It was on Josephus Daniels' recommendation that a young man named Franklin Delano Roosevelt was made an Assistant Secretary of the Navy by President Wilson; years later President Franklin Delano Roosevelt honored Josephus Daniels by making him Ambassador to Mexico, where he served with honor and distinction, and Jonathan Daniels, a son, became a White House secretary.

WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN BLAZED THE TRAIL

Too few of the followers of the Democratic Party now realize the debt of democracy to William Jennings Bryan. With his magnetic personality and his magnificent voice he revitalized our party and blazed the trail of progressive action followed by Wilson and Roosevelt.

I always held William Jennings Bryan in the highest esteem as an outstanding and progressive Democrat. At his first nomination I became attached to him, and I cooperated with and supported him in each of his campaigns. I frequently traveled with him, and he is entitled to much credit for having molded my own progressive outlook and actions.

It so happened that I accompanied Mr. Bryan to the convention hall in an old Chicago streetcar. As the car rattled and clanged its way along, I asked him whether, in his opinion, Bland or Du-Bois would be the nominee.

Bryan turned to me and said, "Judge, if I am given the opportunity to speak, I will be the nominee."

He urged me to join forces with him and stand by him.

What took place at the convention within a few hours thereafter, when he gained the platform, is colorfully described in Mr. Josephus Daniels' article. In the light of my own close personal acquaintance with all the principal characters you will understand why it gives me special pleasure to insert the article at this point in the RECORD.

[From the "Fifty Years Ago" column of the Raleigh (N. C.) News and Observer, Josephus Daniels, publisher, for Wednesday, July 10, 1946]

On July 9, 1896, at the Democratic National Convention, a crowded, sweltering multitude packed in a barnlike hall had been trying to hear what leaders were saying. But all in vain. There were no loud-speakers or microphones then. A distinguished Chicago doctor, later director of the Army Medical Reserves in World War I, Dr. Franklin Martin, said afterward:

"My wife and I, despairing of hearing, were ready to leave when a flutelike voice, clear and winning, rose above the confusion, and said: 'I think if you will be quiet I can make myself be heard in the remotest gallery.' We resumed our seats charmed by the winning voice, hoping we could hear. It was William Jennings Bryan. We heard every word he said and remarked that one voice alone could be heard against the noise. And that voice full of melody as he presented his cause."

Yesterday was the fiftieth anniversary of that near-miracle when the 35-year-old Nebraskan by a speech that had the tone and timber of Demosthenes turned a dreary convention into a cheering gathering of men who had been lifted out of themselves more by the rare and beautiful voice of the handsome young Lochinvar out of the West who made himself the master of that convention and the leader of his party for four quadrennials. Bryan was the master spirit of the convention at Baltimore in 1912 as he was of the three conventions which nominated him for the Presidency.

Fifty years have passed since these three declarations caught the ear and won the heart of millions of Americans who went to the polls and would have put the orator in the White House but for the purchase of the Presidency by the money bags:

"1. You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns; you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.

"2. You come to us and tell us that the great cities are in favor of the gold standard; we reply that the great cities rest upon our broad and fertile prairies. Burn down your cities and leave our farms, and your cities will spring up again, as if by magic; but destroy the farms, and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in the country.

"3. We are fighting in defense of our homes, our families, and posterity. We have petitioned, and our petitions have been scorned; we have entreated, and our entreaties have been disregarded; we have begged, and they have mocked when our calamity came. We beg no longer; we entreat no more; we defy them."

It is impossible in this far-off day, when world problems face us, to comprehend the significance of those typical remarks of a speech that stirred the country to its depths.

As the Raleigh district elected the first Bryan delegate to the convention that nominated him (1896) in the person of Capt. M. W. Page, of Wake County, and as the North Carolina delegation was the first to decide to vote for him as the candidate, the following, from Editor in Politics, by Josephus Daniels, gives the story from a North Carolina point of view of what happened in the Democratic convention in Chicago, July 9, 1896:

"As soon as we had registered at the hotel, I went over to Bryan's little hotel to call on him and made an engagement for a part of our delegation to see him that night. About a dozen of the members went with me, headed by Col. A. M. Waddell and Theodore Kluttz. Bryan captivated them. In the course of the conversation, Colonel Waddell, after conferring with the other delegates in that group, told Bryan that the majority of the North Carolina delegates would support him for nomination and would hold a meeting next day and so declare. Bryan asked them not to do it, saying that, if they favored him, he believed they could do more to promote his nomination by not bringing him out as a candidate. It would be best, he thought, to let the older candidates measure their strength and for us to be ready to come to him at the time when it would be more valuable than to bring him out early as a candidate. His seat at the convention was contested. In fact, the Democratic National Committee had seated the J. Sterling Morton gold delegation from Nebraska, and Bryan had to make the fight for a seat in the convention. He thought it might militate against his chances if he were contesting for a seat and the nomination at the same time. The other delegates thought Bryan's suggestion was wise.

"On the night we arrived in Chicago I met Harry L. West, the prize correspondent of the Washington Post and afterward Commissioner of the District of Columbia. In his telegram from Chicago next day he predicted, as did most of the correspondents, that Bland would be nominated, but said: 'Josephus Daniels, of North Carolina, the newly elected national committeeman, predicts that it will be Bryan. He is the only man here who thinks so.'

"Of course the great fight, except for the nomination, was in the committee on platform. The fight of the silver men was led by Senator James K. Jones, of Arkansas. He belonged to the Kimbrough Jones family, early settlers in Wake County, N. C., and his father had been one of the founders of Wake Forest College.

"It had been whispered that Senator Jones had asked Bryan to close the debate on the platform. His fame as an orator had gone before him. All the silver men were saying: "Wait until you hear Bryan," and there was a buzz of expectancy. If he had not possessed eloquence and if he had lacked the marrow of sincerity, the fact that the man on the farthest seat in the great auditorium could hear his every word would have given him a power incomparably greater than any other speaker. He did not seem to raise his voice at all. He seemed to be speaking with less effort than anyone who had preceded him, and that was always true of him. His voice was made for great gatherings. As he stood there on the platform, waiting for the enthusiasm to spend itself so that he could be heard, he was every inch an Apollo, young, lithe, with flashing eyes and a great jaw that gave him power which seemed not quite in keeping with his sweetness. He was good to look upon. Except Russell, the others who had spoken were of the older statesmen. Bryan was the new prophet of the West as Russell was of the East.

"Writers of that day and later historians have said that an unknown man captured the convention by one speech. Not so. Bryan did not suddenly reach that pinnacle. Behind that memorable hour was a brilliant record of achievement in the Halls of Congress and on the hustings.

"Bryan had not been speaking 5 minutes before he held the convention rapt. I had never dreamed that a mortal man could so grip and fill with enthusiasm thousands of men. He used no statistics in his speech. He got off the beaten path. Every few minutes he had to stop to give the people a chance to applaud. Sometimes the whole convention, or it seemed like the whole body of people, were standing shouting as if lifted above themselves. I say the whole convention. I must except the gold men.

"Up to the minute Bryan touched him and gave him an enthusiasm that I never dreamed possible, Charles F. Warren, of Washington, spectacled and dignified, had sat as if he were in a court. Suddenly he was as thrilled as the most enthusiastic youngster. Hardly had Bryan finished before Warren grabbed the North Carolina banner and, followed by the entire delegation and thousands of other shouting, yelling people paraded over the hall until there wasn't a dry thread upon him. I there and then made up my mind that no man is proof against eloquence. What was true of Warren was true of the other delegates. My old friend, Governor Jarvis, who had been aloof because youngsters of the delegation had refused to vote for Bland, caught the contagion and shouted with the boys. I do not know how long the parading and band playing and enthusiasm lasted. I have been in a number of national conventions and have heard the bands play and seen people march by rote, but nothing of that kind occurred in Chicago on that day when Bryan spoke. It was spontaneous. Attempts to shorten or quell it were as impossible as the attempt of Canute to drive back the waves of the ocean. The fountains in the hearts of men were stirred. They believed that Bryan was a young David with his sling, who had come to slay the giants that oppressed the people and they felt that a new day had come and, with it, a new leader. Clean of limb, clean of heart, and clean of mind, he was a vital figure. It was hard for me to write a telegram that night because, like the others, I had been swept away on the tide of hero worship. That night I telegraphed to the News and Observer:

"'North Carolina was in it today. The delegation has all along favored Bryan for President. He has not been a candidate and it was urged by some that the delegates had made a mistake in choosing him but today's developments more than justify the wisdom of selecting the eloquent Nebraskan. He closed the debate for the silver forces on the platform, replying to Hill and Russell, the gold leaders. It was a crucial position. It is putting it mildly to say that Bryan captured the convention. They simply went wild and when he had finished the delegates bore him on their shoulders down the hall amid such enthusiasm as was never witnessed before. He took a seat with the North Carolina delegation when the enthusiasm had somewhat subsided and soon it broke out afresh. Capt. R. P. Peebles, J. H. Currie, Charles F. Warren, J. W. Grainger, Tom Emory, W. C. Hammer, B. R. Lacy, W. C. Dowd, and others lifted the Nebraskan on their shoulders amid deafening applause and it was moments before he could gain terra firma.'

"When Bryan was placed in nomination it was seconded by Theodore F. Kluttz, of North Carolina, long a Member of Congress from the Salisbury district.

"John W. Jenkins, special correspondent of the News and Observer, wired:

"'Immediately after the nomination of Bryan, a number of North Carolina delegates called on the future President in his modest apartment. Immense crowds were thronging the rooms as North Carolinians came into the room headed by National Committeeman Daniels. Mr. Bryan grasped him by the hand and said: "Josephus, next to Nebraska, I owe more to the North Carolinians than to any other delegates. I owe them more than any other people."'"

1946 Joins July the Fourth, 1776

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. JASPER BELL
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Harry B. Hawes before the Filipino executive council on July 4, 1946:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, today, throughout the United States bands are playing, firecrackers are exploding, patriotic speeches are made, and everywhere throughout the Nation the Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776, is praised, extolled, and celebrated unitedly by 130,000,000 people.

July 4, 1946, doubles the luster of that day because the new Nation is born in the very heart of the Orient. A people trained in democracy and Christianity take their first step as an independent republic.

For me it is a day of great happiness, one of elation. It marks the time of a promise fulfilled. But it means sadness because doctors will not permit me to be present when the new flag is raised over Manila.

The exact day on which the Islands would become independent was left open, although the length of time for preparation for the event was very seriously debated, 30 years, 20 years, 15 years, and finally 10 years was agreed upon.

It was my great privilege, in a sentimental way, to suggest the Fourth of July. To my surprise, the idea met with the universal approval of those working on the first Independence Act. Speaker Roxas and Senator Osmeña representing the Filipino people at that time in Washington were enthusiastic; so the decision to use the Fourth of July is both American and Filipino in its origin.

In 1931 when I visited the Islands everywhere there were parades and banners carrying expressions of opinion. The popular slogan was Patrick Henry's famous "Give me liberty or give me death." At one point we stopped to watch a company of boys, some dressed in blue and some in red. They commenced what appeared to be a drill. First one group would take a position, followed by another group with another position. It took some time and I inquired: "What are the boys doing?" I was informed by Mr. Roxas: "They are spelling on the ground the word 'independence'."

The early American school teachers had done their work well. These boys knew what liberty meant, self-determination, a government by the people carried out by the ballot registering the decision of the voters.

During this visit 250,000 Filipinos marched in orderly parade before a reviewing stand on a hot day in Manila. They displayed their capacity as well as their desire for democratic government.

Some American friends told me afterwards that they had doubted the sincerity of the demand for independence. They argued that it was advocated because of local politics, and that it did not really represent the sincere opinion of the people but changed their minds when the parade passed with the old soldiers of Aguinaldo, representatives of the Sultan of Sulu and every portion of the land marching patiently in line for independence. They then knew the request for freedom was universal, overwhelming and decisive.

Responding, the American Congress by a two-thirds vote in both Houses, granted the appeal and named the Fourth of July as the day of fulfillment.

Today, in the press and on the radio, we hear of distress throughout the world, of conflicting political ambitions in various lands, of graft, of murder, of shortage of food, of sadness in every form. The remedy proposed in most of these sections of the earth is organized democracy. They know if the people can speak in an orderly way, can celebrate a true Fourth of July there will be an end of tyranny and disaster.

In advocating the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson covered the whole matter in one statement: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with inherent and inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." This philosophy is covered in the 10 articles of our Bill of Rights.

This Bill of Rights is now your bill of rights. It belong to you. It is for you to protect and defend.

Problems will arise difficult to solve and hard to understand. This will require patience and self-restraint during the first years.

When we look back into the early history of America we find relatively few names that stand out conspicuously and it will be so with your nation. Three men, however, now fill the first pages—Quezon, Osmeña, Roxas. Hundreds of able Filipinos supported them and a later, more detailed history will record the names of these patriots.

Your President, Manuel Roxas, who spent much time and traveled extensively in this country to bring about this 4th of July, carried with him the fundamental principles of Jefferson. He knows the effect of conflicting ambitions, and in some cases, the destruction wrought by political demagogues.

Absolute perfection in any one thing or any one man or group of men is not attainable. The perfect man, the perfect horse, the perfect dog, does not exist.

Here tonight are assembled Filipinos, men and women who seek the best for their country, who will strive to keep their country protected by government machinery which can bring change, progress, and rehabilitate when necessary by orderly legal process.

Your new President, Manual Roxas, has courage. He has knowledge, experience, and patriotism. He will give you and yours the best of his rare abilities. He will guide your nation with the skill of our early American leaders who started 170 years ago on the 4th of July.

Your gallantry, your courage, your patriotism, your loyalty during the war has fixed a place in the heart of America that has never been excelled. Our President, our Senate, our Congress, our press, are united in their desire that you should have the comfort and good things that come with the birth and life of a new democracy.

Thanks for your welcome invitation to speak. In the language of an old Irish friend, "It put a tear in my eye." This is a feeble expression of appreciation which could be improved by your own word "Mamuhay."

The Face of British Imperialism in Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH DE LACY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. DE LACY. Mr. Speaker, nothing is more plain than that the world is being redivided. To the consternation of those wanting war against the Soviet Union, that country has established governments friendly to her on most of her boundaries. The United States has taken Japan and parts of her empire under its control, and is seeking military and economic and political domination over China. Britain, with minor help from the Dutch, is taking over South Asia, retains control of most of Africa, and is aggressively turning the Mediterranean into a British lake.

The present painful and shocking experiences of the freedom-loving Jews in Palestine are the latest move of British imperialism to safeguard its existing system of exploiting the oil and other resources of the Middle East.

Britain robbed Greece of its right to form a united peoples' government. She joined with the United States in blocking the latest move to oust Franco's Fascist government. With American support she took over the outlying parts of the old Italian empire and dominates Italy herself. With American support she blocked the cession of Trieste to Yugoslavia, apparently on the theory that to give Yugoslavia that traditionally Slavic city, which only in modern times was forcefully colonized first by Austrians, and under Mussolini by Italians, would be to permit a country friendly to Russia to have a large, modern port on the Adriatic.

And in March, Britain recognized Trans-Jordan as a separate and independent state, splitting up the Palestine area, laying the basis for promoting further division, and making a mockery of the paper claims of independence granted, by retaining all the basic economic rights and unrestricted military privileges and rights.

This is the background against which to judge the present repressive military and police operations against militant Jewish peoples organizations in Palestine.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the Members, a moving statement adopted by all Seattle rabbis and read to their congregations July 7. The declaration follows:

In view of the unprecedented tragedy that has befallen the Jews of Europe and which has caused the extermination of more than 6,000,000 Jews, and with the end of the war with a victory for freedom and justice when the helpless remnants looked with hope for relief of their suffering.

We learned with deep consternation of the brutal and unjustifiable action of the British Government in its wholesale arrest of the leaders of the Jewish community in Palestine and thousands of other innocent Jews, on their Sabbath day, causing untold suffering, chaos, and ruin to many of the communities, established with so much anguish and effort.

We are compelled to regard this high-handed action as further evidence of the British Government's intention to repudiate its solemn pledges and obligations under the mandate, granted to it by the nations of the world, including the United States of America, and its promises made time and again to the Jewish people in the Balfour Declaration and reiterated by subsequent governments. We urge upon our Government to use its good offices with the Government of Great Britain to release immediately those held under duress and to implement the unanimous recommendations of the representatives of our Government and the Government of Great Britain, published in the United States-Anglo Committee's Report on Palestine, on May 3, 1946, providing for the immediate immigration of at least 100,000 Jews now in the displaced persons' camps.

We sincerely trust that all men of good will will express their sympathy both in their prayers and by their active support toward the fulfillment of the sacred obligation entrusted by the Almighty to all justice-loving nations.

General Rice Tells the Governor How to Meet a Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Record of July 17, 1946:

COLONEL RICE TELLS THE GOVERNOR HOW TO MEET A PROBLEM

Biggest trouble with the Martin administration is Governor Martin himself.

For nearly 4 years he has been playing a do-nothing role.

Martin asked Col. John S. Rice, Democratic nominee for the governorship, what to do about veterans' housing in this State.

Colonel Rice's reply gave a sound, State-financed program for prompt erection of 25,000 homes to sell for $6,000 to veterans.

It's a good, common-sense plan. It's the kind you'd expect from a successful businessman and manufacturer, a veteran of two wars who is interested in his fellow veterans.

But there's no reason why the Martin administration couldn't have hit upon something as good a long time ago, called a special session of the legislature to approve it and have it in operation by this time.

There's no reason, unless Martin, GOP choice for the United States Senate, has decided to do nothing rather than risk making any political mistakes.

Martin is a very nice chap. He has a most attractive personality.

But he's not doing his job. He's not leading the State in this critical reconstruction period. He refuses to call a special session of the legislature to deal with the veterans' needs and scores of other pressing problems.

The State has enough laws, he says.

Martin is on a sit-down strike against the State.

Pennsylvania has no Governor in Harrisburg. It has only the GOP candidate for the United States Senate as tenant in the executive mansion.

Democratic Nominee Rice knows that a special session of the legislature is urgent. The veterans—who met in Harrisburg last week end and to whom Martin was not at home—know it, too.

Rice has outlined what the legislature should do about housing—set up a State authority with power to borrow $150,000,000 for veterans' home construction. It would be a sound investment for the State, a godsend for the veterans. Colonel Rice would have the houses built by private contractors at a fair profit. No "radicalism" there.

Action by the legislature is also long overdue on other aids for veterans, on teachers' salaries, a State FEPC, workmen's compensation—just to mention a few. The need for rent control is now obvious.

It's 14 months since the legislature last met. Unless a special session is called it won't meet until next January. In 14 months the world has turned upside down, war has ended, the atom bomb has emerged, millions of veterans have come home, the country strives for economic stability.

In Pennsylvania Governor Martin would have us believe it is still May 1945—that time has stood still.

By his failure to govern this State, Martin is clearly demonstrating his unfitness for the United States Senate.

Parliamentary Delegation to Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. RYTER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. RYTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report of the Parliamentary delegation to Poland, January 1946:

PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO POLAND, JANUARY 1946

(Report by Maj. Tufton Beamish, M. C., M. P., and Maj. R. J. E. Conant, M. P.)

1. INTRODUCTION

The report which follows was submitted in draft to the other members of the delegation in the hope that some or all would subscribe to it. This they were unable to do.

We cannot agree with the views of the majority which we consider represent an unbalanced, misleading, and in some cases inaccurate picture of the situation as it exists in Poland today.

In particular do we disagree regarding the holding of "Free elections," because we are strongly opposed to the holding of elections on the bloc system. P. P. S. and P. P. R. who at present control the Government of Poland fear they will lose control if elections are free. We agree that a coalition of parties may be desirable after a free election, since all parties intend to pursue the Socialist policy, but we consider that the people of Poland should decide the composition of their new government.

We think it is a mistake to in any way gloss over the fact that tens of thousands of Poles are imprisoned without trial for alleged political offenses. There was no subject on which we heard more bitter complaints than this.

We had personal talks, out of the hearing of others, with many people, among whom were the Prime Minister, Osobka-Morawski (P. P. S.); the Minister of Defense, Marshal Rola Zymierski; Under Secretary of State Berman (P. P. R.); Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture Milkolajczyk (P. S. L.); the Leader of the Work Party Popiel (P. P.); the Cardinal Archbishop of Cracow, Prince Sapieha; the Minister Plenipotentiary for the Coastal Areas Kwiatkowski, one of the best known members of the National Democratic Party—who must be nameless, and the heads of the UNRRA branches. But above all did we get our information from the man in the street.

We have confined ourselves to what we consider to be fundamental questions; to what extent Poles now enjoy the four freedoms, the degree of Russian influence and control, and the prospect of free elections in the near future. Economic and social conditions have only been mentioned insofar as they bear relation to the above.

We decided to frame our report on these lines in view of the following extract from the report of the Crimea Conference, February 11, 1945, to which Great Britain, the U. S. A. and the U. S. S. R. subscribed:

"We reaffirm our common desire to see established a strong, free, independent, and democratic Poland. * * *

"This Polish Provisional Government of National Unity shall be pledged to the holding of free and unfettered elections as soon as possible on the basis of universal suffrage and secret ballot. In these elections all democratic and antinazi parties shall have the right to take part and to put forward candidates."

2. GENERAL

The parliamentary delegation visited Poland not as a committee of investigation but in order to study political, social, and economic conditions, and to report thereon to the House of Commons.

Our visit took place on the initiative of the British Government with the approval of the Polish Provisional Government. The latter, however, asked us to be their guests as soon as we arrived. As every Government is tempted to put its best goods in the shop window, this arrangement involved some restriction upon our investigations, but having our own interpreters, and by combining the tour originally planned by our Embassy with that suggested by the Polish Provisional Government, we were able to form a fair estimate of the present situation.

We wish to place on record our gratitude to the British Ambassador and the staff at the Embassy in Warsaw who did everything that was humanly possible to assist us to form an independent judgment and put themselves to great inconvenience to attend to our every need. We also wish to record our appreciation of the generous hospitality of the Polish Provisional Government.

We were very greatly impressed by the evident pleasure with which we were received everywhere we went.

After 3 days in Warsaw we divided into two parts, one traveling south and west to Cracow, Oswiecin (Auschwitz), Katowice, Wroclaw (Breslau), and Lodz, and the other in a north and west direction to Bydgoszcz, Sopot, Gdansk (Danzig), Gdynia, Posnan (Posen), and Lodz. In the course of our tours we met not only all the leading members of the government and the provincial governors and their staffs but men and women in every walk of life and of every political hue.

3. FREEDOM OF SPEECH

(a) Press: There is a strict government press censorship, though there has been a slight relaxation in recent months. Newsprint allowed to the Polish Peasant Party is unfairly restricted. Ninety percent of the newspapers in circulation are controlled by the parties other than the Polish Peasant Party. The Polish press, while never criticising Russia, frequently has a strong anti-British flavor.

(b) Private conversation: All who criticized the Government invariably expressed the wish when speaking to us, that their names should not be mentioned in public. Very few spoke freely within the hearing of anyone who might be a Government supporter.

(c) Wireless: There are no restrictions either on the sale or use of wireless sets. Few people in fact possess them and they sell at exorbitant prices. This deficiency is partly remedied by the Government having placed loud speakers in the towns and some of the villages.

4. FREEDOM FROM FEAR

(a) Political prisoners: We were unable to ascertain the number of political prisoners at present under arrest, but the Prime Minister in reply to a question from one of us quoted the fact that 42,000 political prisoners had been released in recent months as an example of the tolerance of the present regime and the freedom now enjoyed in Poland. Modzelewski (P. P. R.), the Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs, in reply to the same question stated that 12,000 had been released since last summer. We both met individuals recently released from prisons. None had stood trial, nor indeed been charged with any offense, nor in any case received any explanation for their release. We formed the conclusion that there are less prisoners under arrest for political reasons than a few months ago, but the threat continues and millions of Poles are living in fear of arrest.

(b) Security police: The Polish Provisional Government maintain a strong secret police system which works in close cooperation with detachments of the N. K. V. D. (the Russian Security Police).

(c) Russian troops: While it is appreciated that the armed forces of any power necessarily stationed on foreign territory are unpopular, the criticisms we met of the Russian troops in Poland went much further than this.

It was not possible to make any estimate as to the size of the Russian forces. The Government explained that the reason for their presence is twofold: to protect Russian lines of communication to Germany and to act as a reserve to forces stationed in Germany. It is difficult to justify the presence of a Russian reserve in Poland and we were struck by the fact that, in the comparatively small area we saw, Russian troops were scattered in small parties in practically every village of any size and were by no means confined to the main lines of communication. The chief reason for the unpopularity of Russian troops in Poland is their bad discipline resulting in drunkenness, looting, and many other crimes. Cases of bad discipline are always apt to be exaggerated, but we were able to prove to our satisfaction that the Poles had every cause to make serious complaint.

5. FREEDOM TO WORSHIP

We found no signs of religious persecution and we were very impressed by the fine work that the church is doing in reconstruction throughout the country and particularly in Warsaw. On the other hand, the new marriage and divorce laws making marriage in a registry office the only legal form and permitting "automatic divorce" after 3 years, are unpopular. We met several Catholics who fear that religious tolerance may be short-lived as being inconsistent with the principles of communism, and it is not unfair to assume that their views are representative of Roman Catholic feeling as a whole.

6. FREEDOM FROM WANT

The standard of living in prewar Poland, as in most continental countries, judged by British standards, left much to be desired. It is extremely low today, and the government are deliberately keeping wages down to avoid inflation. The price of all consumer goods in the "free" market is exorbitant and the rationing system has largely broken down owing to lack of administrative machinery. We neither saw nor heard of any actual starvation though millions have less to eat than they require.

UNRRA is doing excellent work under great difficulties. Their efforts are much appreciated, though we met some criticism of the methods of distribution which is undertaken by the government. The moral value of UNRRA supplies is probably little less than their material value.

7. POLITICAL PARTIES AND ELECTIONS

There are six legal political parties in Poland today: The Polish Workers Party (P. P. R.) (Communist), the Polish Socialist Party (P. P. S.), the Democratic Party (S. D.), the Peasant Party (S. L.), the Polish Peasant Party (P. S. L.), the Work (Labor) Party (P. P.).

The provisional Government has limited the legal parties to the six named above.

One party (the National Democratic Party) has been declared illegal.

We do not think that P. P. S., which was the official Socialist Party in Poland before the war, and with which our British Labour Party then had close contacts, can any longer be considered representative of moderate Socialist opinion in Poland.

All six parties intend to pursue a left-wing policy; a policy, which as far as we could judge, finds approval with the majority of Poles.

The Polish Socialist and Workers' Parties (P. P. S.) and (P. P. R.) control the Government of Poland and their members occupy the most important posts, with very few exceptions.

A Socialist-Communist policy is being pursued with the liberal use of the security police and the drastic censorship of the press. Several leaders of the Polish Peasant Party (P. S. L.) have recently been assassinated.

It is generally admitted that free and unfettered elections would result in the heavy defeat of P. P. S. and P. P. R., who are therefore determined that the elections shall be held on a bloc system. In this way they are hoping to obtain representation in the new government out of proportion to the support they command in the country. The Polish Peasant Party (P. S. L.) and the Work Party (P. P.) have deferred their decision regarding a bloc.

It has been suggested in favor of the bloc system that unless elections are held on this basis there is risk of serious trouble from the extreme left which might find the support of Russia. Even if this is true we consider that there is no less risk of trouble if the Polish Peasant Party (P. S. L.), which alone of the legal political parties in Poland stands openly for the principles of western democracy, is either not allowed to run its own candidates or is forced to accept a compromise.

8. ARMED FORCES

The Army is being reorganized on the Soviet system. The second in command of every regiment and battalion is in charge of political education. None who are politically opposed to the present regime can hope to get commissions, though several senior officers who previously showed no Communistic leanings have recently been employed in high positions. Only a very small percentage of infantry officers are Russians, and their number is decreasing. In the specialist arms, however, there is still a high proportion of Russian officers. Some of the highest appointments are filled by men who, though Poles by birth, have had a Russian upbringing and held Soviet citizenship for many years, e. g., the C. G. S. and the Vice Minister of Defense. Some posts are held by Russians. One reason for this is not far to seek, since the present army is based on the four Polish divisions which were all trained and equipped by the Russians and were raised on Russian soil.

The Air Force is almost entirely Russian, and Russian influence in the Polish Navy is still very great.

9. POLISH FORCES OVERSEAS

The Polish Provisional Government would like all Polish armed forces overseas to return to Poland immediately, but General Anders and most of his officers are labeled as "Fascists" by the government. The small percentage that has so far returned has, so far as we know, been well treated and were indeed met with a flourish of trumpets. At least one senior officer from General Anders' army (his D. M. S.) has recently returned to Poland and been reemployed by Marshal Rola Zymierski in the same position.

We hope that the majority of Poles overseas, even though they may not feel satisfied with the conditions in Poland today, will return home and take a part in rebuilding their homeland. We appreciate, however, that any who have been individually accused of being "Fascists" and who are known to hold right-wing views, could only expect short shrift on their return, and will be unable to consider such a course.

10. STATEMENTS OF POLISH NATIONALS IN LONDON

Many people regard the statements issued in London by members of the former Polish government as biased and often inaccurate. We were able, however, to check up many of their statements and found them to be substantially correct, though occasionally exaggerated and inaccurate. Some of these deficiencies are clearly due to the time lag in getting information out of Poland.

11. SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC POSITION

The government, with the general agreement of all parties, is making strenuous efforts in the field of education and in the health services, under very difficult conditions. Much has been well done though progress is hampered by lack of administrative experience, and inadequate staffs, resulting in part from political discrimination. The nationalization of industry has, too, the general support of all six parties and is well under way. Private enterprise while not actually discouraged receives no encouragement.

The most serious problems which the Poles have to face in the economic sphere are shortages of food, industrial and agricultural machinery, and means of transport.

Coupled with this is the virtual destruction of Warsaw, Gdansk (Danzig), Gdynia, Wroclaw (Breslau), and other towns, and the extinction of over six millions of the population. In spite of these fantastic problems, we found a grim yet gay determination on the part of all whom we met to face up to the future.

The trade agreement between Poland and Russia, which expired at the beginning of the year and is probably in process of renewal, contained secret clauses. It was based on the barter system, and we were unable to find out how it has been working. Supplies of coal to Russia are slightly behind schedule. We found a general impression among all those outside Government circles that Polish industry is working for Russia, and such investigations as we were able to make tended to confirm this. Poland has no trade agreement with this country or the United States and no exchange rate has been fixed. We hope this may be remedied in the near future.

Though formerly a food-exporting country Poland today is seriously short of food. The agrarian reforms, which went a long way before the war, have split up the remaining large estates in small, and often uneconomic, holdings. However desirable this may be socially and politically, it must seriously handicap the production of food for several years to come. Although the Government deny their intention of adopting the collective system of farming, this would appear to be the logical outcome of the present policy.

12. HOME ARMY (A. K.) AND N. S. Z.

Probably less than half of the home army (A. K.) have taken advantage of the amnesty offered by the Government and declared themselves. Those who remain underground refuse to owe allegiance to what they consider a Russian-controlled administration, and place little faith in the Government promise of fair treatment.

The extreme right-wing organization, known as N. S. Z., who, since the Russian entry into Poland in 1939, followed by the Russo-German partition of Poland, have regarded Russians as enemies, is accused by the Government of being responsible for many anti-Communist activities, and of being involved in shooting affrays. N. S. Z., which probably number less than a thousand, have always been disowned by A. K. The Government accuse N. S. Z. of getting their arms and money from the Polish forces under British command across the green border (the Czech and Hungarian frontiers), but they have not yet furnished any data which would enable the British Government to investigate these charges.

13. RESETTLEMENT IN WESTERN TERRITORIES AND EXPULSION OF GERMANS

The western territories are being resettled by Poles from territories ceded to Russia and by others from certain areas in Poland which were either overpopulated or in which crops failed last season. No Germans, with the possible exception of some specialists, who cannot prove Polish descent and who are not prepared to accept Polish nationality will be allowed to stay after the end of the spring. We saw no signs of persecution of the many Germans who still remain and the westward movement of Germans appeared to have ceased. Our investigations in this connection were very limited.

Every Pole to whom we mentioned the subject considered that the new western territories up to the line of the Rivers Oder and Neisse were already part of Poland. The problems of rehabilitating this area, which has great economic potentialities, are immense, but the determination of the Poles to make a success of this task was everywhere evident.

14. CONCLUSIONS

We are most strongly of the opinion that the Polish people should be enabled to express their opinion in free and unfettered elections as soon as the administrative machinery can be set up and thus establish a government truly representative of Polish opinion.

We think it desirable that it should be clearly stated at once that elections held on the bloc system, even if nominally supported by all parties, cannot in present circumstances be regarded as free elections within the meaning of the agreements of the Crimean Conference.

We also consider that the knowledge that an international commission, composed of people who genuinely desire that the elections shall be free and unfettered, will be present during the elections, would have a steadying influence.

We found many disquieting signs that under the present regime democracy and freedom, as we understand them in this country, are in abeyance. The large majority of the people look to Great Britain and the United States to give them every assistance by peaceful means to establish a truly democratic government, independent of any foreign control or undue influence.

Why Are Foreign Air Lines Given Privileges Here Which Are Denied to United States Lines?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCK R. HAVENNER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the House to a very peculiar policy recently promulgated by the United States Civil Aeronautics Board when it granted the Australian National Airways permission to use the facilities of the San Francisco Municipal Airport to transport revenue passengers from San Francisco to Sydney and Melbourne, although the Civil Aeronautics Board had previously denied similar authority to American shipping interests which had applied to operate a trans-Pacific service.

That public opinion in California is strongly opposed to this policy of the Civil Aeronautics Board is shown by the following editorial which appeared in the San Francisco Call-Bulletin on Saturday, July 6:

LET FACTS BE KNOWN—DESPITE CAB DENIAL, FOREIGN SHIP-OPERATED AIRLINES FLY TO UNITED STATES SHORES

On the recent occasion when a commercial air transport operated by the Australian National Airways used the facilities of the San Francisco municipal airport, under the authority of the United States Civil Aeronautics Board, the Call-Bulletin made several pertinent observations concerning the incident.

Among other things, it was noted that Australian National Airways "was founded and has long been principally owned and controlled by Australian shipping interests—and it supplements the facilities and services of those established interests and is completely integrated with them, and thus the combined air-sea interests of Australia are now able to offer and are actually conducting a wholly new and vastly significant medium of ocean transport."

It was further noted that while the United States Civil Aeronautics Board had granted authority for this Australian operation, in which Australian shipping interests were the principal beneficiaries, the board has refused to grant similar authority to American shipping interests desirous of operating a similarly integrated air-sea service.

"It requires no particular gift of prophecy to foresee where the bulk of ocean transport business is going in the future if the American Government persists in the discriminatory policy," the Call-Bulletin observed editorially.

The American merchant marine would soon go out of business under that policy, and the volume of American business done through the great port of San Francisco would soon be reduced to a trickle.

"If the American Government had the deliberate purpose of completely destroying the American merchant marine," the Call-Bulletin editorial concluded, "it could not find a better instrument to accomplish that purpose than this absurd and stupid policy of discrimination and foreclosure."

These observations by the Call-Bulletin have since elicited the response from Acting Chairman Oswald Ryan, of the Civil Aeronautics Board, that "the Board has not authorized Australian National Airways to engage in air transportation to or from or within the United States."

All that was authorized in the specific instance cited by the Call-Bulletin, says Mr. Ryan, was "passage of an aircraft operated by Australian National Airways over United States territory on a charter flight from Australia to Montreal, Canada."

However, this assertion by Mr. Ryan is in conflict with the known facts, and in making it he is either misinformed about the facts or has deliberately ignored them.

Australian National Airways planes have already made not just one but six flights to or from the United States this year, all with authorization by the Civil Aeronautics Board and all but one with paying passengers.

Moreover, Australian National Airways has established a scale of fares for the trans-Pacific air service, and very obviously intends and expects to operate for revenue—and of course it must have the authorization of the Civil Aeronautical Board to do so.

The point to be emphasized is that American shipping interests, which must have an integrated air service in order to survive, are forbidden to have it—while their foreign competitors in both the shipping and the commercial aviation fields do have it.

So the Call-Bulletin earnestly inquires once more, as it did in its previous editorial:

"Why should our foreign competitors be given such a tremendous advantage in the postwar fields of world trade and commerce, with our own American interests being virtually driven from those profitable fields?"

Independence Day Address by Hon. Warren R. Austin, of Vermont

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN
OF VERMONT
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 17 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an Independence Day address delivered by me on July 4 last at Highgate, Franklin County, Vt.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Chester M. Way, the owner of the airport which is being given a new name, is serving the public in a variety of ways. Through the employment of many other people and the investment of his capital, he is engaged in dealing in farms, operating retail stores, inviting visitors and tourists to the State, and affording them attractive and comfortable accommodations in a hotel. In merchandising he caters to the interests and wants of our own farmers, village people, and the tourists. One sees his letters published in the newspapers, raising a flag for Vermont, around which men and women may rally for civic good and national and international ideals. We may be sure that Mr. Way's interest in this airport being renamed today is not primarily for monetary gain to himself. His vision comprehends the progress of Vermont and of the United States. He sees that this location and this natural unobstructed runway between the sky and the earth gives promise of great utility to mankind. At the present time it is serving as a flying school, operated by the Fli-Rite Co., to whom I also express my thanks.

I publicly acknowledge a sense of great appreciation that Mr. Way should have thought of associating my name with his altruistic and progressive plan. I thank him for this and for giving to an old friendship between his family and mine a memorial.

What I want to say concerns this locality, but what I feel obliged to also say comprehends world interest.

My grandfather, Warren Robinson, was born in Swanton in 1805. At an early age he was moved with his family to Highgate, where my honored and beloved mother was born and my father married her and they raised us children.

I know as well as experience can demonstrate that these warm pine lands, these forests of birch, beech, and maple, this shining Mississquoi River, and the Green Mountains, to which we raised our eyes every morning, molded and shaped the character of the people who pioneered and defended these lands against enemies from all sides. In the early days they had little schooling but they acquired culture and spirituality through their own efforts and devotion.

What finer expression of this truth could I cite than one from my own grandfather Robinson, who had no other school experience than one term in district school. From the family record I quote:

"Stephen Robinson (my father) was Deacon of a close communion Baptist Church in Swanton for near 40 years and my mother (Phebe) was also a member of the same church. Two of my sisters were members of the same church (Phebe and Dura). The boys embraced more liberal views and have all been inclined to the sentiment of universal reconciliation and the salvation of the whole human race eventually. The writer is of the opinion that the spirit world, like the present, is a world of progress and improvement, and has strong faith that the entire race of humanity will learn to love and obey the great and good spirit of the universe, in the fullness of time."

Boyhood in Highgate was filled with dangerous adventure. For example Cy Cummings' bull was always ready for a fight. It was great fun to get into the pasture far enough for him to see us and then have to beat it for our lives with this roaring, tearing animal running us out.

The river always challenged us. We were not content to swim it or ride it in a boat. In times of freshet, which washed logs down from mills on the upper stream, we would strip at the swimming hole and like wild Indians streak up the river above the rapids and ride logs through those dangerous waters.

In winter the ice was the finest at Thanksgiving time, and we would try to skate to Swanton from Highgate; sometimes we made it without having to swim.

We did not escape injury entirely but we surmounted it which is the main point. We developed nerve, courage, hardihood and persistence that wins over all odds.

I remember our own Baron Munchausen—Mike Doolin. His imagination would run riot from the stimulation of unexpected events. When the freshet of 1896 occurred, washing Cutler's barn full of hay off his Island down river and over the great falls at Highgate Center, Mike came down to the store and regaled us with his experience. He lived in the French Village which was on a plateau probably 300 feet above the river. In the night, he said, he could feel the water around his bed as it floated, and he paddled it to a skylight, crawled out on the roof and saw the whole French Village covered with water. Soon the sun rose and with it a great wind which blew the water in a huge wave right off the plain. It increased until it picked up Bundy's barn, corncrib, and other out-houses and blew them across Bundy's potato field. Mike said, "Do you know that barbed-wire fence which connected Bundy's buildings was dragged through the ground and dug up every potato in Bundy's field."

I could recount many of Mike's stories which were associated with Bundy, his neighbor, but time does not permit. You see we had in our country a Paul Bunyan.

This happy reminiscence in the company of my dearest friends could well occupy the time allotted today, but I must haste on to other comments.

You and I are consecrated to a cause. Like our forefathers we pledge our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor to the achievement of victory over war. We gain faith and confidence for this service by frequent recurrence to the character and the principles of our Vermont forebears. They knew by bitter experience, in long and tedious negotiations, that success depended upon a strong military posture and yet in all the 27 years, from 1763 to 1791, in which they maintained first a de facto and then a de jure independent republic against aggressors on all sides and against the Continental Congress, they shed blood only occasionally and when serving in the common cause of liberty during the American Revolution. At all other times they employed pacific methods of determining disputes and of pressing their claim to independence. Against the British on the north, where there was a third of the entire British Army on this continent, they kept the invader out by the so-called Haldimand Negotiation. Against the Yonkers, the New Hampshire people, and the Massachusetts Bay people, they employed pamphlets and arguments at first based on their rights as Englishmen, an appeal to an impartial world, and second on their preparedness to defend their grants against the Continental Congress who threatened to send an army against them. Ethan Allen declared "Let them come, we will show them the dexterity of our regiment."

He expressed the same idea in a different manner and under different circumstances when he stood in the Royal Courts of New York and defied the court to send sheriffs to Vermont with writs of possession to eject the New Hampshire grantees, by saying: "The gods of the hills are not the gods of the valleys."

Later John Jay, who was the prosecutor of New York's claims against the Vermonters in the Continental Congress, expressed the opponent's view in a letter to Governor Clinton, which stated that Vermonters "possessed a strong country, were warlike and determined and that more force would be required to reduce them than could be spared from the common defense."

In my grandfather's day universal military obligation and training of the militia was commonplace. Now we have difficulty enacting statutes to provide for it. Warren Robinson, in Hemingways Gazetteer, says (vol. II, p. 265): "Highgate companies of militia at regimental musters, for many years, however, would outflank most other companies on parade, and apparently were a strong, athletic race of men, and remarkably adapted, physically, for military life."

Today, while we dedicate ourselves to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, we recall the success of our forefathers. They were excluded from the Declaration of Independence made by the Thirteen Colonies July 4, 1776, because they were not then recognized. Nevertheless, they were in fact independent and adopted their own declaration of independence at Dorset that same year. The lesson which we take today for promotion of the cause of the United Nations is this: That declaration of independence was not made by a union of States, and yet, after due consideration, a union was formed.

Listen to the language emphasizing this lesson: "And that as free and independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

That declaration was signed by each of the 13 States according to a resolution of the Continental Congress.

Of course, Vermont's declaration was that of an independent State. The point is that being independent and loving sovereignty, for which they made the sacrifice that was necessary, they each gave up a considerable amount of external sovereignty for the purpose of forming a confederation and perpetual union. What they did was of a character that can be done again by the members of the family of nations. They lost no relative independence because after they had contributed a degree of sovereignty to the Federal Government, there remained in each State the same amount of independence as the other States had. The great progress in civilization which our forefathers made in the founding of the United States of America involved this important change in their status in the family of nations, namely, the individual State surrendered to the central government the treaty-making power and the power to wage war.

The Republic of Vermont had prevailed through two revolutions; her own revolution which began with the end of the French and Indian wars, and the American Revolution, and her individuality had become fixed for all time. When finally she was admitted into the Union in 1791, she did not come in by the consent of the Legislatures of other States concerned. She was not formed within or carved out of another State, nor was she created by the junction of two or more States or parts of States. Vermont came into the Union as a republic which had maintained its sovereignty by the wisdom and spirit of her Green Mountain people.

Notwithstanding this rugged individuality, Vermont eagerly sought membership in the Federal Union and willingly surrendered as much of her external sovereignty as did the original 13 States.

Vermont favors giving to the United States all that is required to accomplish the high purpose of international security and peace, and acts on the settled conviction that possession of power, perceived by our vis-a-vis, is necessary for effectiveness in negotiations.

Therefore, she cooperates with other States in influencing Congress to reconstruct the broken down elements of our military posture, and to maintain with great care the special and peculiar advantage which the United States has in the atom bomb. In the reconstruction we have taken a feeble step, extension of the draft without reaching the real pool of manpower, the 18-year olds. We now have before us the bill to promote the common defense by unifying the departments and agencies of the Government relating to the common defense, introduced by Senators THOMAS, HILL, and myself. This bill ought to have strong public support. It needs it.

Moreover, since the test at Bikini, there has been publicity purporting to show that some of the treaty powers do not regard possession of the bomb by us as a negotiating asset any longer. To me, this is an admission that it had been regarded by them as such before Bikini. Now assuming that the results at Bikini are not surprising, but are in line with what we know about the terrific destructiveness of nuclear fission. We have two great impelling motives for keeping the secrets, namely, saving the human race from the bomb itself and saving the human race from the use of mass-destructive weapons generally.

The purpose of Congress has already been stated in the bill passed by the Senate, namely, not until after—not until after effective measures of security against the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes have been put into successful operation, shall knowledge regarding its use for constructive purposes be released.

That is, the secrets which are dangerous must be kept until they become no longer dangerous. If the ideal policy should be internationally established, then the secrets need never be disclosed to anybody. They may well be proscribed with the complete destruction of all bombs. This ideal is a common element of all the plans that have been yet suggested, namely, complete outlawry of the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes and destruction of the bombs.

Points of disagreement relating to details, such as the timetable, the circumstances, the manner of operation can well be compromised and settled by negotiation. The only point in the timetable which seems to be necessary for the development of the purposes and principles of the United Nations is this, the time when these negotiations should be finished ought to be fixed at an early date to prevent a race for discovery of the secrets. Second, the time for destruction or denaturing of all the bombs should not be earlier than the effective operation of international security measures through the United Nations.

I will enter upon the responsibilities of Representative of the United States in the United Nations and member of the Security Council, conscious of the strength of spirit given to me by my fellow Vermonters. I will experience the stimulation derived from the cooperation of people in whose very souls is the determination to make the purposes and principles of the United Nations effective. I will always be certain of your steadfast, persevering work for the abolition of war and the practical use of peaceful means of attaining justice and maintaining order under the law. This, we realize, can be done. This, we realize, must be done through the United Nations.

Bias Seen in Report on the Pacific War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. STERLING COLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by David Lawrence entitled "Bias Seen in Report on the Pacific War":

BIAS SEEN IN REPORT ON THE PACIFIC WAR—LITTLE MENTION MADE OF EFFORTS OF NAVY AND MARINE FORCES

(By David Lawrence)

Eleven civilians appointed by the Secretary of War to make a study of "the effects of all types of air attack in the war against Japan" have rendered a report which in many respects is the most astonishing commentary on the war with Japan that has been issued from any official source.

The main conclusion is that Japan would have surrendered even if the atomic bombs had not been dropped, even if Russia had not entered the war, and even if no invasion had been planned or contemplated.

Such an assumption is exactly what the De Seversky school of thought has been saying in order to prove that air power should be in supreme command of our Military and Naval Establishments.

The report is plainly biased in that it has hardly any mention in it of the part played by the United States Navy and the Marines, as well as the Ground Forces of the United States Army.

NAVY MENTIONED ONCE

Only once in the whole report is the name of our Navy mentioned. Nowhere is the term "aircraft carrier" used. Nowhere is there any mention of the part played by sea power in destroying Japanese surface forces and nowhere is there any mention made of the manner in which the Marianas Islands and Okinawa were captured. The whole report gives the impression that air power and air power alone caused Japan to surrender.

Perhaps the men who comprised the survey commission didn't intend it that way and perhaps they didn't themselves write the final report or notice the omissions. But as a historical document, the survey will fail of its purpose because it is so clearly an attempt to justify the use of air power almost to the exclusion of sea power or land power.

Several times there are references to a Japanese Army and Navy and mention is made of the destruction of the Japanese Navy, but no statement is made that the United States Navy and its Fleet Marine Force carried the attack across the long stretches of the Pacific up to the very coast of Japan and, aided by valiant divisions of the United States Army, took such an important base as Okinawa, a victory which unquestionably impaired Japanese morale.

The report does concede that United States submarines sank 55 percent of the Japanese merchant fleet and then adds that "our Navy and Army Air Forces made important contributions by sinking 40 percent of Japan's total shipping lost." This is an overcondensation.

Actually the surface forces and aircraft carriers of the Navy did the major job. Official data are available from joint Army-Navy intelligence reports which show that in the entire Pacific war, the Army Air Forces are credited with the sinking of only one combat ship larger than a destroyer. This was the Jap cruiser Yura on October 25, 1942, and Navy dive bombers share the credit for that sinking with Army B–17s.

In combat ships Japan lost 331. The official assignment of credit, in which the Army Intelligence joins, shows that surface vessels of the United States Navy sent 102 of these to the bottom, that submarines sank 94, and that naval aircraft, largely dive bombers from aircraft carriers, sank 86. Army airplanes are credited with the sinking of 22 smaller Japanese vessels of war. Other causes, including mines and unknown factors, accounted for the other 34 vessels.

RECORD ON CARGO SHIPS

In merchant vessels the record is much the same, although here the reports are built up largely from Japanese naval reports. The Japanese report 3,129 steel merchant vessels lost.

Submarines are credited with 1,750, or more than half. Planes from aircraft carriers are credited with sinking 876 and mines are believed to have sunk 239. Action of Navy surface ships and other causes account for the sinking of 264.

Thus, less than 14 percent at the most of Japanese merchant shipping could assuredly have been sunk by Army aircraft, according to the above figures.

Certainly a record like this would seem to warrant some mention of sea power and of surface ships in the so-called strategic bombing survey issued by the War Department.

The Army Air Forces did a wonderful job in the war, but so did the marines who sleep in the cemeteries of Iwo Jima and Saipan and the Army doughboys who fought alongside of the marines to take Guam and Okinawa—from which bases Army bombers eventually launched their brilliant attack on Japan. It would have been a fine thing if the Bombing Survey Commission had seen fit to include mention of the work done by the United States Navy and the ground forces of the Army in forcing Japan to surrender—assuming that the atomic bomb was really superfluous.

Does Security Mean Slavery?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I hear my colleagues discussing the fact that the voters are apathetic, and apparently the light vote in the primaries so far held bears out the observation. It is not difficult to understand why the voters are disgusted, discouraged, and apathetic. Why should they be otherwise when they hear their representatives mouthing security and voting insecurity? They hear their representatives shouting for economy but voting gifts of billions to foreign defaulting nations. They hear their representatives shrieking to high heaven for free enterprise but voting for bureaucratic regimentation of free enterprise. I am sure that a free people, once they could be assured of representation which would stand steadfast for the fundamentals of free government, free enterprise, law enforcement, equality of opportunity, and a government of law and not of men, would cause a resurgence of the fighting spirit of the sovereign citizens of the United States such as this Nation has not seen in years. The people want freedom and not bureaucratic slavery. They want to rally to the support of men who will actively represent them in the Halls of Congress rather than men who vote for the security of foreign nations, unmindful of the insecurity of those whom they are supposed to preserve, protect, and defend on the home front.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an article of W. G. Montgomery entitled "Does Security Mean Slavery?"

DOES SECURITY MEAN SLAVERY?

(By W. G. Montgomery)

Security is the most used word in the dictionary today, and the worst used. It has become the shibboleth of politicians in all parties, and by this doctrine you may know them. It is a beguiling word because it's natural for us to want security. But can a man or nation have security and be free?

Advocates of economic security tell us they would abolish poverty, want, and fear, make everybody secure from the cradle to the grave. It's just as easy as that. All you need to do is do nothing. Just let the "expert" planners plan the lives, labors, education, and religion of all the people, and society will be turned into a utopia in no time at all.

What they fail to tell you is that if economic security is even possible, it would demand the surrender of your personal freedom, and not many, I'm sure, would want security at the price of slavery.

More people than ever before in our Nation are being razzle-dazzled by glib talkers into the belief that everyone can have all he wants anytime he wants it by turning to some form of statism, socialism, or communism, and the word "security" is used to sell the plan to those who detest atheistic communism.

Millions of good Americans see no objection to the word "security" and fall for it, not knowing that it has lost its decency, because of the company it has fallen into. The word "security" as now used by scheming politicians is only a synonym for communism.

Now, because of this fact, and it is a fact no thinking person will dispute, we need to be wary of this word wherever used. Because most persons feel that security offers them something substantial, the word is being blatantly used by communistic schemers under various party labels to destroy freedom of speech, the press, and religious liberty. "Economic security" as proposed in this country is just a short cut to communism, and if it comes, dictatorship will come with it.

Do you want the state to furnish you food and shelter, and thus make you secure, or do you want to be free? You may have one; you cannot have both.

The slaves before the Civil War had economic security. And so do the slaves in Russia and all totalitarian nations have security. But that's all they do have. Let a Russian citizen critize communism and see what happens to him before sundown.

You can have security inside a prison, but who wants to go there to get it? Since this word has strange but obvious meanings, let us go a little further into it.

Can there really be such a thing as economic security, or is it just a political will-o'-the-wisp? And if security were possible, would it be desirable. Would a man improve his life by knowing that his every want would be provided for, such as medicine, food, shelter, or would he settle down in his tracks and rot?

It is not a fact that the best security on earth is insecurity? Let a man know that he has nobody to lean on but himself and he will put his best into life. That has been proved by millions who have climbed out of cabins into greatness. Poverty carries a spur that is often worth more to a man than a gold mine.

Economic security nationally directed means that everybody leans on somebody else; everyone leans and nobody lifts. This is why communism has always failed, and always will as a source of security. This is why

5,000,000 people starved to death under communistic Russia. Destroy individual initiative and the rewards of labor, and society sinks to its lowest levels; nobody works except while driven, hunger and want spread everywhere, and decency dies.

Probably the silliest slogan ever devised was that of being freed from want. If this could be made to work, it would mean the end of the human race. All prosperity, progress, decency, and religion are based upon want. Because a man wants to establish a home he goes to work. Because he wants to escape hell, he lives religiously. Because he wants an education he gives up drifting and begins rowing. But the irony of this doctrine is that if it were possible for us to be without want, we would soon be in want. It is want that destroys want. Take an example.

The writer has carefully studied communism, going back to its beginnings nearly 2,000 years ago. The heart of communism is atheism. God is ruled out altogether; and this being true, society is "equalized" by leveling down instead of lifting up. The industrious are penalized and the indolent are rewarded. The idea is that nobody shall be in want, even those too lazy to work. Result: soon everybody is in want.

Communistic security has been tried several times in our own country. The writer has spent days in New Harmony, Ind., and Nauvoo, Ill., going over the old school records and viewing the old buildings left by the Communists when they attempted to establish new nations here with everyone sharing alike and owning all the resources in common.

If it were possible for communism to succeed it would have done so on the banks of the Wabash and the Mississippi. It had had everything to begin with. In each case the city had already been established when the Communists moved in. On the Wabash, a religious sect known as the Rappites had built a city, which the Communists took over in 1820; and 25 years later, the Communists took over Nauvoo, a city vacated by the Mormons. Neither one lasted longer than 2 years. Beginning with storehouses full of food, livestock, buildings to live in, land to cultivate, orchards, looms, and all the conveniences of that day, each settlement was soon reduced to starvation because everybody leaned on somebody else.

Nor does state socialism mean security. It means slavery. All history shows that when men attempt to make earth into a heaven by social planning, they always turn it into a hell. It simply is not God's way to leave God out of our social processes; nor will anybody ever get something for nothing so long as this is God's world.

Thus, it will pay us to be cautious about any kind of security politicians offer us, lest it cost us our own freedom. It is also an indisputable fact of history that liberty has always been destroyed by some new freedom promised the people. The Constitution and Bill of Rights give us all the freedoms we need; and the security of communism is not for us whose great security is still in God.

Letter From a Middle-Class Family

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, as a sample of the fact that most American citizens are able to do and are doing sound thinking of their own and are not easily misled by propaganda that does not square with the best interests of the country as a whole, I ask leave to include the following letter from a middle-class family in my district:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 6, 1946.

Dr. WALTER JUDD,
Congressman, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If you will look back in your records, you will see that our family has not bothered our officials in Washington, since the days of the Supreme Court packing bill, but there are some things that can just as surely jeopardize the well-being of our country, in this family's estimation, as tampering with the powers of the Court or the Legislature.

The most of the time we are satisfied to believe that with all your advantages for getting information and a desire to be a good all-around representative of all of your people and not just certain groups, that we can trust you to protect us also, who perhaps are best classified as just members of the great American middle-class family.

We have, as a family, talked over some of the questions which are about to confront you and we feel that maybe you would like to have our opinion, and also we feel that we are a good example of the union family which nevertheless does not always follow the union line in our voting or thinking. Then, too, we talk public questions with our customers and neighbors a great deal and find that many of them think for themselves and, union though they may be, do not always vote the way the union spokesmen threaten (or prophesy).

We have three union members in our family, each belonging to a different union—two from AFL and one CIO. We own a public garage and filling station in the twelfth ward and employ fairly dependable union labor. We also own and operate a large farm and belong to the farmers' union in Kansas and also own and operate the Planters' Hotel, in Leavenworth, Kans. This should give us a viewpoint both of the employer and of being the hired help.

We think we should have some sort of a regulatory bill for price control but with definite provision for ultimately coming to an end. I do not mean it should have a time limit but some way of fixing the time at which it should be no longer necessary to have it so that it could bring itself to an end and not depend upon the will of those who might find it advantageous to perpetuate it.

Then too, we think there should be some fair allowance made for rent increase that would be sufficient to cover the increase in taxes, supplies, and the labor involved in operating and maintaining rental property. It should not depend upon the temperamental whim of the local administrator. We should all be able to take, shall we say, judicial notice of the fact that everything that enters into the ownership and operation of rental property, has gone up in price and there should be some way of arriving at a fair increase that would be allowed automatically. From the farm angle, we are mixed grain and livestock farmers but we are definitely against subsidies or soil-saving bonuses call them by whatever name you wish.

Believing as we do that "in union there is strength," we want the laws to recognize that we have a right to bargain with our boss or when we are in our capacity as boss. We do not think any group in the United States should become so strong that any noticeable part of our Government should be run by the brute strength of any one or combination of groups. We think the time has come when labor is going to have some restraining legislation passed. We have nearly come to the place where it is such a burden to be a self-supporting citizen, not to mention trying to be an investor or employer, that one is often tempted to run with the tide and to cease trying to remember that individual saving and initiative has made us the greatest Nation and the mortgage banker for the world.

Just for future reference, and believe me you will be meeting the question in the not distant future, we do not believe the veterans, per se, should run the legislation of the country. They have just one vote each as have the rest of us. I have several of those in my family also one talking to me here, now, just out of the Marine Corps and I want all the good that life can give them—my own and my neighbors' boys but I do not want them to shake such a big stick at my lawmakers that we cannot progress in a just, good, and orderly fashion.

Very truly yours,

THE MCGRATH FAMILY,
By NELLIE D. MCGRATH.

Seven Remedies for Strikes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 17 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Seven Remedies for Strikes," written by Eric Johnston and published in the July 1946 issue of the Reader's Digest.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEVEN REMEDIES FOR STRIKES
(By Eric Johnston)

All America is afraid of more strikes. We have had too many already. The material loss in goods and services has been colossal. Infinitely worse are the clouds of ill will and suspicion which they generated. More than anything else, this Nation needs industrial harmony.

It is nonsense to talk of everlasting peace in industry, because management-labor relations are human relations and human relations are under constant friction. We do not expect to stamp out all strikes. That could happen only in a totalitarian state. But the public does expect management and labor to improve their techniques and patterns for getting along.

All waves of industrial warfare stimulate demand for labor legislation. There's a hue and cry to "pass a law"—lots of laws. It sounds so easy, so convenient. A law, we say, would "make" labor do this and would "make" management do that. But legislation that is characterized by too much compulsion is of highly dubious value. The practical fact is that we cannot legislate human nature.

Legislation, alone, will not bring industrial peace, but some legislation is needed. I favor legislation necessary to establish fair rules of the game with penalties for the violators of those rules. We need rules which protect labor and protect management in equal proportions. We need rules to outlaw practices which are harmful to both.

Let me make my position crystal clear. The right to strike is a fundamental American right. It must always be so. But strikes and strike causes can be minimized.

Many people think that any strike is just a strike. Actually, strikes fall into seven different categories. Let's look at all the kinds of strikes there are, and the remedies for them.

STRIKE 1: THE ORGANIZATIONAL STRIKE

Let's assume that one morning a file of men begins to picket a woodworking plant. The pickets are members of the woodworkers union, but the rest of the people who work for this plant are not members of the union. The idea of this kind of strike is to force the other employees to join the union, and to force the owner to accept a union contract.

This is a strike which cannot be defended on any grounds. It takes away from many of the employees the right to decide whether or not they want to join the union. This is a reactionary strike. No progressive-minded person could applaud it if he really understood it.

It is a strike without sense or reason because the union has every right to proceed with organizing the plant along orderly lines fair to all concerned. The Wagner Act provides election machinery by which all employees can register their attitude on joining the union. The ballot box—a sacred American tradition—takes the place of the picket parade.

Amend the Wagner Act to do two things: Outlaw this kind of strike as contrary to public policy and penalize unions which short-circuit the act and its orderly election machinery. During the war, irresponsible unions were penalized by denial of union security privileges—maintenance of membership and dues check-off. Irresponsible unions can be similarly penalized in peace.

Amendments to the Wagner Act are much in order. The act is now 11 years old. From experience we know where it is good and where it is bad. It needs some face lifting to bring it up to date.

STRIKE 2: THE JURISDICTIONAL STRIKE

This grows from a dispute between unions as to which shall do what jobs—who does what work and who collects dues from whom. There is no moral justification for this kind of strike. It is possible to decide which union a worker should belong to without calling a strike. This kind of strike pins the employer and the public squarely in the middle, torn at by both sides.

Remedy 2

Labor should establish interunion jurisdictional committees. It should agree to contract provisions for arbitration of all jurisdictional differences. Where it refuses to do either, then the Government must step in.

As a result of its experiences, the National Labor Relations Board has given employers the right to ask for speedy determination by the NLRB as to which union should govern. Employers should use this right. And Government should enforce the NLRB finding—if necessary, by filing contempt-of-court proceedings against the offending union and its leadership.

STRIKE 3: THE SYMPATHETIC STRIKE

Here workers go on strike out of "sympathy" with other workers on strike somewhere else, and for no other reason. The sympathetic strike is a paradox in terminology. It is not only an unjustifiable strike but itself deserves not one whiff of sympathy.

Remedy 3

Outlaw these strikes by clauses written into contracts. For labor's own good, labor should abolish this type of strike. It hurts the cause of labor. In an atmosphere where unions are accepted, the workers have no need to strike out of "sympathy" with workers elsewhere.

STRIKE 4: THE POLITICAL STRIKE

Here's an example of a political strike: Let's assume that a city council is on the verge of adopting a proposal for selling its public-owned power plants to private interests. In an attempt to turn the council the other way, organized labor in that city goes on strike. There is no excuse for such a strike. The city council's proposed action raises a political issue. Organized labor should express itself concerning that issue by the same means available to other citizens and groups—by petitions, public meetings, press statements, advertisements, direct communications—and, at election time, by votes. Labor should not use an economic weapon to enforce a political demand.

Besides all its other sins, the political strike has no roots in American soil. What parasitical growth it achieves in this country ought to be trampled down like a noxious weed.

Remedy 4

It is the same as the remedy for the sympathetic strike. Outlaw these strikes by clauses written into contracts.

STRIKE 5: PUBLIC-UTILITY STRIKES

Strikes in the health and safety industries—utilities, communications, and transportation—are not like strikes in other forms of enterprise. The public's interest is direct and positive in these industries. That is why they are controlled by Government commissions. Management of such industries, whether publicly or privately owned, is answerable at all times to Government. Even rates and profits and the kind of services are regulated.

Remedy 5

Legislation should be enacted for arbitration machinery to settle all disputes without interruption of these vital services. The Railway Mediation Act might serve as a background model for this legislation. If management of these industries is subject to Government regulation, the workers in these industries should accept employment with the understanding that they, too, shall be subject to these regulations.

STRIKE 6: THE INTERPRETATIONAL STRIKE

This is a strike resulting from a dispute over the interpretation of the language of a contract. It is only human that the worker and the boss will have differences of opinion as to what certain words and phrases mean. But you can't shut down the plant every time they disagree. If that happened, most plants would be shut down most of the time.

Remedy 6

All labor-management agreements should provide for arbitration of disputes over contract language, and bar strikes and lock-outs based on interpretation. This procedure was recommended to all unions and employers by President Truman's labor-management conference in Washington.

No labor contract guarantees successful industrial relations. Both parties must work at the job. Agreement to arbitrate differences is the first step. Industries with full-time, permanent arbitrators, whose pay is split between management and labor, have a relatively easier marriage of interests than others. An example is the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union and the garment industry. The practice of using a permanent arbitration set-up is growing. It is winning acceptance by both CIO and AFL unions and by employers. It makes sense; it is a move away from dependence on Government to settle disputes.

STRIKE 7: THE CONTRACT STRIKE

A contract strike results from disputes springing out of contract negotiations. Demands are made by one side and rejected by the other side. The demands are in connection with wages, hours, working conditions. This is the easiest strike to understand. It is also the toughest to settle, because in so many instances it can be justified. Alone among the seven types of strikes it can be tolerated as morally right even if economically tragic. Most strikes fall in this classification. The recent strikes in the automobile, steel, coal, and electric-appliance industries were this kind of strike.

Remedy 7

Keep 'em talking and head off the strike before it starts. Keep give-and-take talk going until both sides agree on a contract. This is called continuity of negotiation, which means that representatives of labor and management confer, exchange views and demands, while work goes on just the same.

To accomplish this continuity some unions and managements have established industry mediation panels composed of equal labor and employer representation. But not all industries have yet achieved mature collective-bargaining relationships. Until that goal is achieved, we need our Government mediation and conciliation service strengthened by more well-trained, well-paid mediators, skilled, able men.

We could take a leaf from Sweden's book. In Sweden, a mediation law requires a 7-day notice to the other party and to the Government mediation service before a strike or lock-out. The notice must include a statement of the reasons for the proposed stoppage. There is a fine for breach of this provision. The idea, of course, is to get both parties into conference before the strike actually breaks out. This system has been highly successful.

Any industrial-relations legislation must be framed from the long-range point of view. Any other point of view has its head in emotional thinking, and its feet in the temporary rut of reconversion. Once on the books, laws are hard things to pry loose. Half-baked legislation can turn out to be a curse and a cross in years to come.

We have the antidote for strikes right in our hands if we'll only use it. It is honest and efficient collective bargaining. Thus there is only one basic legislative approach to every phase of the labor-relations problem: Will it tend to bring about a more effective functioning of collective bargaining? Will it help labor and management achieve self-government? A strike—any strike—is a symptom that the institution of collective bargaining has somewhere broken down.

Too many of us are likely to think of management and labor as having different objectives. Actually their objectives are as alike as two prints from the same negative. So are their basic principles and beliefs. We all want about the same things. Summed up they spell out a greater middle-class economy—more people having more things. We agree upon objectives and we agree upon the means. Every poll in the country shows that Americans by a vast majority prefer capitalism to any other economic system.

This community of interest and these common objectives can be served only through greater production of all those things which make for better living. The consumer, the worker, the investor must all share equitably in the fruits of increased production. Their respective shares must be lower prices, higher wages, sounder profits.

Steady, uninterrupted production will give us these things.

Strikes will not.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, perhaps there are still some Americans so uninitiated as to read statements by Soviet leaders or by Communists anywhere, as if they were factual reports instead of propaganda documents. If so, these persons doubtless have been confused by the Soviet Union's long and violent attacks on Fascist Argentina, followed by a sudden reversal of its apparent position. The following columns by Edgar Ansel Mowrer throw light on the subject, and give some warnings to those Americans who allow themselves to be taken in too easily:

JOSEPH STALIN AND JUAN PERON

(This is the first of two columns on this subject)

Soviet Russia's renewal of diplomatic relations with Fascist Argentina is so immoral that it is funny. To match the spectacle of Dictator President Juan Peron physically embracing Soviet Trade Mission Chief Constantive Shevelev (as dutifully described in the press) you have to go back to 1939 and Stalin greeting Hitler in the name of their "friendship sealed in blood" (Polish blood).

It would be a mistake to take the newly sealed "friendship" as a smart Machiavellian maneuver of a realist Soviet diplomacy. In the Soviet glossary "fascism" is just another word for hostility to the Soviet Union. Once a German, Bulgarian, Rumanian, or Argentinian ceases to oppose Moscow he becomes a "democrat." Intelligent Communists understand this. They merely do everything they can to hide it from non-Communists who, if they opened their eyes, might become less "friendly."

Russia's going to bed with Argentina is going to make the real nature of Soviet political love life more difficult to hide.

The truth is, Bolsheviks have always got on better with "Fascist beasts" than with democrats or even with capitalists. Totalitarians naturally gravitate toward one another.

There was that inspiring scene at the Moscow railroad station when Stalin took tearful leave of his friend, Matsuoke—both tight as ticks.

There was the painful shock to the Kremlin when, in June 1941, Dear Adolf suddenly forgot the "friendship sealed in blood" and sent his armies crashing into Joe's country. The simple-minded Russians had not only seconded Germany's propaganda war but had dismissed warnings from Washington of an imminent Nazi attack as "capitalist tricks." Victor Kravchenko in I Chose Freedom (Scribner's, 1946) explains:

"The theory that Stalin was merely playing for time while feverishly arming against the Nazis * * * was such a transparent invention that little was said about it inside Russia." Outside the Soviet Union that invention found millions of gullible ears.

The German episode might have cured the polit-bureau of fondness for Fascists.

Not at all. After a few flirtations with minor German and Balkan Fascists, Stalin has now turned to the Argentine dictator. For 28 years the U. S. S. R. and Argentina had no diplomatic relations. Less than a year ago, at San Francisco, Soviet spokesmen still volubly damned Peron as a Fascist—to the loud applause of all good American liberals.

Now, after Peron has consistently broken his promises to the United Nations and duped his own people into underwriting Argentine fascism, Joseph Stalin is offering the No. 1 Latin Fascist his hand.

You can hear the boys in the Kremlin chuckling over the smart trick they have played upon Uncle Sam—gone right into his backyard and swiped his most difficult girl.

But have they been so smart?

In this writer's judgment, in extending recognition to Peron, Moscow has made a major blunder. It has forfeited any right to lead the fight against Franco Spain. Like Francisco Franco, Juan Peron gave assistance to the Axis. Russia cannot have it one way in Buenos Aires and another way in Madrid.

As captain of the anti-Fascist front, Stalin is no longer convincing. Either Truman or Attlee can, if he chooses, raise the anti-authoritarian banner which the Russian is trailing in the mud. Either Truman or Attlee can now take the lead in ousting both Franco and Peron.

More important will be the effect of the Soviet-Argentinian embrace upon world public opinion. The Soviet's position in the world depends far less upon its (now badly shattered but basically formidable) military potential than upon its reputation as a stronghold of incorruptible integrity.

Actually for the last 7 years, the U. S. S. R. has been following a policy of imperial grab that would have made Peter the Great green with envy. Experts have long been aware that absence of moral scruples was one of Moscow's less attractive traits. Yet outsiders of good will have "interpreted away" each successive grab in the series. They have refused to believe that the anti-imperialist Soviets have become just another claimant for world rule. Many of these foreigners are idealists disgusted with one or more blemishes in their own countries. The novelist, H. G. Wells, once wrote that his heroine, Christina Alberta, the laundryman's daughter, favored bolshevism because everybody she liked abused it and hoped for a world-wide revolution of an entirely destructive and cleansing type.

Destructive a Soviet-made revolution could still be. But after the Argentine affair, it will have difficulty in passing for cleansing.

Even without this latest betrayal of principle, the Soviet's conduct has undoubtedly been opening many American eyes. The latest Gallup poll reveals that a clear majority of Americans are now convinced that Russia is trying to build herself up to be the ruling power of the world.

From seeing through this ambition to stopping it is not too long a step.

In the second column, Mr. Mowrer will suggest the benefits which the United States might draw from the Stalin-Peron friendship.

JOSEF STALIN AND JUAN PERON

(This is the second of two columns dealing with renewal of diplomatic relations between the U. S. S. R. and Argentina)

Every civilization—as John Foster Dulles has recently written—needs occasionally to be challenged. That is why good Americans should consider the newly cemented Soviet-Argentine friendship as a cause for rejoicing. For, though it puts us and our principles squarely on the spot, it thereby gives us the chance to regain the moral leadership of all freedom-loving men which we lost by our contacts with Fascists before and during the war. Here, as Dante told Virgil during their trip through hell, will appear our nobility—or lack of it.

To see the situation as it is, we must realize that Stalin and Peron are natural allies. Their rivalry must never hide the fact that each of them needs the other.

Were there no Peron (and no Franco in Spain or little Fascistini sprinkled over the planet), Stalin's task would be infinitely harder. He would have to find some other "enemy" against whom to direct the irritation of his unhappy people. He would need some other justification for the continuance of the Russian dictatorship in defiance of Marxian principle—for the continuing militarism, the lack of consumer goods, the censorship and iron curtain between the Soviet Empire and the rest of the world. Without "Fascist beasts" abroad, Stalin's propaganda machine would find it vastly harder to obtain allies and fellow travelers among the citizens of relatively free countries.

In the same way, without the "Red menace," Peron (and Franco) would have no pretext for tyranny and "discipline" at home and would miss the support of other Latin-American governments, a goodly number of otherwise decent Catholics in all countries, and a few misguided capitalists.

This being the case, it should be clear that if the United States allows itself to take sides in the Fascist-Communist struggle, it builds up one danger while getting rid of the other.

There are times—as during the late war—when this choice cannot be avoided. But to be jockeyed into making it now by so transparent a trick as Peron is now trying to pull would be to betray a political naïveté bordering on infantilism.

Peron's game is plain—to utilize the threat of his entering into alliance with Stalin to terrify the United States into giving him arms and permitting him to acquire that dominion over the lower end of South America which he could never gain with his own means.

He wishes to persuade United States Americans to swallow the nausea he evokes in them and begin bidding for his, Peron's, favor against the Soviet Union.

Stalin's game is broader. By demonstrating that he can if he will break down inter-American solidarity and foment communism in the Western Hemisphere, he wishes to blackmail the United States into withdrawing from Stalin's chosen field of dominion in Europe (and possibly in Asia as well). If in the process he can procure some of the Argentine rawstuffs—hides, meat, grain—which the Soviet Union badly needs, so much the better.

The game, I repeat, is so transparent that a child would not fall for it, which may be one reason why certain innocent American generals and gullible diplomats have fallen for it head over heels.

Let us out with the truth:

It was fear of Stalin that caused Avra Warren of the State Department to obtain Argentina's admittance into the United Nations last year.

It was fear of Stalin that caused the War Department to bring forth its cute little scheme of "strengthening hemispheric defense" by establishing a uniform type of United States armament throughout both Americas.

It was fear of Stalin that caused General Eisenhower to consent to the visit to this country of the former Argentine chief of staff, General von der Becke. And it is fear of Stalin that has caused our latest amateur diplomat in Moscow, Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, almost hysterically to urge the United States to make friends with Peron and arm his Fascist armies "if the Argentine battle is not to be lost."

Well, to do anything of the sort would be madness. The proper American reaction to the flirtation between Stalin and Peron is not flight from democracy but more democracy.

Peron's "Russian threat" against the United States does not make Peron less but more objectionable to this country. Diplomatic discrimination against him should not be relaxed. It should be underlined and it should be stiffened. For this new combination is totally without danger to the United States or to democracy.

The Soviets can be prevented from arming Argentina by the stern threat of putting an embargo upon all shipments to the USSR if Russia should send a single shipload.

On the other hand, the decent Latin-American countries should be given all possible support against Argentine-bluster and blackmail. Not only should they get military protection if required. No; they should be given broad economic and cultural favors—the speedier their progress toward democracy, the greater the favors. Bolivia and Paraguay should be wrested from Argentina's overlordship. A mere continuance of the wholesale purchase and stock-piling of tin would do the trick in Bolivia.

In the long run, the best protection against Argentine fascism (and Soviet communism as well) lies in raising the economic and cultural level of the Latin-American masses.

American generals who urge American cooperation with Fascist states like Spain and Argentina in a defense against the Soviet Union should quietly be told to go roll. They should be reminded that this is what Neville Chamberlain tried to do with Germany at Munich. This sort of thing brought the Nazis to Calais and Britain to the edge of the abyss. Must we continue appeasement?

Only as the opponent of all totalitarianism can the United States preserve the internal unity that is the real source of our power.

Now is the time to start.

Alaska Development Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. L. BARTLETT

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the economic well-being of Alaska and the development of Alaska are predicated to no small extent on what the Department of the Interior does for the Territory or what it does not do—what it is able to do by reason of the annual appropriation bill, or what it is prevented from doing by lack of funds.

For that reason I am happy to be able to report that this year the Congress appropriated more money for the use of the Interior Department in Alaska than ever before. There were projects we believe to be sound and worthy which were not included, and we believe progress will be retarded as a consequence; but it is heartening to note that provision was made in several instances for new undertakings which can be justified without difficulty from the standpoint of national interest and which are really of urgent need from the standpoint of Alaska.

It was not so long ago that for Alaska the Interior Department supply bill was not only the most important but was the largest in terms of dollars appropriated. That is no longer true. For the fiscal year 1947 the Interior Department will spend about $10,000,000, while the War Department, aside from all its other activities, has announced plans for a $24,000,000 building program at Fort Richardson, near Anchorage, and Ladd Field, near Fairbanks.

Notwithstanding that, the fact remains that of all the Federal departments and bureaus having to do with Alaska, none is so close to the daily lives of the majority of people as is the Interior Department. That circumstance is not likely to be changed as long as we are a Territory. From Ketchikan on the southern boundary, where Fish and Wildlife Service controls the economic lives of most of the people by its administration of the great salmon fishery, to Barrow on the Arctic Ocean, where the Eskimo people receive guidance and assistance from the Alaska Native Service, the activities of this Federal agency have very real meaning to all the people.

Mr. Speaker, in the bill to which I have referred money has been supplied which will enable us to make a good, constructive start in the humanitarian task of conquering tuberculosis. That disease is the dread scourge of Alaska. It is not so because the climate is hospitable to it. The primary reason is that we simply have done nothing, or practically nothing, about it. The wonder of it is not that tuberculosis is so prevalent, but that it is not worse.

Some sort of natural immunity must have been built up; otherwise almost surely the entire population would have been afflicted. Less than 2 years ago there were fewer than a hundred hospital beds in all the Territory which were set aside for the use of those ill with tuberculosis. These were in the hospitals operated by the Alaska Native Service. Naturally, only a fraction of the native people with tuberculosis could be taken care of with such limited facilities. And while a few white people were hospitalized, it is safe to say not over 50 were under treatment.

FUTURE PLANS

And so it was especially cheering when the Alaska Native Service took over in 1945 a surplus Army hospital at Skagway and dedicated the entire institution, with over 100 beds, to the care of the tubercular. By that one stroke, the hospital capacity for this purpose was doubled. Now we have two additional reasons for gratification. The Territory has acquired another Army hospital at Seward and has leased it to a church group which will operate it as a tuberculosis sanitorium. There another hundred beds or so will be made available.

In addition to these notable advances, Mr. Speaker, the Congress has taken further action which is bound to be highly beneficial. It has authorized the Alaska Native Service to take over from the Navy and the Army the valuable installations at Sitka, and to make available there a 200-bed sanitorium. For construction and alteration of buildings, the sum of $1,300,000 in round figures was appropriated and for operational purposes the further additional sum of $345,000 was provided. The bill also contained an authorization for the establishment of a 600-pupil boarding school at Sitka to be operated in conjunction with the sanitorium.

Every Member of Congress who voted for the Interior Department appropriation voted to save lives of people who otherwise would have died. Those now ill who otherwise could not have been hospitalized will regain their health at Sitka. That appropriation, Mr. Speaker, will pay rich dividends. Because of it, those who without this help would have died, will live instead; families will not be broken up, and our greatest resource, our human resource, will have been made better and stronger and useful once again. There is rich satisfaction in the knowledge of that.

The Sitka establishment will be the first unit of three of like size contemplated for the entire Territory. It is estimated that with these in operation, plus the beds now available, and with continued health education, the incidence of tuberculosis and the mortality of tuberculosis, may be reduced to if not below the national average.

It is time these vigorous steps were taken. Of course we do not know what occurred during the war period elsewhere, but we do know that up to the time of the war the tuberculosis situation was worse in Alaska than anywhere else in the world. And this under the American flag where the chief sufferers were wards of the Federal Government.

If during my term in Congress as Delegate from Alaska I accomplished nothing else than to assist in some small measure in making sure that tuberculosis would never again take so many lives and cause such heartache and anguish in Alaska, I should feel my contribution had been worth while. Mr. Speaker, for 4 years I was president of the Alaska Tuberculosis Association. It is perhaps because of that service that I have come to place such emphasis upon tuberculosis control. I know the sense of accomplishment which I feel in the knowledge that 200 more desperately ill persons will soon be able to get the kind of treatment they need is shared by all Alaskans.

ROADS

It is merely restating a truism to say that development of a frontier country is intimately associated with the extension of its road system. And it is merely restating a fact—a fact known to every Alaskan—that despite the fact on the order of 99 percent of the land in the Territory is owned by the Federal Government we have not for around 16 years received any money for construction of new and important roads. There is one exception to that statement: the Glenn Highway, connecting Anchorage and Palmer with the Richardson Highway and thus with Valdez at the southern terminus of that highway and Fairbanks on the northern, was built during the war but only because the War Department represented such a road as being a military necessity.

So we have had to do in the main with what we had long since, and that has been very little. The roads in the national forests are constructed by the Public Roads Administration, and on the public domain by the Alaska Road Commission. Mr. Speaker, there are in excess of 500,000 square miles of public domain in Alaska but in all that vast expanse of land there are less than 3,000 miles of road. No wonder settlement has been retarded and insuperable difficulties have confronted those anxious and willing to start out in a new land.

This Congress has taken partial cognizance of that situation by earmarking money which will allow us to start new greatly needed road systems.

First, a road will be started which will connect the communities on the lower part of Kenai Peninsula with Seward and eventually—and I hope soon—will be part of a road and bridge connection with Anchorage.

Second, a road will be built connecting the Fortymile district with the Alaska Highway and thus will tie into the general highway network.

The Fortymile, Mr. Speaker, is one of the fabled mining districts of Alaska. It was there gold was discovered in the very early days of Alaska mining. It is located not far from the famous Klondike in the adjacent Yukon Territory, and is a great potential source of wealth. Under existing transportation conditions, however, there was little hope these potentialities could be realized. Freight charges are around $200 a ton and obviously none but a bonanza camp could really produce under such charges. When fuel oil costs from 80 cents to a dollar a gallon, as it does at Jack Wade, there is virtual requirement that gold be found from the grass roots down.

The 1947 Interior Department bill sets aside $560,000 for the start of this much needed road. A very excellent beginning with respect to construction should be made this year and it is encouraging to realize that in the near future this district will be tied in with Fairbanks and transportation charges will be lowered to the point where real development may be anticipated.

KENAI PENINSULA

It has long been known that Kenai Peninsula, with its rich soil, its mineral and timber resources and abundance of marine resources, offers an opportunity for the prospective settler perhaps unrivaled on the continent. There has been one great impediment—adequate transportation. Dependence has necessarily been on irregular and altogether unsatisfactory marine transportation. Because of the distances which have to be covered and for other reasons this has been an altogether unsuitable substitute for a road system. No country, no matter what its resources, can develop as it should lacking adequate access. The Congress has now recognized this lack and in appropriating $800,000 for a road which will reach from Kenai Lake to Homer, a step has been taken which will assure settlement on the land and make the lot of the settler infinitely easier. I predict, Mr. Speaker, that many, many veterans will locate on Kenai Peninsula and this appropriation will perhaps be more helpful to them than to any other one group.

The Richardson Highway, originally built before the day of the automobile, has been undergoing a process of reconstruction and to continue that work for the present fiscal year the sum of $750,000 was voted.

ALASKA GAME COMMISSION

For the year upon which we have now entered the Alaska Game Commission will receive $162,000 for enforcement of game laws. I do not believe this sum is sufficient to do the job that needs doing. Mr. Speaker, nowhere else under the flag are big game animals found in such abundance as in Alaska. There are to be found the great brown bear, the greatest moose herd in the world, deer, mountain sheep, mountain goats, caribou, and fur-bearers of many varieties. But we should not delude ourselves that we can keep without effort what we now have. Once the buffalo ranged the western plains in countless numbers. They are gone now and it is, of course, inevitable that game animals must largely disappear in places where man crowds in. That circumstance need not arise in Alaska for a long, long time; but if we are not alert and always vigilant we shall find that even in Alaska the reckless and unsportsmanlike have decimated our game animals and have wiped out that which cannot be replaced. There is room enough and to spare for the bear and the moose and all the other animals but if they are not guarded carefully and constantly we shall one day discover they are gone and that loss will not be Alaska's alone; in a very real sense it will be the entire Nation's. To protect game ranging over close to 600,000 square miles, $162,000 is indeed a small sum, too small a sum by far.

FISH AND WILDLIFE SERVICE

It is a man-sized job to enforce the fisheries regulations in Alaska. It is an expensive job. And it is an absolutely essential job. Alaska supplies most of the canned salmon produced in the world and this wonderful food supply, which, if properly handled will be a renewable crop producing every year, must be conserved and even built up wherever possible. The Fish and Wildlife Service was given $819,307 for this task during the 1947 fiscal year, and that is close to $200,000 more than the appropriation for last year.

In addition, the Service was given additional money, over $100,000 in all, for special studies. A survey of salmon spawning streams was authorized. Mr. Speaker, when the Committee on the Territories visited Alaska last summer the necessity for doing something along that line impressed itself upon every member of the commitee. There was no better illustration of what could be accomplished for a small expenditure than at Petersburg, where the committee was shown a creek—potentially a productive spawning stream—ingress to which by salmon was blocked by rocks which few fish could surmount. For a thousand dollars or so, we were told, those rocks could be blasted away. Money so spent would be well spent. Similar situations exist all along the coast and they should be corrected.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

The General Land Office and its agency, the Fire Control Service, the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines—all these bureaus will be able to carry on effective work in Alaska because of the 1947 appropriation bill.

And there is another section of the bill to which I desire to call attention. It does not appropriate a dime directly but its effect can be such as to be equivalent to the appropriation of many million dollars. I refer to the provision whereby the Alaska Railroad is authorized to accept transfer of equipment from other government departments without cost to the railroad.

This means the railroad management will be able to obtain locomotives, other rolling stock, and badly needed equipment the value of which could be equal or perhaps even greatly in excess of the entire money appropriation for Alaska in the bill. For the first time since it opened, the line will thus be in position to bring about a desperately needed rehabilitation of rolling stock. The importance of this for the entire Territory cannot be overestimated. Also, the railroad was authorized to spend $200,000 in constructing tourist accommodations at Wonder Lake in McKinley Park. The scenic magnificence of that area is such that once housing is available it is certain the number of tourists visiting the park will be greatly increased.

So all in all, Mr. Speaker, this bill provides the framework by which we hope and expect to make notable progress this year. We could and did ask for more in the sure knowledge that its expenditure in Alaska would be helpful to the entire Nation; but we know that with the $10,000,000 which was allowed, plus the equipment which will be transferred to the Alaska Railroad, much can be accomplished.

PAST EXPENDITURES

Comparisons may mean much or they may mean little, but they do provide a certain standard of measurement. Bearing in mind, of course, that the dollar does not go so far today as it did then, it is interesting to note that just 10 years ago the Interior Department appropriation for Alaska totaled $2,139,370. In those days the Bureau of Fisheries was under the Commerce Department. The appropriation bill for that bureau for the fiscal year 1937 contained $20,000 for fur-seal work in the Pribilofs and $278,000 for enforcement of fishery regulations. That made a total appropriation 10 years ago for all work now handled by the Interior Department of about $2,500,000 as compared with an appropriation for this fiscal year of $10,000,000. That means $4 will be spent this year for every dollar expended 10 years ago.

This is a sound investment the Federal Government is making in Alaska, Mr. Speaker. It is sound in that it provides the services required by the citizens of Alaska. It is sound in that it paves the way for new citizens of Alaska. In that great land are to be found vast resources in natural wealth of land and sea, resources that after all these years have really not been exploited at all. They are almost a limitless bank on which this country of ours may issue checks for far, far into the future. As Alaska is given opportunity for development under sound American principles, the good that is done thereby will return in the form of dividends almost beyond conception to the Nation of which we are such an integral part.

Pay of Overseas Civilian Personnel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. MEAD
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 17 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, through news stories and an editorial in the morning newspaper in my home town, it has come to my attention that more light needs to be shed on the policy of hiring War Department civilian help overseas. It is charged that some of the civilians are being paid rates considerably in excess of the pay of soldiers, and that this tends to cause bad morale among the occupation forces, as well as being a heavy drain on the American taxpayers.

I understand that members of the House Appropriations Committee, at the suggestion of the Buffalo Courier-Express, are seeking full facts on this matter from the War Department. I applaud their diligence, and I trust that complete data will be supplied by the War Department, so that the American people can know the facts.

I ask unanimous consent that an editorial on the subject, printed in the Buffalo Courier-Express of July 12, 1946, be made a part of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUGGESTION FOR CONGRESS

We have no quarrel with the basic idea that the United States must maintain occupation armies in occupied territories—Germany and Japan, particularly. We have committed ourselves to doing a job and it is up to us to do it, but—

It is a strange story, printed on page one this morning, from Lucian Warren of our Washington bureau which shows that while our soldiers have come home and are coming home every day their places are being taken by civilian employees, who by the way, are paid double and even triple the amounts that were paid to the soldiers being replaced.

It is a perfect example of "now you see it and now you don't." The Army is being demobilized but the pay roll is soaring. Who takes it on the chin? Not Germany. Not Japan. The answer is easy—it's the United States taxpayer. True, occupation costs are supposed to be assessed against the occupied territory and technically will be so allotted but somehow we feel that the dollar paid out today will not find its way back into the Treasury, 10, 20, or 30 years from now. Theory is fine but these are days when one should be practical.

There is a vast amount of paper work in administering an occupation army but there is also some honest-to-goodness soldiering in it too. These civilians don't carry arms and arms are the only things that impress the Germans and Japanese. These beaten people are not going to be impressed by a horde of civilians, dressed in costumes which resemble the uniforms worn by the United States Army officers. A highly mobile force with tanks, guns, and more guns is what it takes to keep a hungry, resentful people in line while they learn their lesson. And, in case you have forgotten, that lesson is simple. It is nothing more than readjusting their mental attitude so that this world will not be plagued with aggressive war again in our time or in the time of our children and their children.

Lots of strange things can happen three to ten thousand miles away from home and as long as this seems to be the season for congressional investigations we offer this situation as one well worth looking into. And that doesn't mean sending a clambaking congressional committee to the far corners of the earth to join the clambaking civilians already there. It means examining the facts and figures available right in Washington and then doing something about it.

Statement by Chancelor of the Exchequer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by the British Chancelor of the Exchequer:

The American Congress has now approved the loan. This does not mean that we can now relax our efforts, but it will hasten the time when we can once more play our full part in a vigorous and expanding system of international trade. We take approval of the loan as a sign that our American friends want to work with us just as we want to work with them. We have a common interest in reviving trade throughout the world and in providing good standards of living for men and women everywhere.

The Oswego State Teachers College, Mother of Teachers Colleges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HADWEN C. FULLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, one of the finest teachers colleges in America is located in the Thirty-fifth Congressional District of New York, which I have the honor to represent, and I take this opportunity to call the attention of the House and of the country to the splendid work it is doing.

The State Teachers College of Oswego, N. Y., of which Dr. Ralph W. Swetman is now the most able president, has become a force in the educational world through the vision and faith of its founder and the pioneering spirit of his successors.

Founded by Dr. Edward Austin Sheldon in 1861 to improve the quality of teaching in the city of Oswego, the experiment developed into the so-called Oswego movement which directly or indirectly influenced practically all teacher education in the United States from that day to this. Historians in the field of educational training and educational movements refer to this institution as the mother of teacher colleges. Many institutions established for the training of teachers drew their inspiration and leadership from this training center, and colleges and normal schools with the Oswego ideal spread from coast to coast.

The original concept of Dr. Sheldon in founding his "ragged school" in 1861 was in his own words to free the student from the curse of memorization. His original plan for the training school included this significant paragraph:

In this plan of studies the object is not so much to impart information as to educate the senses and awaken a spirit of inquiry. To this end the pupils must be encouraged to do most of the talking and acting. They must be allowed to draw their own conclusions; and if wrong, led to correct them. The books should only be used for reference and as models for the lessons to be given. The children should be allowed to have two short recesses of 10 minutes each, morning and afternoon, and gymnastic and singing exercises should be frequently introduced to give change of position and rest to the children and keep up an animated and pleasant state of feeling. The younger children should not be detained at the school building to exceed 4 hours each day, and the older ones may be excused as they get through with their exercises.

The whole objective method was put into effect by the teachers in the public school system of the city, sacrificing a part of their very meager salaries to import a teacher who understood the objective method of education. This first teacher had been trained in the Home and Colonial School in London, England, and under her influence and that of Dr. Sheldon, the practice school system and kindergarten methods were introduced for the first time into the school systems of the State. Andrew P. Hollis in his book, The Oswego Movement, and Ned H. Dearborn in his, The Oswego Movement in American Education, have recorded more completely the development of the Oswego idea and the importance historically of the Oswego Normal School in the development of teachers for the United States. Professor O'Shea of the University of Buffalo and later the University of Wisconsin once wrote:

I have no hesitation in saying that the Oswego Normal School has had a greater beneficial influence upon elementary education than any other institution in this country.

In its beginning the school was solely for the purpose of training teachers for the elementary system, but in keeping with the pioneer spirit of its founder, the work was expanded to include the first manual training course offered in the United States. This was in 1892, when Dr. Richard Piez was employed as the first technically trained teacher in this field at Oswego, and under his guidance students learned to make many useful articles to help them in their regular teaching. In 1902 Dr. Piez was called to other duties in the institution and Dr. Joseph C. Park became the guiding genius in the development of that phase of education which was to emerge as the present industrial-arts division of the college.

It has consistently been the aim of this division to prepare young men and women to transmit to succeeding generations the tradition of skills and knowledge of things mechanical which has been the American tradition. Never has there been a time when it seems so important to teach young people how to live effectively in an industrial and technological society. The industrial arts teacher is a true leader of youth. His is the opportunity to work with boys and girls in a field where interest and learning follow the same paths. He acts as counselor and advisor as the boys and girls work on their projects. He helps his students to plan their work and solve their problems as they arise. The informal organization of the industrial arts class lends itself to a close bond of understanding between teacher and pupil. Many opportunities for giving practical guidance and personal help are afforded. The true industrial arts teacher, such as Oswego State Teachers College strives to prepare, becomes the friend and confident of his pupils in their orientation to living in an industrial democracy.

The training school at Oswego has never been a static affair and has always continued to grow in concept and serve from its meager beginning in 1861 to its chartering as the second teacher training institution in the State of New York in 1863, through its 1-year course of study to a 2-year program of work; then to a 3-year program in 1926 in the general elementary division, and in 1932 in the industrial arts division; then to a 4-year program for industrial arts with its first graduates in 1936 and its first 4-year elementary graduates in 1942. The normal school became a State teachers college by action of the State legislature in 1942, and the bachelor's degree was awarded to the industrial arts graduates as of 1940 and to the general elementary graduates as of 1942. The constant demand for more and more training, for better and more efficient teachers has always been met by the faculty of the institution which has never been satisfied to rest on laurels already won.

At the present time the 4 year general elementary curriculum prepares students to teach in kindergarten through grade eight in any elementary school in New York State. This course of study is founded upon the principle that teaching is a profession and that especially designed education is as necessary to successful teaching as to success in any of the professions.

It is the aim of the Oswego State Teachers College to serve the boys and girls of New York State by endeavoring to train superior elementary teachers. In order to accomplish this aim, the college attempts, first, to provide opportunities and experiences designed to develop personal, social, and professional qualities that characterize a superior elementary teacher; second, to give to the student a program of education that includes a broad general culture, adequate professional preparation and supplementary cultural contacts which make for a truly liberal education.

The course of study for the training of elementary teachers offered at Oswego, therefore, provides for a vitalized scholarly background in the academic fields and for developing a proficiency to deal understandingly with children and subject matter in professional work.

A major concept of the faculty and administration of the Oswego State Teachers College has been one of service to the community in which it is located, and to the State of which it is a part. During the war recently concluded, every member of the faculty was engaged in some civic activity connected with the promotion of the war. One member was responsible for the first-aid training of 2,000 civilians in the city; another was chief air-raid warden and deputy defense director for the city. All members were engaged in some civilian protective work—taking part in the bond drives, Red Cross activities, one was chairman of one of the Red Cross war-fund drives, and all participated in the community services connected with the war. Seven members of the faculty volunteered for the armed services of their country; 300 students interrupted their academic courses to enter the services of the United States. Of these students, 130 have reregistered following the conclusion of hostilities. The remainder of the group are expected to return for the fall term.

For 15 months the Three Hundred and Twenty-fourth College Training Detachment of the United States Army Air Corps was located on the campus and instructed by the faculty. This corps had a constant enrollment of 300 prospective pilots, bombardiers, and navigators.

During the stay of the thousand European refugees at Fort Ontario the college opened its doors to university students from Europe stationed there and cared for some fifty of the small children from the shelter in the demonstration school. These contacts were made to broaden the viewpoint of its own student body and to extend its services to those seeking educational enlightenment in this new country. Many of the faculty served the shelter in instructional capacities, in helping to organize school work for those who could not attend the college, including adult educational classes, and many interesting friendships developed between residents of the shelter and members of the staff.

Services to the community, to the State of which it is a public part, and to the Nation, which it has served for 85 years, is as much a part of the philosophy of the institution as instruction in the classroom, laboratory, or shop. The present faculty at the institution as measured by preparation, and the acquisition of earned degrees in the best educational institutions of the country, is in the upper 10 percent, nationally. It is a cosmopolitan group representing every section of the country, and interested in the broad cultural instruction of its students.

The work of the college has been recognized by the postwar planning commission of the State, and plans have been completed for the extension of the present Industrial Arts building to meet the addition of three new departments to that phase of the work; a new practice school building with complete facilities for the pupils from kindergarten through the eighth-grade level; a complete physical-education plant to meet growing demand for better physical and recreational training for the boys and girls of America; a new heating plant to care for the expanded plant; two dormitories to accommodate men and women entering the college from a distance; and a student union center where students and faculty can meet on a social level that is part and parcel of the work at the institution.

The new buildings will be erected on the beautiful campus of the college, one of the largest and best located in the State, overlooking Lake Ontario and containing more than 50 acres of lawns, woods, and lake shore. As a result of its location and the philosophy of its faculty and student body, much of the recreational activities of the school centers in the out of doors.

The student body recently increased from 500 to 750, is composed of 55 percent men and 45 percent women, and is equally balanced by the veteran and civilian students. These students have been selected by the administration on the basis of their scholarship and personality requisite to good teachers in the public school system of New York and of other States. They are accepted by the members of the faculty as junior members of a professional organization that is responsible for transmitting the culture of democracy to the generations of tomorrow. As a result of its philosophy, the faculty and students live as a democratic family working together and playing together to promote quality concepts of the democratic way of life which is the basis of American living.

In keeping with its sense of responsibility to the public which supports it, Oswego State Teachers College has for years deliberately recruited its student body on the basis of quality and its chance of success in the chosen profession of teaching. This emphasis on quality has resulted in the assembling of students from every section of its own State and other States, representing most of the races and creeds that have gone into the cultural composition of America.

With the assumption by America of a definite participation in the moral and spiritual leadership of the world, the faculty and students at Oswego State Teachers College have assumed along with their privilege of developing intellectual leaders the heavy responsibility of producing better leaders. The pioneering spirit of its founder, Dr. Sheldon, is as alive today as it was in 1861 and the college is looking forward to a constantly changing program to meet the constantly changing needs for more effective leadership.

A Trip Through Hell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I am presenting herewith the first of a series of articles by Mr. Paul Bellamy, editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer. This series is entitled "A Trip Through Hell," and contains observations made on Mr. Bellamy's recent trip through central Europe as a member of a delegation of newspaper and periodical editors and publishers invited by the War Department to visit Europe and study conditions there during the spring of 1946:

BELLAMY DEPICTS HELL NAZIS LEFT—OFFERS GUIDING POINTS FOR TRAVELERS SEEKING FAITH IN EUROPE'S INFERNO

ARTICLE 1

I have just returned from a trip to hell. Would that I had the tongue of men and of angels to describe what I saw.

Dante should return and rewrite his description of the Inferno.

By hell I mean postwar Germany and general conditions in central Europe.

I was privileged to see this part of the world by reason of an invitation from the Secretary of War, who felt it might do the country some good if a group of seasoned newspaper and magazine people were to be shown the extent and multiplicity of the problems which war has thrust upon America. He therefore asked the following to make up the party:

Julius Ochs Adler, of the New York Times; Alan Barth, of the Washington Post; Gardner (Mike) Cowles, of the Des Moines Register Tribune; Robert Fuoss, of the Saturday Evening Post; Frank E. Gannett, of Gannett Newspapers; Charles Gratke, of the Christian Science Monitor; Edward Leech, of the Pittsburgh Press; Henry Luce, of Time, Life, and Fortune; Malcolm Muir, of Newsweek; Glen Neville, of the New York Mirror; Hamilton Owens, of the Baltimore Sun; Robert Reed, of the Kansas City Star; Tom Hawkins, of World Report (the new David Lawrence international magazine), to Salzburg only; and Paul Bellamy.

In this and subsequent articles, I want to set down some of my impressions of the European scene today. They will be written as they occur to me, without any attempt at logical or chronological sequence, but in the hope that when they are done, you will have gained a fairly complete picture of the terrible chaos left in the wake of war.

At the outset, I should like to declare my principles.

1. I believe that America has committed herself solemnly and sacredly to go through with a clean-up job this time and that all good citizens must unite to see that the promise is carried out.

2. I believe that the most tragic event in all history up to the start of the Second World War, of which it was the cause, was a wrong turning taken at the fork of the road by America when it ran out on the League of Nations. God grant that we do not commit a similar error this time.

3. I believe that the Army of the United States is doing a tremendously fine and effective job in a well-nigh impossible situation.

4. I believe the Army has been dismantled altogether too fast and that the present recommendations as to its size recently sent to Congress by President Truman do not reflect an adequate conception of our commitments.

5. I believe that Germany can never be handled properly under the quadripartite setup which now prevails, whereby the country is divided into four zones—American, British, French, and Russian—particularly with the added handicap of a provision in the agreement that no action can be taken save by unanimous vote. The sooner a peace treaty is written which really settles boundaries and assigns responsibilities to the various victorious nations, the sooner we shall get on with the job.

6. I believe there are some patent conflicts in the Potsdam Declaration and later orders governing the operation of the occupying forces in Germany. Until these conflicts are straightened out there can be no constructive effort made toward a permanent solution of the German problem.

7. I believe that the Germans, as a whole, are entirely unrepentant. They are sorry that they lost the war, but not sorry they started it. They blame Hitler very easily, but not themselves.

8. The active Nazis, both those who are evil enough to be tried individually at Nuremberg and the lesser satellites in the party, such as storm troopers, are beyond redemption. I have seen 20,000 of them at a stockade at Dachau.

I had some experience in a police court in my earlier days, studying criminal physiognomy. I would lay all the money I have against a dime with a hole in it that you can never reform these men. They have bloodlust in their hearts and minds. They will have to be incarcerated the rest of their lives, and that will be a long time, because many of them are still in the late teens and early twenties.

9. I believe that the food problem may turn out to be the most critical issue of all. I saw no actual starvation, but there is a great deal of human misery before the victims actually fall over dead on the street or hunt a hole to die. On a calory intake of 1,255, the present German ration in the American-occupied zone, one can live, but not enjoy life. One can drag himself about but not work productively.

I believe we should give the Germans as much as is necessary to prevent starvation, and also, to prevent them falling into the hands of the Communists, but not one ounce more. Let us rather give our surplus food, if any, to our late allies, who are in dire need of it.

RUSSIANS NOT COOPERATING

10. I believe the Russian problem is paramount in Europe. Everywhere one turns he finds that our commanding officers in the various zones, regions, and even county and municipal governments, have to keep an eye on the Russians. Everything we do has to be measured a little bit by its effect on the ever-present Russian influence in Europe. And the Russians are not cooperating, not one single whit, with the other occupying powers in Germany. They are running their own show blithely and confidently and sometimes in an openly insulting manner.

My hope is that we will develop firmness along with patience, because another war now would be fatal, and, equally, the absorption of all central Europe into the Soviet Socialist Republics would be fatal. It is a job calling for precise judgment. At best it is like walking a tightrope.

11. It is my firm opinion that if we had as much leadership at the top level, which means in the President's office, as we have had on the level of the commanding generals and the heads of the civil administration in Germany, we should have been very much farther along with the job, and I am rather resentful that we have tossed into the maelstrom of Europe some of our best blood and brains in a military and political way and have not given them sufficient backing in Washington either in money and men or in general instructions as to the kind of peace America really wants enforced on the Germans.

Progress in Development of Prosthetic Appliances

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 15, 1946.

MY DEAR MRS. ROGERS: Through the kindness of Judge Patterson, Secretary of War, I had the opportunity to attend the July meeting of the Committee on Prosthetic Devices. The meeting consisted of two sessions: a symposium in San Francisco and a visit to the Northrop Prosthesis Laboratory in Los Angeles. This letter is a brief report on my observations.

I was tremendously thrilled and inspired by what I saw and heard. At the San Francisco symposium I saw the artificial arm developed by Northrop, which unquestionably is the best device of its kind in existence today. It weights about 2 pounds, with the hook; has an automatic elbow locking mechanism; and is a great advance over existing artificial arms. It is already being distributed to Army amputees and a project has been initiated under which the United Drug Co. will undertake the marketing of these devices at cost to all Army amputees, civilian as well as military. Northrop also has begun work on a mechanical hand to replace the unsightly hook. This is still in the early stages but on the basis of the outstanding results already achieved by the company I am sure that in the not-to-distant future they will produce an efficient and practical artificial hand.

Northrop also has developed an artificial leg with a suction mechanism. This mechanism is a German device. The Germans have been using a suction leg for some 10 years. Northrop is now applying it to American climatic conditions and, on the basis of its preliminary experiments, is confident that it can produce a workable suction leg in a relatively short time. The advantages of such a prosthesis are obvious. It would eliminate the cumbersome and trying harness now necessary and be a great boon to the leg amputee.

In addition, several other concerns, working under contracts from the committee, have made considerable progress in developing a self-locking knee. Northrop has a device of this kind already in use by "test pilots" with very good results. There is no reason why, in the next 12 months, these projects should not develop a reliable and practical self-locking knee. This device, combined with the suction mechanism, should give the leg amputee an artificial limb that would be a tremendous advance on anything now in existence.

The most exciting and stirring demonstration at the meeting was an electrical arm produced by International Business Machines Corp. This was only a mock-up model, actually only a few days old. That is, it was completed only a few days before the meeting. It is still only a promise. But it is a tangible promise that bears every hope of full realization in a matter of a year or so.

The basic essentials of this device, the motor and batteries, are available. The problem now is merely of developing the prosthesis to the point where it is durable and can be produced in quantity at a reasonable cost. The model weighed about 4 pounds and the engineers were confident that they could bring this down to 3 pounds. The whole mechanism is revolutionary in design and operation. Instead of hanging on the stump, it rests on a cradle that extends from a belt around the waist. This not only eliminates the onerous feature of dead weight hanging from a stump, but also gives the wearer complete freedom of shoulder movement.

The committee also has a number of studies under way. One on the basic motions of the leg by the University of California, and another by UCLA on the arm and hand. These studies already have been extremely useful to the contractors and I am sure will be increasingly so as they develop new facts and data.

All in all, as I said, I was tremendously inspired and heartened by what I saw and learned. I have every confidence that if this research and development work is continued without hitch for another year or so that truly modern and scientific prostheses will be evolved. The important thing now is continuity; that is to insure that the work of the committee is continued without hitch or impairment. That is the crux of the whole situation and that is the thing on which everyone interested in this field must concentrate at this time. I have made a few recommendations to Judge Patterson toward this end and I have every belief that these suggestions will be instituted. They call for no radical departures but are implementations which members of the committee feel would greatly assist their work.

With warmest personal regards.

Sincerely,

ROBERT S. ALLEN.

Benefits for Disabled Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, wars are waste; wars are costly. The waste of material is the least of these. The waste of manpower in broken bodies and shattered nerves is beyond comprehension. Combat disabilities, ranging from slight to the most crippling imaginable, in World War II, numbered 670,584. Other disabilities as the result of service cannot yet be computed, however recent figures show about 3,395,000 veterans have filed claims for service-connected disability benefits.

The cost of caring for and rehabilitating these veterans is but an additional cost of war.

Although an appreciative Government has endeavored to provide for the readjustment of returning veterans to civilian activities and for the rehabilitation of the men who have returned from war broken in body, and to care for those who have become disabled, it can never adequately pay these men for all they have gone through.

The benefits to which these disabled veterans are entitled are many, including:

HOSPITALIZATION

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to furnish domiciliary and hospital care, including needed medical treatment, within the limit of its facilities, to persons discharged or released from service under conditions other than dishonorable who have served in our armed forces.

If hospitalization is required for some condition not due to service, the veteran can be admitted only when the veteran is unable to provide this care for himself and when bed space is available—the service-connected cases, as they should, come first.

Out-patient treatment, medical or dental, including necessary medicines, prosthetic appliances, and other supplies, may be authorized for a service-connected disability, if requested and, if advisable, by your own doctor.

If you need hospitalization contact personally or through a veterans' organization service officer, the regional office of the Veterans' Administration serving your county.

COMPENSATION (FOR SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITIES)

The basic rates of compensation allowable range from $10 monthly for a 10-percent disability, to $100 for total disability, established as due to service, or 75 percent of this basic rate for disability presumed, but not proved, to be the result of service. The basic awards were increased by 15 percent in 1944, and these allowances have been further increased by 20 percent by recent legislation. The new rates will range from $13.80 to $138.

There are also special statutory rates for stated disabilities, such as loss of hands, loss of feet, or blindness, in several combinations, providing combined benefits as high as $300 per month. The percentage increases mentioned above do not apply to these special statutory awards.

PENSION FOR NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITIES

A pension of $50 per month is allowed for a permanent and total disability not the result of nor connected with military service and not due to misconduct, increased to $60 if the veteran has been rated permanent and total and has received the pension continuously for 10 years, or when he reaches the age of 65 years.

To be eligible for this benefit, the veteran must have served 90 days during the period of the war, or have been discharged for a disability incurred in service. This pension is not payable if the veteran is unmarried and has an income in excess of $1,000 a year, or, if married or has minor children, has an income in excess of $2,500.

BLIND

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to provide seeing-eye or guide dogs for the aid of blind veterans entitled to disability compensation, and to provide mechanical and electronic equipment to aid such veterans in overcoming the handicap of blindness.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

At the time the Servicemen's Readjustment Act was amended, Public Law 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, which relates solely to veterans with service-connected disabilities, was liberalized. Veterans with service-connected disabilities, to whom we owe our greatest obligations, are given training and education to help them overcome physical handicaps and enable them to become self-supporting.

This is in no way related to the provisions under the GI bill. Eligibility requirements are—

(A) Active military or naval service at any time on or after September 16, 1940, and prior to the termination of World War II.

(B) Discharge or release from active service under conditions other than dishonorable.

(C) Service-connected compensable disability due to World War II service.

(D) Vocational handicap due to such disability.

(E) Need for vocational rehabilitation to overcome such handicap.

No training course longer than 4 years will be approved, and no training will be available beyond 6 years after the termination of World War II.

While in training, and for 2 months after it has been determined the veteran is ready to take employment, each veteran will receive allowances, including compensation, of not less than the following:

Disabled person with no dependents, per month	$105
Disabled person with wife but no child, per month	115
Disabled person with wife and 1 child, per month, with $7 more for each additional child	125

If the disabled person has dependent parents, he will be allowed $15 per month additional for each parent during this training period.

If pension or retirement payments exceed these rates, the pension or retirement will be paid in lieu of training pay.

If the trainee receives wages while in on-the-job training, payments from the Government may be reduced, but not below the pension or retirement pay to which he is entitled.

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to advance not more than $100 to persons commencing vocational rehabilitation courses, to be paid back without interest by deductions from future payments of pension or retirement pay.

An injury or aggravation of an injury suffered as a result of training which results in additional disability or death will be compensated on the same basis as disability or death incurred in war service. Application for this benefit must be made within 2 years after the injury.

This condensed summary of necessity leaves out many details regarding which there may be questions. Help in answering them may be had from the service officers of veterans' organizations, or the Red Cross. Inquiries may be addressed to Congressman ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., who will be glad to be of assistance in matters relating to claims and any questions which may arise.

Government Preaches Private Economy, Practices Public Extravagance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Advertiser-Review of July 11, 1946:

GOVERNMENT PREACHES PRIVATE ECONOMY, PRACTICES PUBLIC EXTRAVAGANCE

President Truman has stated that the present policy of our Federal Government is "to avoid nonessential expenditures." Our Secretary of the Treasury and other high officials deplore the present tendency toward private extravagance because of its encouragement of inflation.

Yet we are presented with a Federal budget for the present fiscal year of $35,100,000,000, which would leave a deficit of $3,600,000,000 over the Nation's estimated revenues.

The budget includes a spending proposal of more than $1,000,000,000 for war agencies though as of April of this year nine war agencies had been abolished and only two new ones created. Apparently the larger of the old war agencies expect to continue to employ the same volume of personnel as in the war years when their activities were much higher than is possible in these postwar days. Few of Uncle Sam's taxpayers can see any need for continuance of such war agencies budgets in peacetime.

Another item in the budget is a spending proposal of $1,000,000,000 for Federal public works—the largest public works program ever proposed by the Federal Government. The reason given for this bit of Federal extravagance is the President's statement on April 11, "The public works program has been delayed owing to shortages of materials and difficulty of placing contracts."

This public works program is almost twice that of the big budget of prewar years when there was a surplus of labor and materials. It is now offered in the face of the worst shortage of manpower and materials the Nation has ever known and of itself aggravates the inflationary tendencies that unsettle the whole economic structure, making it dangerous for construction firms to enter into contracts. A conservative estimate is that not more than from a half to three-fourths of such a program will be completed within the year.

Then there is the proposal to spend another $4,500,000,000 for expansion of Federal Government functions, most of which are merely described as "too numerous to identify." In other words, most of the $4,500,000,000 is just a blank check to be given by the taxpayers to they-don't-know-who to be spent for they-don't-know-what. Probably to propagate more bureaucracy.

With these examples of proposed loose spending of billions by our Federal Government, it seems very probable that a fairly close pruning of a total $35,100,000,000 could save enough to cover the $3,600,000,000 of deficit and the Nation's finances established on a sound basis. The inflationary trend cannot be stopped until such a basis is established, as the issuance of billions of Government bonds, especially by sale to the banks, always promotes inflation.

If our Federal Government will set an example of economy by discontinuing a lot of useless paper work and expansion of useless Government functions, President Truman will find most of the Nation's citizenery more ready to heed his advice "to avoid nonessential expenditures" and thus put a stronger brake on inflation. (Joe Liggett.)

Congress Cannot Administer the Laws It Passes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, never before in the history of our Nation have so many important and controversial issues come before Congress as in the past several years.

Seldom has a day gone by without the Government telling us of some kind of emergency, even if it has to be created by bureaucratic action, and these announcements are invariably followed by a request for some new Government bureau.

Then when the new bureau is set up and begins to function, it usually creates another emergency for which another bureau is asked; and so it goes, on and on, getting worse all the time. All this requires additional Government spending and greatly adds to the sum total of Government employees.

Governmental policies governing some matters, and the lack of policy as to others, have produced a great difference of opinion and has lead to heated arguments. However, it would be well if everyone would realize that name calling will not solve our problems and that the practice of high Government officials of arraying class against class should be stopped or we will have a real serious situation on hand. Loose spoken words or a display of temper does not change facts or solve problems.

Most of our problems and difficulties have been caused by unwise governmental actions and policies; by the New Deal philosophy of a planned economy and Government control of everything and everybody.

Recently I received a letter which contained the following: "Why does Congress permit the present conditions to exist? Why does not Congress reduce the number of Government employees and give us some economy before we go bankrupt?"

These are pertinent questions and should be answered.

We have three separate departments of Government: the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Each has its function to perform. The legislative to pass laws, the executive to administer the laws, and the judiciary to interpret and enforce the laws.

Congress cannot administer the laws it passes; the administration of these laws is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the executive branch of the Government. When Congress passes a law the President appoints those who administer it.

The House of Representatives cannot say, nor do anything regarding those so appointed. In some instances the Senate must confirm the ones appointed to head the agency, but once the head of the agency is confirmed by the Senate then even the Senate has nothing further to say.

The head of the agency then employs the agency's entire personnel without either branch of Congress having a word to say about it.

Recently Congress thought some of the agencies had employees in high places that were not qualified, and who for several reasons, including activities in or leanings toward subversive organizations, should not be employed by the Government. Congress so stated in the bill making appropriations for those agencies. The matter was taken to court and the court rendered a decision holding that Congress has no authority in the matter. The hands of Congress are completely tied insofar as determining who shall administer the laws passed by Congress.

Therefore, the sole responsibilty for the ways the various Government departments, boards, bureaus, and agencies interpret and administer the laws rests entirely upon the executive branch of the Government.

My correspondent asks, "Why doesn't Congress reduce the number of Government employees and give us some economy before we go bankrupt?

Congress could do this if the majority in Congress wanted to do it, because Congress must appropriate the money to pay all Government employees, and by withholding appropriations could force a reduction in the number of employees, and could force economy. However, Congress can act only by a majority vote, and in order to force a reduction of Government employees, it requires that a majority in both branches of Congress favor this action and pass legislation accordingly. We of the minority who would like to have economy in government are unable to force this economy, because there are not enough of us. We do not have a majority.

The cost of government and the number of Government employees are going up rather than down. In January of this year 31 Government agencies had a net increase of 34,569 additional employees and President Truman has asked for 125,000 additional Government employees at an additional cost of $232,000,000, for the fiscal year 1947, which began on July 1, 1946, and his majority in Congress have given him practically everything he asked for.

There has been considerable propaganda circulated against Congress, mostly instigated by the publicity and propaganda employees of various Government agencies in an effort to put the blame on Congress for the inefficiency and maladministration of these agencies. This propaganda is probably engendered because of efforts of many in Congress to get efficiency and in order to cover up for the agency's own inefficiency. They want to make Congress the whipping boy, but the fact is they are only whipping their own supporters. When they attack Congress they are, in fact, attacking only their own majority in Congress and not we members of the minority who have opposed all this Government waste, extravagance, and inefficiency.

The Surplus Property Disposal Agency furnishes a good example of inefficiency. Congress passed laws setting up the Surplus Property Agency and providing for fair and equitable sales of surplus property and giving our veterans preferences in the purchase of surplus property. The President appointed the head of this Agency, who in turn has selected the employees and they are administering the law. This Agency as well as most governmental agencies has done a miserable job of administering the law. Just ask any veteran what success he has had in his attempts to get the preference that Congress provided for him, or, talk to anyone who is not on the inside, or not one of the favored few, and ask about the success he has had in attempts to purchase any of this surplus property. I know of the sad experience many people of my district have had in their attempts to purchase surplus property.

Many Members of Congress have vigorously protested against the actions of the Surplus Property Disposal Agency but our protests fall on deaf ears. These agencies are selling surplus property when, and to whom, they wish and in many, many instances are giving the veterans, as well as other citizens, the old familiar run-around.

A few days ago the press carried the old familiar story that the President was asking for economy. This story of wanting economy comes with poor grace, in view of the President's actions. As Al Smith said, "Let's look at the record." Let us see what the President actually asked for for the fiscal year 1947 which began July 1, 1946.

The President asked for an appropriation of $4,000 to buy a new automobile for the Vice President. The main difficulty with this request is that we do not have a Vice President and will not have one until January 1949.

The President asked Congress to make increased appropriations for almost every Government department. I shall take time to mention only a few examples. He asked that the Interior Department appropriation be increased $49,146,013; that the Fish and Wildlife Service be increased $4,869,000. He asked for a total of 45,788 employees for purely publicity and propaganda purposes at a cost of $252,000,000; for appropriations to keep 29 different agencies lending money; 3 different agencies insuring deposits; 34 agencies buying land; 16 agencies in wildlife preservation; 10 agencies in Federal construction; 12 agencies in home and community planning; 10 agencies dealing in materials and construction; 28 agencies in welfare matters; 9 agencies in credit and finance; 4 agencies in bank examination; and 65 agencies gathering statistics.

The President asked that the appropriation for the office of Secretary of Commerce, Henry Wallace, be raised from the previous high of $2,467,000 to $7,685,000, an increase of 300 percent. He asked that the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which had a previous high of $5,334,000 when it had agents all over the world, which it does not now have, be raised to $11,670,000 which is an increase of more than 400 percent above the amount this same Bureau has had in any year since 1941.

He asked that $33,500,000 be appropriated for the Bureau of the Census. This is approximately 300 percent more than was appropriated for this agency in each of the two preceding years and is $11,400,000 more than was given this agency in 1940, the year of the last decennial census, when every resident of the United States was counted.

He asked for an increase for the Department of Commerce from $34,524,000 for the last prewar year to $163,336,000 for the fiscal year 1947. He asked for other increases, some of which are:

The White House office salaries and expenses from $312,533 in 1946 to $833,600 for 1947, an increase of $571,072; Bureau of the Budget an increase of $403,523; Civil Service Commission $2,136,618 an increase for salaries and expenses alone; Federal Communications Commission an increase of $187,000; Federal Trade Commission an increase of $197,287; Federal Works Agency an increase of $3,109,575; Public Roads Administration an increase of $159,838,792; General Accounting Office an increase of $3,149,220; Interstate Commerce Commission an increase of $1,426,662; National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics an increase of $3,658,607; Security and Exchange Commission an increase of $527,500 and the Tariff Commission an increase of $151,590.

For years we have heard plenty of talk about economy in Government but every action of the New Deal has been to increase expenditures and multiply waste and inefficiency.

The following shows the amount of Federal expenditures, receipts, deficits and increases in the national debt from 1932 through the fiscal year 1946:

Fiscal year	Net receipts [1]	Total expenditures, including debt retirements	Excess of expenditures over receipts	Public debt outstanding at end of year [2]

1946	43,037,798,808	65,018,631,990	21,980,833,182	269,422,099,173

[1] Excludes transfers to Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund.
[2] The annual expansion is unrelated to receipts and expenditures indicated in other columns, because public-debt transactions are independently handled and accounted for.
NOTE.—Figures in columns 1, 2, and 4 taken from Treasury Department statements.

After 14 years of New Deal waste, extravagance, mismanagement, inefficiency, and planned economy it must be apparent that we will not have economy and efficiency in government as long as the New Deal has a majority in Congress.

Increased Production Costs of Rice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY D. LARCADE, JR.
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. LARCADE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an article entitled "Louisiana State Rice Farmers Face Increased Production Cost," by Dr. J. Norman Efferson, agricultural economist of the Louisiana State University agricultural experiment station, dated at Baton Rouge, La., July 13, 1946, and carried in the New Orleans Times-Picayune, as follows:

STATE RICE FARMERS FACE INCREASED PRODUCTION COST

BATON ROUGE, LA., July 13.—Increased production costs have placed many Louisiana rice farmers in a precarious financial position, with the result that one bad year, which may come in the near future, would cause wholesale distress and conditions in the rice area similar to those of 1933, warns Dr. J. Norman Efferson, agricultural economist of the Louisiana State university agricultural experiment station.

Rice farmers as a whole, he says, made profits of 37 cents a barrel in 1941 and 41 cents in 1942 but lost 24 cents a barrel in 1943, 84 cents in 1944, and $1.07 in 1945 and face an expected loss of $1.88 a barrel this year if the average price of $6.30 a barrel received by farmers last year is maintained for the 1946 crop.

He based his computations on all costs of production, including a charge for all labor, whether hired or not, at the rate it cost or would have cost to hire such labor. The practice of assessing a charge against all labor expended, the economist explained, "is based on the assumption that the farmer is worth as much working for himself as he would be if he hired out to his neighbor to do the same work."

"When all labor costs were omitted, however," he says, "the return for labor—which represents what the rice farmer earned for his work—averaged 25 cents an hour in 1941, 31 cents in 1942, 24 cents in 1943, 29 cents in 1944, and 28 cents in 1945, and is expected to be about 18 cents an hour in 1946.

"The final result for 1945 is that rice farmers in the State earned 28 cents an hour for each hour of labor worked on the enterprise, while they paid 50 cents an hour for hired labor used in planting and growing the crop and 63 cents an hour for hired labor used in all harvesting operations. For 1946, the indicated earning of 18 cents an hour, based on the average price received for rice in 1945, compares with an expected labor cost of 60 to 70 cents an hour.

"The average return to farmers per hour of labor from rice production in Louisiana was about the same in 1945 as in 1941, while costs of living doubled during the same period. As a result, rice farmers have reduced their standard of living to some extent but also have impaired their working and long-time capital to the point where one bad year, which may come in the near future, would cause wholesale distress and conditions similar to 1933."

These conclusions were based on studies made by the LSU agricultural experiment station of costs and returns from rice production in Louisiana. Detailed records were obtained from 147 representative rice farmers last year, and a brief resurvey was made of those farmers two months ago to obtain later changes and estimates on probable 1946 costs. Eighty-nine of these 147 producers operated on the share-rent basis used on two-thirds of Louisiana's rice acreage.

The study showed that total rice production costs per acre increased nine percent from 1944 to 1945, and are expected to be eight percent higher in 1946 than in 1945.

Costs per hour of labor hired to produce rice increased more than 300 percent from 1941 to 1945, according to Dr. Efferson, and in addition, cash costs for seed, fertilizer, fuel, oil, repairs to machinery and equipment, and similar expenses have materially increased over the period.

Hope Burns Eternal in the Human Breast

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVE
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, a constituent of mine who is blind, Mr. Al Gene Aker, expresses hope and faith in the future of this troubled world in a few lines of poetry.

Hope for peace and understanding seems to be the paramount issue in the world today. With all of our experts, our statesmen, our diplomats, we grope in the dark with our eyes wide open. We see the things we should do, but it seems impossible to do them.

Perhaps we do not have the faith necessary to fortify our vision. Perhaps these few lines from a blind man may help us to see our task better, and help us accomplish an objective to bring peace and understanding to those we represent.

THE WORLD NEEDS
(By Gene Aker)

The world needs a new balance wheel
That every one will readily agree.
To keep life on an even keel
For the sake of all humanity.

So one could travel throughout the land,
Without fear, hatred, or greed.
Knowing that each other would understand,
Regardless of color, race, or creed.

Thus a new era would be born,
And banish forever from this earth
The mask of hatred would be torn,
Bringing peace, happiness, prosperity, and mirth.

Is Our Government Going To Destroy the Future Economic Welfare of the Rice Industry?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. L. MENDEL RIVERS
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, Frank A. Godchaux is one of the accepted leaders of the rice industry and one of the world's authorities on this subject.

Under date of June 25, 1946, Mr. Godchaux made a statement which the Nation should know. Under leave to extend my remarks, I am enclosing this statement because of its value to the American people generally.

Authorities in Washington have now had several years of experience in trying to control the price and the distribution of the United States rice crop by Government order. They have established ceilings on rough and clean rice prices and they tell the millers where they can sell their output. They have up to now acted contrary to the recommendations made by the members of the Rice Industry Advisory Committee.

One result has been that Blue Rose rice with a mill ceiling of $6.50 per hundred pounds in bulk is now retailing in some sections of the country at as high as $30 per hundred when the maximum retail price based on the mill ceiling should not be more than $12 or $13 per hundred even in package form. Black markets in long grain are being operated in proportion.

Another result which seems to have been entirely overlooked by Washington authorities has been that the American public is now forced to turn to other foods than rice. Those interested in the rice industry have been working for years toward increasing the per capita consumption of rice in the United States. Naturally, whatever progress has been made toward this end is now being lost. We get numerous letters from all over the United States from institutions, hospitals, individuals who have been placed on rice diets by doctors' orders, and many others who just plain like rice and can't get it.

Dietary habits change slowly—it is not surprising that in the heavy rice eating sections of this country buying pressure is so strong that black-market operators can get almost any price they ask for rice, thus making it highly profitable to those who are inclined to evade Government price regulations, and it is obvious that the experience of the past year or two has served as only a rehearsal for full-scale evasion during the coming season unless some change is made in Government regulations and/or enforcement machinery. This will mean that the rice program will break down completely, and industry leadership will be shifted from the efficient to the unscrupulous.

It is surprising that apparently no one in authority in Washington has thought of adopting a rice program that would remove the profit and the incentive from price evasion. It would be a simple matter to make the black market in rice unprofitable. We now produce more than twice as much rice as we consume in this country. If it were known that the domestic trade would be allowed to purchase whatever rice it needs from the coming crop, buying pressure would be removed, and there would be no incentive for speculators to obtain rice at above ceiling prices by underhanded methods.

We should likewise allocate an ample supply of American-grown rice to our only remaining natural Western Hemisphere markets in Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Hawaiian and the Virgin Islands. If and when it is necessary, these off-shore shipments could be controlled by licensing. Ample allocations to these markets would make it unnecessary and unprofitable for buyers to offer secret premiums. Orderly merchandising in these markets would go far toward retaining them as customers when conditions are normal and when we will need them badly.

The authorities in Washington seem to think it is necessary to cut down on our continental rice consumption order to obtain food for export to the Far East. They don't seem to realize that whatever rice is retained for use in this country will release an equivalent amount of some other food. Since 95 percent of the world's rice production is in the Far East, and since they are normally heavy exporters of rice, it is obvious that we could never hope to create a regular demand for United States grown rice in that part of the world, but we could hope to create a demand for other good food commodities which we might supply them at this time in the place of rice.

We get daily reports from sources that are supposed to be reliable, showing very unfortunate mishandling of the food-supply situation in the Far East. According to this information, it is believed that in Siam alone there are hoards of old rice amounting to, at least, 1,000,000 tons. Rice experts are convinced that there are also hoards of between one million and two million tons now in the interior of Burma. Placing these estimates at the minimum of 2,000,000 tons would mean that they now have approximately 45,000,000 pockets of exportable rice in rice-producing areas of the Far East. Until recently Great Britain was supposed to get all of Siam's surplus rice on a reparation basis at no cost to Great Britain, and even now the highest price we have seen offered by Britain for these Oriental rice surpluses is approximately $2.28 per 100 pounds.

It seems unbelievable that the United States Government is paying more than $8 per 100 pounds for rice grown in this country to be shipped half way around the world at tremendous additional transportation costs, and that even on the basis of these prices they have moved during the season now closing less than 5,000,000 pockets when all reports indicate that they have around 45,000,000 pockets of rice in hiding in the same areas that our Government is trying to serve.

This policy seems even more unbelievable after reading in the Washington Daily Reporter System of June 17 that "The continued practice of using rice for fuel in Siam has contributed to the slowness of getting Siamese rice out to needy neighboring nations." If our Government and Great Britain would offer a reasonable price for this local rice, and if they would offer these Orientals the machinery, tools, and other goods they want all this rice would be available, and it would not be necessary for us to pay four or five times as much for our rice as they now offer for the local rice.

Another result would be that our own rice would be released for the domestic market and for natural Western Hemisphere markets, which would automatically eliminate black markets in rice and would at the same time be cultivating our domestic rice consumption and our natural markets, so that we would have a ready outlet for our rice surpluses when conditions are normal again. This policy would help our economy now and for future years, and our friends in the Orient would also be better served.

Or will the Government aid the industry by:

First. Allocating sufficient supplies for the domestic market?

Second. Supplying natural Western Hemisphere markets in Cuba, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, and the Virgin Islands?

Third, and last. Exporting remaining surplus to foreign markets?

Then the economic welfare of the rice-producing sections of the United States will prosper and not be destroyed when the country becomes normal again.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK A. GODCHAUX.

British Tyranny in Palestine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY M. JACKSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following press releases in connection with the recent incidents in Palestine. The first release contains the views of the President given at the White House on July 2 and the second release was given out July 2 by the American members of the Executive of the Jewish Agency for Palestine.

WHITE HOUSE RELEASE, JULY 2, 1946

The President conferred today with the following American members of the Executive of the Jewish Agency for Palestine Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Dr. Nahum Goldmann, Mr. Louis Lipsky, and Rabbi Abba H. Silver.

The representatives of the Jewish Agency gave the President their views of recent events in Palestine.

The President expressed his regret at these developments in Palestine. He informed the representatives of the Jewish Agency that the Government of the United States had not been consulted on these measures prior to their adoption by the British Government. He expressed the hope that the leaders of the Jewish community in Palestine would soon be released and that the situation would soon return to normal.

The President added further than it was his determination that these most recent events should mean no delay in pushing forward with a policy of transferring 100,000 Jewish immigrants to Palestine with all dispatch, in accordance with the statement he made upon the receipt of the report of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry. The President indicated that the Government of the United States was prepared to assume technical and financial responsibility for the transportation of these immigrants from Europe to Palestine.

He expressed his thanks for the workmanlike suggestions embodied in the letter which the American members of the Jewish Agency Executive sent him on June 14 with respect to the technical and financial problems involved in the transfer and resettlemen. of the 100,000 immigrants.

JEWISH AGENCY FOR PALESTINE RELEASE

JULY 2, 1946.—As the American members of the Executive of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, some of whose members have been arrested in Palestine, we called upon the President of the United States to express our deep sorrow and indignation. We deplored the unwarranted attack upon the entire Jewish population of Palestine and its leaders. We expressed our amazement at the fact that while negotiations were being conducted by the representatives of the American and British Governments to implement the unanimous recommendation of the Anglo-American Joint Committee on Palestine to transfer immediately 100,000 Jews to Palestine, these acts of brutal aggression were perpetrated by the British Government. We appealed to the President to intervene in this situation of utmost gravity which is disrupting the life of the entire country and which may destroy generations of labor and achievement of the Jewish pioneers and builders in Palestine. The President expressed his great anxiety about recent events in Palestine which occurred without his knowledge or consent. He reiterated his earnest hope that the 100,000 displaced Jews in Europe, on whose behalf he intervened nearly a year ago, would be admitted without further delays and without waiting for decisions on long-range policies concerning Palestine. The President expressed his gratification with the constructive proposals which were submitted to him by the Jewish Agency touching the rapid and effective absorption of these immigrants.

We, the representatives of the Jewish Agency in the United States, voice our gratitude to the President for the initiative which he took in the matter of the 100,000 Jewish refugees to Palestine and for his firm determination to see the thing through.

NAHUM GOLDMANN.
LOUIS LIPSKY.
ABBA HILLEL SILVER.
STEPHEN S. WISE.

These statements indicate sufficiently the gravity of recent British acts in Palestine. What has happened there cannot be explained away as police action by a government intent on upholding law and order. As a matter of fact, British rule over Palestine has lost any trace of legitimacy long ago, certainly since May 17, 1939, on which date a white paper was issued in London defining a future British policy in that country. The white paper clearly violated fundamental provisions of the Mandate for Palestine. Whatever Britain does in Palestine contrary to the Mandate, she does not do as a legitimate government, but as an arbitrary tyrannical power ruling by force alone.

When confronted with tyrannical government which departs from the law, citizens have not only the right but also the obligation to resist such a government, if necessary with arms in their hands. This is no novel theory. This is the doctrine of our own Declaration of Independence. It is also the doctrine which prevails in the history of the world. Tyranny breeds resistance. Tyranny justifies resistance.

The arrest of the leaders of the Jewish Agency for Palestine was a particularly brazen instance of British arbitrary rule in that country. The Jewish Agency for Palestine is recognized as a public body with well-defined functions of directing Jewish colonization, and the British Government is directed to cooperate with the Jewish Agency. The same Mandate for Palestine which entrusts Great Britain with certain functions in that country entrusts the Jewish Agency with other functions. If the Mandate is still valid, the British have no right to interfere with the functioning of the Jewish Agency. If the Mandate is no longer valid, then what are the British doing in Palestine anyhow?

Not only have the British arrested members of the executive of the Jewish Agency in Palestine, but they have also refused visas to two eminent American citizens who are also members of the executive of the Jewish Agency and who wanted to go to Palestine to take the place of those arrested—Rabbi Stephen S. Wise and Mr. Louis Lipsky. By thus refusing visas to members of the executive of the Jewish Agency, the British Government has clearly interferred with the functioning of that institution and has added one more example of brazen disregard for its international obligations to the many examples offered previously.

Human Rights and the Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there recently appeared in Life magazine an address by Justice Edward S. Dore, of the New York Supreme Court, on Human Rights and the Law. What he has said has had the attention of philosophers down through the ages.

Our Nation was founded on the idea of the supremacy of law. It will be remembered that Edmund Burke said:

> There is but one law for all; namely, that law which governs all law, the law of our Creator, the law of humanity, justice, equity, the law of nature and of nations.

It was of that law that Paul spoke when he said:

> Love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore, love is the fulfilling of the law.

When the peoples of earth are filled with this concept, then the moral law will be vitalized and the physical powers of men will be restrained.

I ask that this article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, and suggest to my colleagues that they take time to read it.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE LAW

(An address by Justice Edward S. Dore reminding us that America is founded on the concept of natural law: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights.")

In Sophocles' great drama, Antigone, we see a young girl standing alone before Creon, tyrant of Thebes. He asks if she dared transgress his decree. Antigone answers:

"Yea—for not Zeus, I ween, proclaimed this thing;
Nor Justice, co-mate with the Nether Gods,
Not she ordained men such unnatural laws!
Nor deemed I that thine edict had such force,
That thou, who are but mortal, couldst o'erride
The unwritten and unswerving laws of Heaven,
Not of today and yesterday are they.
But from everlasting."

In his opening address before the International Tribunal at Nuremberg, Justice Robert H. Jackson, after outlining the defendants' organized crimes against humanity, asked:

"Must such wrongs either be ignored or redressed in hot blood? Is there no standard in the law for a deliberate and reasoned judgment on such conduct?

"The character of this tribunal evidences a faith that the law is not only to govern the conduct of little men, but that even rulers are, as Lord Chief Justice Coke put it to King James, 'under God and the law.'"

Nearly 25 centuries separate these two pronouncements in time. They both rest on the same ultimate basis in thought. Both affirm natural law, the objective order of right and wrong binding alike on ruler and ruled. Both affirm that law ultimately rests on morals and morals on God. Ideas behind that basis of law I will endeavor to discuss.

That we deal with ideas does not make our discussion impractical. Ideas do direct human life. All inventions are in their origin mere ideas—ideas about reality. So are governments. It was an idea in the mind of a few great men in the Colonies that made the precious thing we call America. For the protection of our lives, our liberties, and our persons, America is primarily an idea and secondarily a sector of geography. If the same sector of geography were informed with the ideas of an oriental despotism, it would be just that and cease to be America.

Your right to liberty is secured by the writ of habeas corpus, but was not given you by the Habeas Corpus Act. Both rights are given you by a source of law more fundamental than any party or majority, as the Declaration of Independence proclaimed. And government itself is created primarily to secure—not to give—such rights. But if a sufficiently influential number of your fellow citizens can be brought to a frame of mind that denies natural right, the whole fabric of basic rights is in danger.

What Sophocles, writing about 450 B. C., had Antigone say to Creon did not die on Antigone's lips and only reappear on the lips of a modern jurist near the middle of the twentieth century anno Domini. Before Sophocles gave the idea the imperishable beauty of his own poetic form, it had been found and refound by man, and in every intervening generation it has persistently endured as a constant in man's legal and moral life.

Plato expressed the idea when he said that law was an expression not of God's will but of God's intellect and since our intellect is a spark of sovereign mind, intellect should have the sole share in the making of law.

Aristotle taught that it is of man's essence to be a free, rational, social being; that acts corresponding to man's essential nature are good, the opposite had, not because law makes them so but because nature does; and that law is therefore essentially reason, a rule of reason for rational beings.

Cicero, in his De Legibus, eloquently describes natural law as right reason:

"Of all these things respecting which learned men dispute there is none more important than clearly to understand that we are born for justice, and that right is founded not in opinion but in nature. There is, indeed, a true law, right reason, agreeing with nature and diffused among all, unchanging, everlasting. * * *".

Cicero's expression of this concept profoundly influenced law. To Justinian and thinkers throughout the Middle Ages jus naturale was a group of principles of reason and justice that men could rationally comprehend.

St. Thomas Aquinas, following Aristotle and all the major minds of the West, taught that law is "an ordinance of reason made for the common good"; that natural law is "divine law revealed through natural reason"—participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura; and that the need of man to conform to natural law is merely that he conform to his own nature as a rational being. The essence of his definition of law is reason.

Blackstone in his Commentaries (which nurtured Abraham Lincoln) thus speaks of this same natural law:

"Man, considered as a creature, must necessarily be subject to the laws of his Creator. * * * This law of nature, being coeval with mankind, and dictated by God himself, is of course superior in obligation to any other. It is binding over all the globe, in all countries, and at all times; no human laws are of any validity, if contrary to this; and such of them as are valid derive all their force, and all their authority, mediately or immediately, from this original."

As old as man, this concept of law became the formal and factual foundation of our own American system in both its origins and in its development.

In our origins the founding fathers proclaimed the source of our human rights and the basis of our law in a solemn declaration of principles and in an organic law giving effect to those principles. This is what they said in the declaration:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights. * * * That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

By that solemn declaration the men who made America rooted the ultimate defense of our human rights in a divine endowment. To them that truth was self-evident. The reference to just powers of government shows acceptance of natural law limitations proscribing arbitrary power in any form.

The Supreme Court of the United States, referring to the words quoted from the Declaration, has expressly held that the organic law of the land is "the body and letter," the Declaration "is the thought and the spirit, and it is always safe to read the letter of the Constitution in the spirit of the Declaration of Independence."

The greatest American jurists followed the founders in accepting natural law as the basis of positive law. Marshall, Chase, Story, Cooley, Kent, all relied on reason, natural law, and inalienable right to limit legislative power and thus protect minorities and human and property rights. The rule of reason and the idea that the makers of the Constitution never intended arbitrary power to exist in any department of government are natural law concepts. The rules of due care in negligence actions, fair competition in business relations, good faith in fiduciary relations, fair returns for public utilities, due process of law itself—all these are applications in our positive law of natural law, the rule of reason and moral principle, of justice as the aim and end of all law.

THE DUTY OF JUDGES

Herbert Spencer said that every slightest flash of light on the waves of the sunlit sea is controlled by law. Just as there is in the universe a physical order governed by physical law, so there is a moral order discernible by human reason and governed by moral law. Both derive from the same source, the Author of all natural constants.

In organized states natural law is largely outside the function of the judges. It is too important to be left merely to individual judicial application. It should be incorporated, as it happily is in our own system, into the organic law and the statutes. Thus the Bill of Rights in our Constitution is substantially an example of the practical application of natural law into the law of the land. The ordinary remedy for bad law is to repeal it. But when the case is not covered by rule or precedent, the court must apply the rule of reason or natural law and our American courts have never hesitated to do so. "What really matters," says Cardozo, "is that the judge is under a duty, within the limitations of his power of innovation, to maintain a relation between law and morals, between the precepts of jurisprudence and those of reason and good conscience."

This is the idea of law that Dean Pound calls "the oldest, longest continued, and most persistently enduring." But to realize its vital significance for our time we must contrast it with modern ideas of law that hitherto have had wide acceptance.

In one of Juvenal's satires we see a willful wife commanding her Roman husband to crucify a slave for no reason. When he asks why he should do so, she answers in a sentence that has become the classical expression of law as will: "Hoc volo; sic jubeo; sit pro ratione voluntas" ("This I will; thus I order; let my will be in place of reason"). What a depth of revealing meaning is packed into that little clause sit pro ratione voluntas. Those four words perfectly express any idea of law not based on reason but on will or force. And that, it must be admitted, is the dominant characteristic of modern ideas of law. Analytical jurisprudence, historical, sociological, and pragmatic jurisprudence all repudiate natural law and inalienable right. All essentially deny objective norms of right and wrong and substitute norms determined by the dominant group, those who have the power to act. All essentially deny reason as ultimate and substitute experience, or history, the pragmatic test, what works, the functional approach, the "is" philosophy of law.

In essence all such dogma denies law as reason and extols it as will. Now if law is based ultimately on general will instead of reason, there never can be an unjust law if the lawgiver has the power, that is, the physical force to carry out his will. This is equally true whether the lawgiver is an individual tyrant, a group, or a majority. If there be no standard of right and wrong binding alike on ruler and ruled, and no limitation on the power of the state itself over the community, law ultimately becomes mere number or physical force. That is the teaching of modern pragmatism. That is the practice of modern tyranny.

To take one example out of many, we are all aware of the inhuman decrees based not on reason but—of all things—on blood, race, and soil, enacted and enforced by the group dominant for a time not only in Germany but in almost all continental Europe. Himmler and Hitler then had the physical force to put their desired ends into effect. They did so as other modern tyrants have done, by purges, mass murders, concentration camps, deportation of millions, and diabolical cruelty almost unparalleled in human history.

We have seen in our own day, and not in one place only, this living will of aggression never satisfied with dominion or territory. It does not merely mean external aggression against other states, but also internal aggression against the state's own subjects. The state is no longer the limited, separate, governing thing allowing a large area to individual liberty; it tends to become coextensive with the community in all its aspects, it finally possesses man totally. The state is merged with the community and as class, race, or blood becomes the supreme end of human existence and effort.

No statutory, legal or constitutional, limits to power are recognized. An independent judiciary and courts are supplanted by mere administrative boards that become weapons for implementing state policy. The sphere of liberty outside the direct control of government becomes less and less. Man must not own; the state will own for him. Man must not think; the state will think for him and, to make sure of this, controls every avenue of information and propaganda. Man must not be free to select his vocation in life. The state will order our whole lives. Man must not worship God; the state is sole absolute. The last and worst consequences reveal themselves inevitably where the idea had its origin, namely, in the intellectual and spiritual life of men. The final end is a sort of mass consciousness; a mechanical, inhuman, servile mass organization that tends to be destructive of human liberty and personal responsibility.

General MacArthur, Supreme Allied Commander, when he spoke from the battleship Missouri at the scene of the Japanese surrender, accurately diagnosed the crisis of our age and its remedy when he said:

"The problem basically is theological and involves a spiritual recrudescence and improvement of human character that will synchronize with our almost matchless advance in science, art, literature, and all the material and cultural developments of the past 2,000 years. It must be of the spirit if we are to save the flesh."

One hopeful and encouraging sign was noted by Dean Pound when he recently said that "something like a resurrection of natural law is going on the world over" and that "philosophical jurisprudence which was all but extinct 50 years ago has revived and taken the lead in the present century."

A French philosopher has said that a nation must from time to time refresh itself in the well-springs of its own origins or it will perish. We should encourage further study of our own legal origins, of the men and the doctrines that made America, of the lives and works for example of John Adams, Hamilton, and James Wilson (one of Washington's first appointees to the Supreme Court), whose ideas derived from natural law had so much formative influence on the making of our whole system, and of others among the greatest of our American jurists who accepted natural law principles and used them in denying arbitrary power anywhere in our system of government.

NATURAL LAW FOR THE WORLD

Finally it is now clear that international law must be revived as the public order of the community of nations if civilization itself is to survive. With justice gone, states are what St. Augustine called them: "great bands of robbers"—"remota justitia, quid sunt regna nisi magna latrocinia."

John Foster Dulles, on his return from Europe last year, said:

"We are emerging from 6 years of war, during which morality and principle have increasingly been put aside in favor of military expediency. The war has now ended, and with that ending, principle and morality must be reestablished in the world. The United States ought to take a lead in that. * * * It devolves upon us to give leadership in restoring principle as a guide to conduct. If we do not do that, the world will not be worth living in. Indeed, it probably will be a world in which human beings cannot live. For we now know that this planet will, like others, become uninhabitable unless men subject their physical power to the restraints of moral law."

We must inaugurate study of the relation between natural law and international law adapted to the desperate needs of our times. No merely mechanical international arrangements or pieces of paper, though we pile them as high as the Himalayas, can secure enduring international order without the acceptance by men and nations of the objective existence of right and wrong in a natural law binding on all. In the one world that we have heard so much talk about, this is the first and most essential requisite but, alas, it is rarely discussed. Until such moral code is accepted by the nations, a stable basis for one world or international law does not exist. Of course, the code must be implemented by institutions. But the institutions must derive from the code and not violate its essence. Opas justitiae pax: peace is the fruit of justice, not of mere formula-seeking conferences and fragile pacts. In any event, only to such moral code thus accepted can we safely surrender any part of our own sovereignty.

The Peace Conference in Paris

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL
OF DELAWARE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter written on July 11 by Joseph M. Stack, commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, to the President of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS
OF THE UNITED STATES,
Kansas City, Mo., July 11, 1946.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: By long and tedious processes the heavy machinery of international diplomacy has at last set a date when twenty-one victorious nations, meeting in Paris, France, will devise the terms of peace for the conquered peoples of World War II. July 29, 1946 will be a date to associate with the beginning of peace negotiations in Versailles on January 12, 1919.

The peacemakers will do well to keep foremost in mind the manner and methods of the shaping of that other "peace." They should brood heavily upon the years that followed. They should review the inexorable deterioration of relations among nations, the steady crumbling of good will among men, that followed Versailles. With humility for the past and determination for the future, the peace conferees should harken again to the ominous howling during the 20's and 30's, ever louder, until at last the dogs of war were rampant once more and the world was aflame with a war that dwarfed all previous wars.

The people of our country, and beyond any doubt the peoples of all countries, want to see the highest order of minds and hearts and consciences at work in the framing of this second peace pattern in the brief span of 27 years. The heart's desires of the common men and women of all nations should permeate the atmosphere in that conference room in the "City of Light."

We fear that it shall not be so.

In the opinion of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, with a membership of more than 1,750,000 veterans of overseas service on foreign soil or in hostile waters—and the great majority of them are the winners of World War II—the combat veteran should have direct representation at the peace conference.

Who is better fitted than the survivors of the horrors of this war to speak at the table for peace? Who is more worthy? Who is more entitled? Who can better help to do a real job?

The Veterans of Foreign Wars started asking these questions before the end of hostilities. And at the Forty-sixth Annual Encampment which was held in Chicago last October a resolution was adopted urging that "our country be represented in part at the peace conference or conferences at the end of the present war by our patriotic soldiers and sailors who have actually bared their breasts to the enemy and are fully acquainted with war and all its tragedies."

It is therefore respectfully requested, Mr. President, that you use all your power and authority to arrange that at least one well-qualified veteran of World War II be included in the coming peace conference. It is urged that you, as a veteran of the first world conflict, and now the leader of the world's leading nation, leave no stone unturned to see that the voice of combat experience is heard at the peace table.

The veteran representative should be highly qualified in all respects, but his basic qualification should be a broad experience of battle and all the word-beggering horrors of war. He should be there to speak for the living veterans of World War II. He should make felt the presence—the pressing and demanding presence—of the ghosts of our finest manhood who gave their lives by thousands for our victory and for a just and lasting peace. They belong there. It is in a sense their conference. Let us honor them by representation.

Your careful consideration of our request will be deeply appreciated.

Respectfully yours,

JOSEPH M. STACK,
Commander in Chief.

Shed No Tears Over OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. STANFILL
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. STANFILL. Mr. President, a very interesting radio address, recently delivered over radio station WSAI by Ed Wimmer, editor of Forward America, seems to substantiate the contention made by some Senators that small business was suffering from maladministration of OPA regulations. Forward America is the voice of small business in southern Ohio and Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HAVE NO FEARS, SHED NO TEARS, OVER OPA, EDITOR SAYS

(Highlights from a radio talk by Ed Wimmer, editor of Forward America, delivered over Radio Station WSAI, June 29)

"So far the whole argument about price control has been too one-sided," Bowles said. And that includes the President's speech.

All we have had from OPA is cries of dire disaster if this or that Administrator did not get his way, and to get their way the heads of OPA have divided labor against capital; created an army of paid and unpaid snoopers; kept farmers, producers, and distributors in a permanent stew of red tape and bureaucratic controls, and during the past few months these self-glorified public saviors have actually succeeded in dividing the people against their own Congress.

The result is, a great giant that just finished the job of licking three mighty military powers, is now unable to produce a nickel hamburger, or put a shirt on its returned veteran and a roof over their heads.

The OPA approach to production and distribution has been to create endless bottlenecks that instead of keeping prices down, has kept production down. Small farmers and small businessmen have been wiped out by the thousands speeding up the trend to big business and big labor, making big government all the more powerful. Government paternalism under OPA has risen to new heights, causing millions of unthinking Americans to believe that upon Chester Bowles and OPA depended the future security of the whole world.

The whole structure of OPA has been built on a philosophy of fear and distrust of our competitive, free-enterprise system. Every problem has been approached with uncertainty and suspicion. Men without any experience in manufacturing were set to work writing endless directives and regulations, telling manufacturers how to produce, what to produce, and when to sell and at what. Formulas were set up. Orders changed and reversed so often, on everything from baby diapers to Pullman cars, that finally there were no diapers and the Pullmans were filled with businessmen, labor leaders, farmers, lobbyists, and consumers, all riding back and forth from Washington, fighting with each other or fighting for or against OPA. The 30,000,000 white-collar workers who have received few increases, have paid their share of the cost of this awful mess, yet they are hollering for OPA

OPA has not held prices down. What good is a ceiling on hamburger, shirts, or suits if you can't get them? Prices paid in subsidies, OPA overhead, and prices paid for substitute foods, poor quality goods, and the black market take is far greater than any savings realized. There is only one thing that reduces prices, that is a high level of production. You can't get production under a half-totalitarian system of controls, and that is what we have had. That is what OPA boosters are boosting for, but they don't know it.

The business community has taken the worst attack upon its integrity, ability, and initiative ever launched against any group in America. Government officials, labor leaders and so-called consumer leaders have gone up and down the land, accusing, snooping, and threatening, and doing all they could to beat to death the only system that has ever offered the people of any country a high degree of freedom and opportunity.

Right now there is a concerted attack upon the meat-packing industry. When Henderson set ceilings on packers but failed to set ceilings on livestock, I wrote both he and the President and said that nothing but chaos could result from such a procedure. OPA handling of the meat situation has produced empty meat cases and caused billions of pounds of offal and millions of hides to be buried by black-market operators, and untold losses by packers and workers.

Who could possibly believe that an industry never showing a profit in its history of more than 6 percent on its investment (small packers), and never before shut down to make exorbitant profits, should be doing so now. In all the years that you have known, you suppliers and retailers, how many do you know who have been able to buy yachts and big white mansions on hilltops, and yet they are accused and snooped after as if they were a gang of criminals. Through all the depressions and the biggest booms, we bought white shirts and quality suits at reasonable prices, and there isn't a speck of evidence to support any claim that manufacturers refuse to produce such goods at fair prices commensurate with increased costs, now.

If controls were lifted on housing, prices on the first 250,000 homes would be out of line, but what are you getting under OPA today? Veterans' savings and bonds are gone, and they have paid $1,500 to $3,000 more for half worn-out homes than they would have had to pay for new homes a year after all-out production had gotten underway. The local and Federal finance agencies would not have loaned money on highly inflated homes, and this would have protected the small-down-payment groups. All lending agencies, corporations, and insurance companies are loaded with Government bonds and they know that bonds would suffer deflation with everything else, resulting in utter disaster. Here was another natural ceiling that wasn't even discussed.

Most of the talk about price controls is based on OPA hysteria. Inflation is already here in reduced quality and quantity of the things we are able to buy, mainly because the things we need and want are held up by the strangulation, and by the discarding of all the rules of supply and demand. Taxes and wages have gone up, in some cases have skyrocketed. High production alone could justify wage increases. Tax increases could not be absorbed. In every line of business, costs of agricultural products and all needed supplies to manufacture or process any product, increased from 10 to 1,000 percent. OPA has tried to make manufacturers, processors, and retailers in many lines, absorb these increases, and such a thing was impossible.

Men who are not free spend their lives on their knees. I think it is time we give our democracy a chance to work, and that we as sellers, workers, producers, and buyers, begin to realize that dependence on ourselves; on our own judgment and moral decency, is all that will ever stop dangerous inflation. We need shed no tears over Chester Bowles. He is interested in becoming a Senator, and we need have no fears if OPA is put to death. This economy of ours is too big, too diversified to be run by impractical economists and gag men. It's got to be run by all of us, and run right, or it will be run into the ground. That is what the Communists and Socialists are hoping will happen.

Portland's "Half-Pint" Post Office

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Portland's 'Half-Pint' Post Office" published in the Portland (Oreg.) Daily Journal of July 1, 1946.

The public building officials in Washington inform me that no city in the country is in greater need of a new post office than is Portland, Oregon. There is now pending before the Senate a bill which would authorize the public buildings and grounds authorities to prepare the necessary plans and building programs to take care of just such urgent needs as the one referred to in this editorial in regard to the Portland post office.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTLAND'S HALF-PINT POST OFFICE

It was 1918. Portland had about 250,000 people. A new Portland post office was occupied. It handled in its first year 45,500,000 letters, had receipts of $1,639,958, and employed 386 persons.

It is 1946. Portland has a metropolitan population verging on half a million persons. The post office that was occupied in 1918 is still in use—unenlarged. Last year it handled 134,600,000 letters, its receipts passed $5,900,000, and it had 822 regular employees. Although no count was made in 1918 of the number of mail sacks dispatched, the figure for 1930 is 691,059 to compare with 1,049,811 sacks in 1945.

In percentages, the increase between 1918 and 1945 is 195.28 percent for letters, 260.47 percent for receipts, and 112.95 percent for regular employees. Nor are the figures mere guesswork. They are furnished officially at the request of the Journal by Postmaster E. T. Hedlund.

Almost three times as many letters, almost three times as much income, more than twice as many regular employees—and the same old post office.

The post office here meant is the main post office at Broadway, Gilsan, Park, and Hoyt, not the United States courthouse which contains a post-office branch at Broadway and Main.

Go some evening about 5 o'clock down to the Park Avenue side of the main post office. See the mail-carrying trucks and vehicles of almost every description almost literally piled up waiting a chance to unload.

Go around the corner to the loading platform on Hoyt Street. It is a handkerchief-sized affair. It is glutted, crowded, congested, and confused with backed-up vehicles and toiling men trying to load and unload the mail of the whole Portland area in the same space.

Go inside and see the corresponding congestion of hand trucks, mail sacks, individual pieces of mail, and mailmen getting in each other's way.

For years there have been discussed in the name of relief to intolerable conditions that cause waste of money and time such devices as (1) an annex on the vacant lot across Park Avenue, (2) an in-bound loading platform on Park Avenue and an out-bound loading platform on Hoyt Street, (3) a rearrangement of mail handling within the building and the addition of a mezzanine floor to the high light well in that center, and (4) a tunnel under Broadway connecting the main post office and the Union Station which is only a short distance.

Nothing has been done. Postal brass hats have inspected and discussed. Congressmen have corresponded. Postmaster Hedlund has pleaded for anything that approximated action. The old post office still has to do, although Salt Lake City, with fewer people than Portland had in 1918, has, it is said, about twice Portland's present main post office space.

There is an irritated public opinion in Portland reaching the end of patience about a main post office that is less than half big enough to meet the demands of present-day postal business.

McKellar Acts in Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. TOM STEWART

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "McKELLAR Acts in Time," from the Nashville Banner of July 16, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

M'KELLAR ACTS IN TIME

Thanks to Senator McKELLAR's quick action when it was called to his attention, Nashville's city authorities are given a week of grace by the Federal Public Housing Administration to decide what to do about the naval separation center as a housing project. At the Senator's insistence, the Federal authority discontinued its removal for 1 week; in effect "froze" the demolition program. The next step is the city's.

The Banner hopes that this week will not be wasted. It should be used to solve the untenable situation of losing housing at the very moment it is most needed. The idea of forfeiting existing facilities; seeing them scattered to the four winds, is bad at best. It will be worse if, with this reprieve granted through Senator McKELLAR's intervention, local and Federal authorities still cannot get together on a feasible plan.

Nashville, confronted by this threatened worsening of the housing crisis, appreciates the senior Senator's efforts in its behalf, and the weight attaching to those efforts when—despite other appeals—the housing authority was bent on pursuing the program of demolition and removal.

Twice in as many days did Senator McKELLAR emerge as the able spokesman of his constituents, a role historically his. The other instance was in both Senate and House approval of his plans for two TVA dams, a triumph against delay in the Watauga and South Holston projects which had been held up by the war. Under his leadership, the funds for these dams were added to the TVA appropriation after they had been stricken from it by the House; an instance remindful of the series of past fights, led by Senator McKELLAR, for adequate appropriations.

The circumstances of this fight, and the McKellar victory for it, illustrate more than that. They illustrate the transparent misrepresentation involved in any claim that Senator McKELLAR is—or has been—an enemy of TVA. The facts refute that charge, and that is one reason that the Senator's political enemies stay as far from facts as possible.

The Polish American Congress Strikes at Yalta

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ROBERT A. GRANT

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1946

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the Polish American Congress, a patriotic organization representing 6,000,000 Americans of Polish origin, has long been known for its fight for Christian and for democratic ideals.

It has steadfastly opposed communism and any infiltration of any "ism" that would gnaw at the foundations of America's free institutions.

The Polish American Congress has long contended that the liberation of Poland from the yoke of communism must come before the objectives for which we fought this war have been won.

The Polish American Congress, just prior to the Conference of Foreign Ministers in Paris, appealed to Secretary of State Byrnes for a revision of the tragic mistakes of Yalta.

Mr. Charles Rozmarek, president, pointed out in a letter to Mr. Byrnes that without a complete revision of the Yalta decisions there was no more chance of restoring freedom of Europe than there had been at the previous conferences of London, Moscow, and Paris.

As was so well pointed out in that appeal by the Polish American Congress, it is difficult to conceive how representatives of the United States could ever have been party to so ignoble a deal as was perpetrated at Yalta.

The Yalta deal was made without the knowledge or consent of Congress or the American people. It is one of the crimes of the century, for which this administration will have to answer to history, that it should secretly deal friendly Poland into slavery.

That sincere and powerful appeal made to Secretary of State Byrnes by the Polish American Congress is as follows:

POLISH AMERICAN CONGRESS, INC.,
Chicago, Ill., June 11, 1946.

Hon. JAMES F. BYRNES,
Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BYRNES: The Polish American Congress, representing 6,000,000 American citizens, submits to you, prior to your departure for Paris to participate in the Conference of Foreign Ministers, the following declaration:

Unless a complete revision of the Yalta decisions take place, the forthcoming conference in Paris will have no more chance of success in restoring Europe to its prewar freedom than the previous conferences of London, Moscow, and Paris.

The inability of the western democracies to reach an understanding with totalitarian Russia is traceable directly to Yalta and not to any situation that might have arisen since the termination of hostilities.

Yalta was a great evil and no good can ever come out of evil.

It is difficult to conceive that representatives of an enlightened country, where a Civil War was fought just 80 years ago to end slavery, would be a party to so ignoble a deal. If President Roosevelt were in robust health, it is more than likely that he would have had the physical and moral strength to refuse to sign the death warrants of the free nations of Europe. That it gnawed at his conscience is recalled by this statement made upon his return to our shores:

"I did not agree with all of it by any means."

It is dangerous to maintain that our Government is bound by the Yalta decisions. In the light of all legal and moral concepts of justice and international law, they are absolutely illegal. That an aggressor nation was permitted to sit in judgment upon its own acts of aggression while the victims were even barred from presenting their case, is without precedent in history.

Through clever political manipulation, Stalin has usurped the leadership of the world. Encouraged by concessions from American statesmen, he has dictated as he willed from Moscow through Teheran and Yalta.

The war was just a temporary military success. Our war aims have not been achieved. All the noble work begun by President Wilson was undone at Yalta. Nation after nation set free after the first world war has found itself enslaved after the second world war. The truth is that the security of America is now in the gravest of peril.

One of the terrible errors committed at Yalta is the tragedy of Poland. Bereft not only of the territories which Russia seized during the partition of Poland in 1939 as Germany's collaborator, Poland was also bereft of even any semblance of freedom, in what was left of that country, by the dismissal of a genuinely democratic constitutional Polish Government in favor of an illegal Moscow-conceived puppet government.

It is this Communist outfit that was formally recognized by the United States, pending the elections, slated for early spring but still not in sight. In fact, the leaders of Poland today are, for the most part, not Polish but Russian citizens.

With the connivance of the usurpers, Russia has stripped Poland of the little machinery and other property that escaped the devastation of war. The country, for whose territorial integrity, England and France went to war, today lies prostrate, a fourth of her population destroyed, 6,000,000 children facing starvation and others being pushed from pillar to post by the lawless elements in control with the help of Red army bayonets.

As a result millions of loyal Poles in exile are afraid to come home to this land of terror.

The Polish soldiers, who fought for the freedom of all nations, including that of America, prefer to go anywhere than to Poland, although that is where their heart is.

Thus the world is treated to the extraordinary spectacle of having an army that fought and bled for the liberation of its native land denied the precious freedom for which it sacrificed so much.

In view of Poland's tragic plight, the Polish American Congress, respectfully submits to you the following conclusions:

(1) Under present circumstances, free and democratic elections are inconceivable in a country which has ceased to be independent. Free elections will only be possible when the last Russian soldier leaves Poland and the Quisling regime is recalled to Russia.

(2) The so-called Warsaw Government has not fulfilled the conditions upon which it was recognized. It was this failure to abide by its pledges that prompted the United States to withhold credits to Poland. We urge you, therefore, to take into consideration the necessity for the withdrawal of American recognition from the Warsaw puppet government, and the restoration of diplomatic status to the legal Polish Governmeant now in exile in London, until the Polish people, through honest and unfettered elections held under strict allied control, can freely express themselves as to their choice of a new constitutional government.

(3) We call upon you to prevail upon the English Government to suspend the proposed demobilization of the Polish Army units until conditions, both in Europe and Poland, will enable them to return to a free and democratic Poland.

(4) In the event that England carries out its threat of demobilization, the homeless Polish soldiers are entitled to our help if only in consideration of the services rendered by them to the common cause of freedom. In view of America's responsibility for the debacle at Yalta, which puts these Polish heroes in the awkward position they are, our country should either offer them a temporary haven or else permit them to serve as a complete Polish unit in occupied Europe under the flag of the United States.

(5) The Yalta decisions, made without the knowledge or consent of Congress or the American people and in direct contradiction to the Constitution of the United States, are not binding upon the United States Government. The American Constitution grants no one the right to sell friendly nations into slavery or to give away other people's lands.

(6) Moreover, the Soviet Union's failure to live up to all the pledges of Yalta frees the United States from any legal or moral obligation to abide by them. It is a maximum of law that the failure to perform any part of an agreement automatically vitiates the entire agreement.

(7) The repudiation of the Yalta commitments, followed by the institution of remedial measures, would be the first constructive step toward the restoration of allied Europe to its prewar status.

(8) The moral and political recovery of Europe depends upon the elimination of aggression where it began—in Poland.

(9) In the interest of world peace, we urge you to press openly and vigorously for the immediate removal of Soviet troops, puppet governments, and secret police from Poland and all Soviet occupied countries.

(10) No nation, no matter how big, should be exempt from obedience to moral laws.

For the Polish American Congress:
CHARLES ROZMAREK, President.

Following that appeal to Secretary of State Byrnes, the Polish American Congress addressed a letter to Mr. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, executive director of UNRRA.

After pointing out the tragic plight of 250,000 destitute Poles—who are now in Germany, exclusive of the Russian zone—President Rozmarek appealed to UNRRA to reconsider its decision to deny the support of UNRRA to Poles who refuse to be repatriated.

Mr. Rozmarek asked that a committee of Americans, social workers, sociologists, and experts, flanked by a group of Americans of Polish descent who command the Polish language and who are acquainted with the political ramifications that exist, should be named to work with UNRRA in thoroughly investigating this whole unhappy story and render an unbiased report.

The pleas of hundreds of thousands of unhappy Poles, many of whom fought valiantly alongside the rest of the United Nations, are crying out for attention.

If the high principles and declarations of the United Nations pronounced at Washington on January 1, 1942, mean what they say, then our Government must lend a willing ear to these appeals. We must see that the aid of UNRRA is not denied to these starving people for whom it was intended. Further than that we must exert our continued efforts until the day when liberty and freedom come again to the people of Poland.

Mr. Rozmarek's letter to UNRRA follows:

JULY 9, 1946.

Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA,
Executive Director of UNRRA,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: From a dispatch to the New York Times we learn with deep apprehension that Lt. Gen. Sir Frederick Morgan has issued instructions regarding the rescreening of 714,187 displaced persons now under the care of UNRRA.

It is reported that nationals of the United Nations except persecuted persons, who refuse to be repatriated will lose the support offered them at present by UNRRA.

The report printed in the New York Times July 1, states: "This final category would appear to cover more than 200,000 Poles, a majority of whom are Catholics." Selected delegations are being sent to Poland, where they are being properly indoctrinated and intimidated. After their return from Poland, they are set to exert another kind of propaganda on the displaced persons.

The new regulation violates not only previous policies set forth by UNRRA but also violates every principle of morality and justice.

It is not necessary to repeat at this time that Poland was the first to fight, nor to enumerate the contributions made by the Poles in our common war against the enemies of democracy.

It is evident that the Polish problem in the American and British zones of occupation is being treated with surprising indifference. It seems to us that it is high time that a group of Americans of Polish descent be appointed for a thorough investigation and asked to report to UNRRA, to our Government and to our people on the situation in which 250,000 Poles find themselves at present in Germany, exclusive of the Russian zone.

A committee composed of American social workers, sociologists, and experts, together with a group of Americans of Polish descent who command the Polish language and who are familiar with the psychological background of the Poles and know the political ramifications now so acute in disturbing the picture, should be assisted by the authorities of UNRRA and by our Government through the military administration there, in gathering all available facts. A thorough unbiased report with an analysis of all factors involved, with eventual recommendations, would be of great importance and of assistance to you.

The Polish American Congress will be pleased to submit further suggestions together with a list of names of Americans of Polish descent who are best qualified to serve in such capacity.

The fate of 250,000 destitute people constitutes a major problem.

The Polish group merits special attention and understanding. Their fate must be completely detached from present political currents both Polish and international. It is a human interest problem that admits only one bias, namely, humanity and friendship, understanding, and a feeling of moral responsibility for their unhappy lot and their future.

With this letter I simply desire to interest you in this matter hoping that you will give it further thought and consideration.

I shall be at your service, at your call, to discuss with you this problem in detail, should you be inclined to act on our request.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES ROZMAREK,
President, Polish American Congress, Inc.

Independence Day Address by William E. Leahy and Poem by John Clagett Proctor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR CAPPER
OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered on July 4, 1946, by William E. Leahy, director of selective service for the District of Columbia, before the Oldest Inhabitants of the District of Columbia, and an original poem by John Clagett Proctor, which was read at the same occasion.

There being no objection, the address and poem were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF WILLIAM E. LEAHY, SELECTIVE SERVICE DIRECTOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

It is a pleasure, indeed, to address the Society of the Oldest Inhabitants of the District of Columbia upon this the occasion of their annual celebration of the Fourth of July. I hope the time may never come when this Society of the Oldest Inhabitants of the Capital City of our Nation shall fail to celebrate this day. It has always stood out in the history of our country as sacred, as the birthday of our independence. It has stood out, too, among the nations of the world as one date which can never be erased from the memorial of tremendous human events; as a beacon date, upon which an enraged and an embattled people set down in definitive terms their formal declaration to be free, and then boldly specified the reasons they assigned for that resolute and that revolutionary determination.

No single act by any other people or nation has ever produced upon the history of the world such a profound and such a beneficial result. That declaration by the Thirteen Colonies of their independence was made solemnly and eloquently and only after matured and considered deliberation. Not one of the actors in that historic drama could possibly have foreseen the stupendous potentialities which inhered in the action they had just proposed. Conceding their exceptional ability and the essentially surpassing capacity of those engaged in the venture, granting to them qualities of superb and exemplary leadership, unequaled as contemporaneously existing before or since among the English speaking peoples of the earth, there still appears no satisfying explanation for their transcendent vision and restraint, for the supernal inspiration which they breathed into the concept of their projected experiment, save in the assistance which they must have received from the God upon whom they called for help and in whose guidance they so confidently placed their trust.

Occasionally, very occasionally, the tide of time summons up from infinity and casts upon the shores of some state or people a collective group of superior minds, extended in the wide horizon of their comprehension and incomparable in their broad grasp of vast and enormous problems. Occasionally, too, but only occasionally, the same kindly providence, which shapes the destinies of nations, in the abundance of its beneficence and wisdom, infuses into the souls of such a collective group a genuine passion for true patriotism and unselfish leadership, which eschews politics and, driving forward for the good of all, puts that good above self-interest and, so, unselfishly creates for man an era of good will on earth.

Of such was that coterie of men who guided the Colonies in those early days, when the liberty which they had so earnestly devised in theory as the goal of their prodigious ambition developed in fact to fruition and achievement only after years of bloodshed and sorrow. They knew the worth of liberty because they had lived in the hardship of its denial. They knew what freedom meant because they had experienced the sting of its deprivation. They knew the reality of spiritual value. Further living in servile subjection to the arbitrary will and under the capricious mandates of a foreign prince was intolerable to them.

They were men of intense realism. They were irrepressible individualists. They had to be. Whatever security they enjoyed, even to the right to live at all, they had wrung from primeval forests in the log cabin of the settler pioneer and in fields which had never felt the touch of cultivation before. They maintained that security against the Indian, the elements, and enemies contending against them for supremacy and power. They knew what security meant to life and to person. They knew, too, what the right to own property meant and to be safe in its possession. They learned that knowledge in the inexorable experience of acquisition in the first instance and the necessity for continuous struggle to preserve it thereafter.

Worth then was measured by willingness to work and one's industry in the community where he lived. The population was rural. Excessive or intensive urbanization was unknown. Salvation lay in one's personal, individual ingenuity to make himself self-sufficient, qualifiedly at least, and in his aptitude to solve personally the accustomed difficulties which beset him at every hand. No mass or government aid sapped the strength of his persistent individuality. He did not expect it. He had never thought of asking for it. He believed himself best governed when he was least governed. He would have considered government proffers of assistance generally in the ordinary problems of his every-day life an affront to his sturdy self-reliance and his justifiably personal pride. He desired and asked most that he be let alone; to work out his own life and master his own adversities. Of his government he sought only the protection and guaranty of those rights to life, property, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness within the law which are so fundamental and inalienable to any man worthy of the name and in any station that, to attain them, he will suffer any hardship and, to maintain them against aggression, he will gladly die, in preference to their surrender or destruction. Such were the grass roots from which grew that generation of stalwart patriots who rang the bell in Philadelphia that first July the 4th, rang it till its resonant voice grew hoarse, when its resounding shell finally cracked under the repeated impact of its clanging tongue, defiantly proclaiming to the world that declaration of their independence. Out of such loins came that group of men who pronounced the death sentence forever upon foreign rule in these United States of America.

At no other time or place in recorded chronicles can one find leadership of the quality which existed then in the Colonies. There was a minimum, surprisingly so, of emotional motivation in its exercise. Its action was detached, objective, and deliberate. The very coldness of the cutting and incisive resolution of that leadership should have warned the imperial British Government of the invincibility of the movement which it saw that leadership had just set on foot. It was not, as some chose to style it, the spasmodic outburst of hotheaded revolt on the part of a scattered few. Neither was that leadership the obtrusive, tumid, pretentious demagoguery of blatant political adventurers whose zeal would subside to disappearance before a regiment of lobster backs or the threat of royal condemnation. It was an unrelenting, unremitting leadership, aroused and dynamic in a mighty, powerful, overwhelming cause. It was a leadership of stark conviction in the rectitude and justice of that cause. It was a leadership of resignation even to the loss of all earthly possessions owned and of life itself, if the need should so arise, with every danger carefully and intelligently appraised and with no delusions as to ease in attaining the victory which all knew must be won. It was the leadership of willing sacrifice and incessant toil; of vigor in prosecuting the war against discouragement and threatening defeat; of constant, unfailing, untiring, and indefatigable energy; always alert, never despairing. It was the most magnificent exhibition of uncompromising leadership in an inspired and inspiring spiritual cause that human history has ever known or that heaven in its mercy has ever bestowed upon any nation the right to boast of. It was the leadership of ideal patriotism. And it gave to the world the stimulating example of what man can do when man is made free; of what heights he can reach when untrammeled by subjection to injustice and unhampered by the bizarre theories of the charlatan, the despotism of the tyrant and the dictator, or the doctrinaire pronouncements of the dreamer and the fanatic. It put into the bread on the table of the family of nations a new leaven. It vitalized an old and imperious philosophy of colonization and exploitation of man with a new and astonishing principle. It energized succeeding generations to a better realization of that convincing impulse which had animated and cemented the united front of the Colonies. It was always a pillar of fire at night and a cloud by day to all the colonists, especially in the hours of their darkest depression. To them it was the trust of their faith and the faith of their trust. It produced the surpassing greatness and the imposing majesty of Washington. It made immortal that heroic resistance on top of the gently rising slopes of Bunker Hill, when untrained farmers performed that feat which none believed possible of them, when, with their powder and shot used up, they stood on the fire step to slug it out with musket butt against the bayonets of the finest troops England could send into battle. Somehow it covered bloody feet with leather and clothed half-frozen bodies. Somehow it fed half-starved recruits and saw through and prevented disaster in that terrible winter at Valley Forge. It nursed back to complacency the ominous mutiny of 1781. It marched tired and ragged and weary regiments over thousands of miles, through mud and swamps and heat and cold, until finally at Yorktown, in an irresistible resurgence of the sanctity of their crusade, it led to victory a triumphant army along the parade ground of eternal glory.

And then when maladjustment followed victory, when inexperience in the ways of union and united action flamed into interstate jealousies and commercial feuds, when the full fruit of their struggle was threatened in loss to those who had endured so much to attain it, that leadership went to work again. Again it brought itself to bear upon the vexing problems which in peace were tearing apart that unity of the colonies which had been their preservation during the war. It threw its whole weight against those problems; and against that weight those problems first bent and then broke. And out of the silence and the secrecy of the Constitutional Convention, out of its genius and its devotion to country, out of the consummate mass wisdom and the sterling, disinterested patriotism of its delegates in representation, there came a new and totally different but a nobler conception of human government than the world had ever known. That Convention gave to man the grandest instrument ever struck off at any one time by the hand of man. It gave to man the most perfect shield for his protection ever wrought by the mind of man, and for the protection of his fundamental liberties and his inalienable rights, so consistent with his appropriate dignity and so conforming to the end for which he was created at all. It gave him a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. It gave him the Constitution of the United States.

And now, as we foregather, let us take renewed strength from an examination of that leadership. Above us hover dark clouds heavily, of doubt, distress, and vexation. We, too, find ourselves harassed by the intricacies of readjustment which the complexities of a global war and its consequent disturbance have aggravated in the related complexities of our urban and industrial civilization. New ideologies are forging themselves in our country which cannot be reconciled with our Constitution or the soul of our Nation. Their adherents are vocal and busy. They entrench upon fanaticism. The success of their accomplishment lies much in the unrest of which they take great advantage and in prejudices which they raise and upon which they thrive. These ideologies are so foreign to our traditions and our ways of life that their teachings are inherently unacceptable. The opposition is diametric. The combat is mortal. Both cannot exist together. One or the other must fall. Those who profess belief in these ideologies and allegiance to their doctrines have a right to their belief and their allegiance. Our Constitution has pledged to them the freedom of speech; and so they may proclaim publicly their convictions and attempt by persuasion to win to themselves and away from the grandeur of our traditions the hearts and the minds of our people. These ideologies deny to others that same right. But we in this country who cannot and will never accept their teachings have an equal right to speak. Nay, we have a consuming and unescapable obligation as American citizens to speak, and strongly, and now, and persistently, and continually against the advocates of any and every dogma and theory, economic or governmental, who appeal loudly to the rights we readily secure to them only maliciously to destroy those very rights once they achieve power.

As Americans our duty is constant. It is clear. While we have an ounce of strength left in the framework of our flesh and blood to resist, we must resist, powerfully and alertly, every proposition to our fellow citizens which employs deceit and hypocrisy and falsehood as artifices in order ultimately and purposely to strike down and destroy those magnificent pillars in the temple of our governmental structure which sustain the roof of freedom and liberty over our heads. No inalienable human right or fundamental guaranty of our liberties which we won only after years of indescribable struggle shall be swapped off or lost to us in trade for a promised economic advantage. We know that ills exist. We feel them. We don't like them. We want to be rid of them. We know, too, they are phazes, growing pains in the process of readjustment to economic stability in a world which has been torn asunder by a total fratricidal war in the family of so-called civilized nations. But we will take care of those ills in our own Anglo-Saxon way, as we have always done, as free men in a free country. And no alien philosophies of government or economics which have produced nothing but constant and recurring revolutions through the centuries will be made acceptable as a choice elixir or cure-all electuary for our present complaints. With most of the nations of the world still weak on their feet and with their bones and ribs still showing through the skin in the stark starvation of their peoples, with their bodies without clothes enough even to cover their nakedness, let alone to keep them warm, it appears rather an ironic time for anyone to square away for present domination of our cherished traditions unless he is prepared to hit below the belt. We must let this be known and without qualification. The civilization and the government which did more to save whatever is left of this world as a decent place to live in at all was our civilization and our Government, the civilization and the Government of the United States of America. And we are going to analyze and check carefully any alien chaffering in the market place of the world for such precious merchandise as our fundamental and inalienable rights, as we conceived them and fought for them, to see to it that the bargain offered for their surrender and destruction does not run foul of Anglo-Saxon notions of false weights and measures. It is time for all of us Americans to remember that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. It is time for us all just to quit letting George do it.

No more appropriate text could be quoted today than an entry made by Major General Heath in his diary which I will conclude by reading. He made it when the liberties we have enjoyed so long that perhaps their blessings are not fully appreciated were hanging in an uncertain balance. The emotion which pierced his heart spontaneously burst forth in the language which he wrote:

"November 25, 1779: The troops were moving to their different places of cantonment; many of the soldiers (as fine men as ever stood in shoes) were marched barefooted over the hard frozen ground, and with an astonishing patience. Remember these things, ye Americans, in future times!"

IF WE JUST COULD HAVE BEEN THERE

(By John Clagett Proctor)

I would like to have been present—
O, what an inspiration!
At the birth of this Republic—
The founding of our Nation;
To have heard that wondrous motion
Made by Richard Henry Lee:
"That these United Colonies Ought to independent be."

I would like to have been present,
To have heard read the report
Of that eminent committee,
In plain words, none could distort;
Composed of men like Jefferson,
Franklin, Sherman, Livingston,
John Adams—all dependable—
Patriotic—ev'ry one.

I would like to have been present,
At that wonderful event,
To have listened to the speakers
And have heard the argument,
To have joined the rejoicing
When the verdict was announced—
Passed by overwhelming numbers,
Most decisive and pronounced.

I would like to have been present,
I would like to have been there,
When they signed the Declaration—
Document beyond compare!
To have noted the expressions
Of those celebrated men,
Caring naught for consequences
As each took in hand the pen.

I would like to have been present,
To have heard them call the roll,
See them sign that sacred parchment—
Now the world's most famous scroll!
To have heard the comments offered
As each autographed his name,
That either meant that they might hang
Or have immortal fame.

I would like to have been present,
And have seen the crowd outside,
Who most anxiously awaited
What the Congress would decide—
The intense, suppressed emotion,
Which each one must have betrayed,
Wondering if final action,
After all, would be delayed.

I would like to have been present,
And have heard the bell proclaim
Liberty for all our country,
In the Great Jehovah's name;
How really great it must have been,
With the throng in ecstasy—
Enraptured by the gladsome news,
That America was free!

I would like to have been present,
To have helped to swell the din,
That was made by our forefathers
When they ushered freedom in;
'Twould have been worth all the millions—
All the wealth stored everywhere,
If we all could have been present—
If we just could have been there!

The OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Let's Not Destroy Our Bounty," published in the Denver Post of July 11, 1946, and written by the editor, Palmer Hoyt. I hope the conferees on the OPA legislation will consider the editorial before they reach a final decision.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S NOT DESTROY OUR BOUNTY

The Department of Agriculture warns consumers: "Eat meat while you can get it. There will be plenty now for a few weeks, but it won't last." And it looks as though meat-hungry America is going on a costly carnivorous binge. If we awaken with a hang-over a couple of months hence we can blame it on contradiction of the oracles.

No one may gainsay that the oracles were confusing. We had, on the one side, Chester Bowles predicting that if OPA were scuttled there would be a short-lived period of plenty, with meat at skyrocketed prices. On the other side, we had spokesmen of the cattle and meat industry assuring us that, with the end of OPA, the meat supply would return to normal at prices somewhere between the fictitious ceilings and the then-prevailing black-market figure.

But Wednesday we cast aside the crystal ball, for the future was upon us. It came in the shape of a Chicago stockyard quotation on beef—$23 a hundred pounds, the highest in history, with the probability that it might soon go to $30. A trader said:

"There is nothing in sight to stop it. These current high receipts will peter out before long. Mostly they're stock which have been held back for the last couple of months in expectation of higher prices. When they're gone—hang onto your hats!"

Alarming as current beef quotations are, reflected in prices of $1 and more a pound for meat in the Denver retail market, even more serious is the specter of severe shortage this fall and winter when the present splurge is over.

The American Meat Institute and spokesmen of the cattle industry have argued that with removal of OPA controls prices would spurt temporarily but would return to reasonable levels as supply increased in normal channels. The whole logic of this argument depended on the supply factor.

Now, there is great doubt that adequate supply can be attained. This doubt is expressed not only by the Department of Agriculture, but by stockyard traders who have a sharp knowledge of such market factors.

The implication that without controls meat will remain at present inflated prices or higher is shocking to consumers. It raises serious questions as to the wisdom of the Senate's action Tuesday in exempting meat from the bill to resurrect OPA.

Since this continuing shortage of meat is the nub of the entire situation, it is well to mention a matter which has received too little consideration—the cereal policy of the Truman administration and, in particular, the exporting of great quantities of grain abroad, to the detriment of our domestic welfare.

This is a subject confused by humanitarian emotion. But, let us make this clear: What is to be criticized is not the succor of starving people, rather it is the ill-advised impairment of our own national economy.

We Americans are a nation of flesh-eaters. Grain is essential to the production of cattle and poultry. The conscription of a great portion of our wheat and corn for export to Europe and Asia has worked inevitably to cut down the supply of meat, poultry, and eggs essential to our diet.

Beyond the immediate picture, the shortage of grain resulting from our foreign relief policy has meant the uneconomical marketing of unfattened cattle; it has meant the butchering of breeding stock and of dairy herds for which feed was inadequate; it has meant the slaughter of our poultry flocks.

In the light of this immediate impairment of the national diet and more especially of long-range effects on our husbandry, one must wonder if the cereal policy has been well considered. The shortage of meat and poultry which seems inevitable this fall and winter may at last bring this issue to a head. By then, however, it may well be too late. The time to reconsider is now while we still have our rich grain harvest.

Let us recognize that our agricultural economy is an integrated whole; that it cannot be disrupted in any element without creating serious unbalances, as in the meat crisis.

Let us share our bounty, but let us not destroy it.

OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include the following resolution:

Whereas the administration in Washington has for 10 long years made a political football of social security, and with false propaganda deceived the people into believing this problem is solved; and

Whereas hunger does not wait while elections are won or lost, and people are suffering under the present wholly inadequate system; and

Whereas the funds set aside for this purpose have been expended in building up a gigantic bureaucracy at the expense of the needy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Townsend Clubs of Kalamazoo, Mich., go on record as demanding that a real social-security program be enacted immediately for all citizens incapable of earning a living because of ill health; all citizen mothers with dependent children; all citizens who have reached the age of 60 years; all this is a matter of right and without a degrading "means" test; and be it further

Resolved, That our Representatives in Congress be notified of our demands and that this program be a national insurance program to be administered by the National Government.

Political Ethics and Liberalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address entitled "Political Ethics and Liberalism," delivered by me on June 30 before the Cleveland Park Congregational Church, of Washington, D. C.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, filling a pulpit is somewhat out of the ordinary for me, especially since I have become a politician, although when a member of the University faculty I occasionally spoke at a church service. I have been somewhat hesitant about doing it since I have been in politics, because I am aware of the fact that politicians are subject to suspicion and questioning as far as their motives are concerned when they make speeches on religious subjects. I think that is a very sad commentary but nevertheless a true one.

I as one politician take my religious obligations too seriously to want to do anything which would reflect upon any pulpit in which I appear. However, on this occasion I am very happy to be with you because my subject is sufficiently close to politics to relieve me of any charge that I am seeking to discuss a religious issue for political purposes. What I propose to do is to discuss a political issue from the standpoint of its religious implications. Thus, I have chosen as my subject Political Ethics and Liberalism.

The other morning during breakfast with my family, I was telling them about this church-speaking assignment whereupon my little 10-year-old daughter, Amy, looked up at me with a twinkle in her eye and said, "Daddy, does preaching go along with politics too?" Apparently, she too, even at her age, has caught the public notion that religion and politics should not be mixed.

On the other hand, I happen to share the view that there is a need for more religion in politics and less politics in religion. I believe that under our form of government it is very much to be desired that the church and the state be kept separate. However, I also believe just as strongly that the spiritual values of Christian ethics and political ethics should be considered as being absolutely inseparable.

I was quite surprised a few weeks ago about the reactions which I received from a speech I made on the floor of the Senate in connection with the debate on the minimum-wage bill. I discussed the desirability of establishing by law a decent minimum wage from the standpoint of the spiritual values inherent in the issue. My speech for a minimum wage was given under the general text, "Give us this day our daily bread." I endeavored in that speech to point out the very close relationship between spiritual values and the economic problems facing our country. The reactions to the speech in and out of the Senate were exceedingly interesting. Many Senators came to me and expressed complete approval of the approach which I had made to the problem and also expressed the wish that more social and economic issues, when discussed on the floor of the Senate, would be discussed from the standpoint of the principles of the social and Christian ethics involved in them.

The most interesting reaction came from the church periodicals in the country. Many of the church periodicals gave a great deal of attention to the speech including editorials on it and the reprinting of substantial excerpts from it. I think it is very interesting that such a speech should receive that type of attention from the church periodicals. Why did they pay attention to it? Was it because of the contents of the speech? I doubt it. Rather, I think a very significant commentary is to be found in the incident, namely, that the church periodicals recognized that it is a bit out of the ordinary that any social and economic issue involved in legislation should be discussed on the floor of the United States Senate from the standpoint of its spiritual values and its ethical facets.

Out of such incidents as that along with many other experiences which I am having in connection with my service in the Senate, I tell you frankly that there is a great need in the country for relating spiritual values to political ethics.

I don't intend to give you a definition of liberalism that will be satisfactory to each of you because I happen to be one who shares the view that liberalism cannot be defined except in terms of specific issues. Neither can liberalism be defined or applied in American political life except in terms of its relation to political ethics.

Let me put it this way: One of the objectives, for example, of a liberal government is to protect the economic weak from the exploitation of the economic strong and to do it within a private-property economy. That type of definition is similar to the one which Lincoln used when he pointed out that one of the purposes of government is to promote the "greatest good for the greatest number" and to do it within the framework of our American economic system. When we take that approach to the definition of liberalism, then we must think in terms of specific issues and test our liberalism by our votes on those issues.

The liberal fights abusive power and he fights transgressions upon basic rights and freedoms which are guaranteed to us in the American Bill of Rights, whether those abuses are practiced by labor or by employers or by any other pressure group within our country.

We have in public life today some men who profess to be liberals who are saying in public speeches these days that those of us who stand for great pieces of social and economic legislation which seek to protect the economic weak from the exploitation of the economic strong are not liberals at all, that we are authoritarians. I want to point out that, of course, one cannot protect these basic freedoms and liberties to which I have alluded unless one does it in terms of specific legislation.

When I say that liberalism can be defined only in terms of specific issues I call attention to the great revolution that is taking place throughout the world today in the thinking of men and women. All the governments, including our Government of democracy, are being tested by the peoples of the world, according to the test of whether or not those governments practice their professed principles of political ethics. Our Government is being scrutinized not only by many minority groups within our land but by the people of many races the globe around from the standpoint of the well-known differences between the promises set forth in our Bill of Rights insofar as protecting the dignity and the rights of the individual are concerned, and the practices of our Government in effectuating those rights. Too many of our officials of Government, too many of of our politicians, have records which show a marked difference between talk and practice. Too many of them in talk profess to support sound principles of political ethics but in administration and votes demonstrate a political hypocrisy.

In the struggle and conflicts between and among the various political ideologies which today characterize the revolution in the thinking of men and women throughout the world we should never lose sight of the fact in this country that the strength of American democracy is to be found primarily in the fact that our Constitution and its Bill of Rights are premised upon the superiority of the individual to the state, the importance of the dignity of the individual above the state and the right of the individual to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness without domination by the state.

Or to put it another way, our form of government has been devised for the purpose of attaining the political ideal of having the state function as the servant of the people and not its master. That principle of individual liberty is being challenged throughout the world today. It is being challenged in America. If it is to survive, and I say it must survive no matter what sacrifices we may be called upon to make in order to save it; but if it is to survive, we must bring about the union of the principles of our Constitution and our practices in carrying out those principles. We must substitute a union of political and Christian ethics for the political hypocrisies that characterize the record of so many politicians. On this point I wish to call your attention to the great teaching of Rousseau when he said, "Those who would treat politics and morality apart will never understand the one or the other." On the basis of my observation of men in high political positions in this country, I am frank to say that there is too great a tendency in America in this dark hour of our history for politicians to try to separate politics and morality.

Permit me to quote one more little jewel of thought—at least I consider it a very precious thought. I refer to that historic sentence in President Hayes' inaugural address when he said, "He serves his party best who serves the country best."

The quotations from Rousseau and Hayes are not only great statements of political ethics—they enunciate great principles of statesmanship. I think that if we are to solve the many conflicting problems that are plaguing us these days we must return to basic ethical principles. However, that is much easier said than done. Part of the difficulty is to be found in the psychological escapes from reality being indulged in by so many of our citizens. If we are to remain a free people, if we are to live up to the liberal principles to which the dignity of the individual is entitled under our free government then we, as a people, must be more willing to support those principles when we find them maintained in the record of any of our politicians.

You cannot escape your responsibilities as voters because in a very real sense you are the government. You cannot escape those responsibilities, either by wishful thinking, which is one of the escape mechanisms so predominant in public opinion today, nor by passing the buck to your politicians. These two great American psychological pastimes, of wishful thinking and passing the buck, must be laid aside by the individual citizen. These are times which call upon us for sacrifices as great as many of the sacrifices made during the war. Unless we are willing to make those sacrifices, unless we are willing to subordinate our selfish economic interests as individuals to the greater interest of the general welfare, we are headed right into some very serious political storms in this country.

To understand my point of view of the responsibility of the individual citizens to his government I wish to put it this way: It is important that the American people recognize that our form of government can protect their rights only so long as they keep it strong and effective. Representative government is not a machine that works automatically. It is but a set of rules and principles which the people, by their own consent, have decreed shall be binding upon their own conduct. These principles cannot work unless they are administered by men and women responsive to the will of the voters who elected them. If the people relax their vigilance, they may lose the fruits of democracy which promote the greatest good for the greatest number within the framework of our private-property economy.

I would like to emphasize this point in making this speech to you as free citizens. This Government is yours and what is made of it is up to you In a very real sense you are the Government and what happens in your Government on an ethical plane is going to be determined in the last analysis largely by your standards of political ethics and not by the ethics alone of the politicians whom you elect to office. I like to think of this last-mentioned observation in connection with a comment which a very wise lawyer, now dead, but at the time of the incident which I shall refer to, one of the most revered members of the Oregon bar, made to me.

I remember that I was at an Oregon State Bar Convention and was concerning myself with the contents of a report on unethical practice of the law. As you know we have in the legal profession, as in every other profession—in fact as in every organization of human beings—those who do not always live up to a high standard of ethics. In my conversation with this grand old man of the Oregon bar I was expressing the hope that we could proceed more rapidly than I thought we were proceeding at the time, in cleaning out of the bar those lawyers who were guilty of unethical conduct. With a twinkle in his eyes this wise old lawyer said to me, "Don't forget, Wayne, there would never be a crooked lawyer if there were not crooked clients." Of course, he did not mean to excuse unethical conduct within my profession but he did mean to point out an unanswerable truth.

Thus with politics. There would not be any crooked politicians if 140,000,000 American people would always recognize that political ethics are of first importance in political leadership. Unfortunately, too many voters overlook questionable ethics on the part of politicians if those politicians serve well the selfish economic interests of the group to which the voter belongs. I regret to have to say it but I am satisfied that the truth is that too many voters judge the services of a politician on the basis of the economic bacon that he is able to obtain for his State. That is not my conception of what is involved in representing the interests of my State and of my Nation in the Senate of the United States.

When I refer to the great unrest that characterizes the people of the world today I would stress that basis to the unrest is the uncertainty and perplexity in the thinking of the people as to social values and ethical standards. Not only is time marching on but social movements too are marching on. The peoples of the world are going to march on with or without us and history will pass us by unless we in this country will rededicate ourselves to the great ethical standards basic in the protection of human rights as guaranteed in our American Bill of Rights. This great social movement in the world will pass us by unless we keep in step with it.

In what economic framework would I seek to accomplish the objectives of liberal government? I insist that if it is to be done and at the same time protect the dignity and the rights of the individual it must be done within the framework of our private property economy. I insist further that this last part of my suggestion as to what I consider to be one of the most important objectives of a liberal representative government is just as important as the first part because in my judgment it marks the line of demarcation and distinction between political liberals, of which I am proud to classify myself as one, as contrasted, on the other hand, with political leftists.

There are many followers of various schools of political ideology in this country who have much to say about protecting the economic weak from the exploitation of the economic strong but they propose to do it not through a private-property economy but through a State economy. There are many people in this country, particularly the political opponents of liberals, who would attempt to pin upon every political liberal the label of political leftist. I hope that none of you in this congregation will ever forget the great difference between the two.

To the contrary the leftist does not recognize that the State would be the servant and not the master but he would make the State the master of the individual by seeking to use government as an instrumentality for dictating and regimenting the entire economy of the country irrespective of the effects of any given program upon the civil and property rights of the individual.

One of the great tests of statesmanship today, as I see it, is to strike a balance between too little Government on the one hand and too much Government on the other; to strike a balance which will protect the weak from the strong and at the same time preserve the basic political, civil, and property rights of the individual. In striking that balance we cannot, at least we should not, ignore ethical and spiritual values because I venture the suggestion that whenever we take a political course of action that does not stem from the roots of healthy ethics that particular political plant will wither and die.

As a teacher I used to carry on many discussions with my students about the ethics of government, or, rather, the various types of political ethics which we see, from time to time, manifested by government officials. Many of my students expressed an ambition to eventually enter into politics. At that time I had not the slightest idea I would ever be in politics so I am afraid I was a bit long on advice.

However, among the various bits of advice which I used to give in those discussions I always emphasized one principle over and over again. I used to insist on the point of view that if we are going to make democratic government in this country really function in accordance with the Constitution and its Bill of Rights then our office holders should stand for principle and not for reelection. By that I meant then, and mean now, that an officeholder should reach his decisions and cast his votes on the basis of the principles and ethics involved in a given problem rather than on the basis of the relationship of his official action on a given issue to his chances for reelection. This is a pretty fundamental principle if we are to make representative government attain its true objectives in this country.

One cannot sit in a seat in the United States Senate and observe the functions of men in high office without being saddened, as I am, time and time again by men who demonstrate they are motivated more by a desire for reelection than by a desire to do the right thing by standing for principle. The fact that so many politicians so conduct themselves is not so much their fault as it is yours. I can prove it to you by just letting you read my mail. It is very disappointing to me to see how frequently voters are willing to ask their elected officials to vote for something because it will help the constituent's selfish interest although the request cannot be reconciled with the welfare of the general public. When I reply with a discussion of the principles involved I am frequently met with the criticism that I am too idealistic and that my primary job is to serve the economic interests of those who elected me to office.

I am greatly surprised at how brazen some groups are in their demands for support of their economic wishes irrespective of the ethics involved. Their political pressure is tremendous but as far as I am concerned not effective. When I reply with the information that I shall vote contrary to their request I frequently receive letters that should arrive in asbestos envelopes. Usually their argument is to this effect: "We supported you in the last election but we shall not support you next time unless such and such is the course of your conduct." To such letters I reply, and there are many in Oregon who can produce the written evidence, "My obligation as a Senator is to do what I told the voters of Oregon I would do before they sent me to the Senate, namely, exercise an independence of judgment on the basis of facts and evidence as I find them on each issue and then be perfectly willing to tell you why I so voted; but never to yield to pressure." I recognize that standing for such ethical principles may not be a good political course insofar as reelection is concerned. However, being politic is not one of my weaknesses. At least I have yet to hear a critic so accuse me. I am satisfied that if that criticism is ever made of me, with justification, evidence will then also exist that I will have lost sight of, or, at least have done a little backsliding in regard to my conception of the standards of political ethics which a man should live up to if he is to keep faith with the responsibilities and duties of his office.

Yes; liberalism in politics, I think, is based on good ethics. It is synonymous with the rights and the dignity of the individual. It is premised upon great social values. It is intertwined with the principles and teachings of Christian ethics. I would point out that unless there is a greater recognition in American politics of the ethical and spiritual values to which I have alluded in this talk it is going to be more and more difficult to maintain our Republic on the basis of the principles of human rights as set forth in our Constitution. Those who favor the development of a stronger and stronger Government control over our economy are going to win out unless American citizens as individuals insist upon statesmanship in this country based upon the social and ethical values for which I am pleading today.

It is pure political hypocrisy for politicians to talk about political ethics unless they are willing to demonstrate what they mean by them in relation to special pieces of legislation. The main point that I want to stress this morning is that the political ethics of the political liberal can be observed and tested in the laboratory of American political science. I say that because the political liberal is not only a realist, but he is an objectivist. He is perfectly willing to stand up and be counted on social and economic issues. He is willing to practice as well as preach ethics. For the past year we have had before us in the Senate a series of great social and economic issues, each one of which I have felt should be analyzed in accordance with its ethical implications as well as its social and economic implications.

I shall pass over very quickly the ethics of the minimum-wage legislation. However, in passing over it I would point out to you that we cannot separate our economic obligations to society from our ethical obligations.

Members of the Senate cannot justify practicing their Christian ethics on Sunday and then on Monday voting against the legitimate rights of the individual as involved in such legislation. We should not overlook the fact that the rank and file of our people, the common men and women of America, are now collecting dividends on 170 years of free education in this country. They are enlightened to a degree of understanding about political, economic, and social problems not equalled by any other people on earth. Great numbers of them are as well informed as the leaders of industry and business. Hence, as a stanch supporter of our private-property economy, I urge every businessman in America to recognize that our people as a people are going to insist that their Government fulfill its obligation in seeing to it that minimum standards are set up so as to assure a decent standard of living for all of our people. There is no escaping the sound ethics of a fair minimum-wage bill which seeks to provide a decent standard of living, that is, a standard of living of health and decency for all of our people rather than for just a privileged few.

Please do not misunderstand me when I talk in terms of the social revolution that is going on in this country, as I am only talking in terms of that type of social revolution consonant with government by law and in accordance with the constitutional objectives of democratic government.

I would point out we can no more stem the tide of the march of free people insisting upon equality of economic opportunity and a decent standard of living for themselves and their children than we can turn back the events of history itself. This great social demand for a fuller life and a more decent living is taking the form of an inescapable social phenomenon. It is certain to manifest itself in political action and thus politicians motivated by reactionary selfishness, who are seeking to block such social objectives by various political strategies, are certain, in due course of time, to be swept aside. Thus I say that if we, as a great Christian nation, are to put into practice the theories of Christian ethics we must harness together in a cooperative team our principles of ethics and our principles of a private-property economy.

Closely related to minimum-wage legislation is another great piece of liberal legislation: that of full employment. I hope you will not fool yourself into thinking that the economy of this country can withstand another business cycle of boom and bust. As I have said on the floor of the Senate, I do not believe that the rank and file of our people are going to accept another depression with its period of mass unemployment. They know that it is not necessary if leaders of business, labor, and government plan now to meet the dangers of depression by adopting fair and effective full-employment legislation. As I have made clear in my speeches on this subject in the Senate, that legislation must be operated within the framework of a private-property economy in order to avoid the danger of a totalitarian governmental economy. But the point I want to stress here is that I am convinced that the people are going to insist that there is an ethical responsibility on the part of government to protect them from the cruelties of the early thirties when millions of our breadearners saw their families suffer because a business depression made it impossible for them to have an opportunity to earn their daily bread.

Our people do not want the Government to take over our economy in any socialistic or communistic endeavor to avoid depression. They, however, do want the Government to cooperate with private industry to the end of seeing to it that the resources of government are used to the maximum extent possible through private-property channels, in an endeavor to prevent mass unemployment should we once again face that economic danger in this country. If we are really headed toward another boom and bust period I am sure that no politician will survive the wrath of the people if his record shows that it is a record which promoted rather than sought to prevent the development of a boom and bust cycle. Inherent in such legislation as the full employmen legislation is the sound principle of ethics from which we cannot escape, namely, we are in fact our brother's keeper.

There are many other issues involving pieces of so-called liberal legislation that I wish time permitted me to discuss. Let me mention one or two more.

The record on them by this Congress has been made. It is my position that votes of the politicians on these issues helped draw the line between reactionaries and liberals. Take, for example, the issue involving fair employment practice. The underlying principles of this legislation so far as ethical standards are concerned are rooted in Christian ethics. The Christian principle that all men are equal in the sight of God is inherent in the basic foundation of this legislation. But we do not have to go to Christian principles to justify the ethical soundness of this legislation. It seeks only to put into practice the principles of the American Bill of Rights. Surely no one can square the American Bill of Rights with the principles of intolerance on which is based economic discrimination against fellow American citizens because of race, color, or creed.

Closely related to the FEPC legislation is the antipoll tax legislation. Oh, yes, many people in Oregon have written to me and said in effect, "Why are you involving yourself in the FEPC and antipoll tax fights? Those issues aren't important in Oregon. Why don't you devote your time to Oregon problems?" Such letters raise questions which in my opinion are of great importance from the standpoint of political ethics.

Assuming that we do not have any problems of race discrimination in Oregon the inescapable facts are that we do have such problems in serious proportions in our Nation as a whole. Those problems are important to America. Unless we solve them our body politic is certain to find itself in the not too distant future in a very unhealthy condition. I consider it my clear political duty as your representative in the Senate to devote some of my attention to this great social issue involved in the FEPC and antipoll-tax bills.

I think we need to do a little rereading of our American history. Many people who write me in criticism of the part I am playing in the FEPC and antipoll-tax fight need to go back to the great constitutional debates at the time our Constitution itself was drafted and adopted. They need to recognize that one of the underlying theories of our founding fathers was that a United States Senator was not to function as a Senator for his State but as a Senator for his country from his State. Right there on that point is to be found a very important principle of political ethics in America, lost sight of too frequently by those who would like to make a Senator their chore boy. I am happy to perform as many services for individuals and groups in Oregon as I can even though those services constitute a heavy charge upon my time and even though those services are, for the most part, of benefit primarily to a relatively few individuals compared with the total population of the State. However, I consider that my primary obligation is to all of the people of the State of Oregon and all of the people of the Nation.

Further, I consider it from the standpoint of political ethics and responsibilities my clear duty to serve my country in accordance with the underlying principles of our form of government as set out in its Constitution and its Bill of Rights. Sometimes such service is bound to bring me into conflict with prevailing public opinion on a given issue at a particular time.

From the standpoint of political ethics and duty I do not consider that I can justify voting for and supporting legislation in the Senate of the United States on the basis of a Gallup-poll approach to that legislation. It is very important that the most careful consideration be given to the wishes of the people of Oregon and the Nation of any issue; but, if after giving consideration to those wishes and all the facts and evidence, I honestly believe that any particular demand for legislation by the public is contrary to our Constitution, then I believe it my solemn duty to live up to my oath to support and defend the Constitution.

At this very time I am being bitterly attacked by many people in Oregon because I refuse to go along with the hysteria which has dominated public thinking in this country during the past few weeks insofar as labor legislation is concerned. I have refused to vote for certain legislation even though I know that a majority of the people in a spirit of hysteria have demonstrated that they are willing to waive some of their rights under the Constitution in order to accomplish certain temporary economic aims. I have refused to support legislation that would wreak revenge upon one part of our body politic because I know that in the long run such legislation will not promote the common good.

I do not ask you to agree with me on the merits of the legislation which I have been discussing but I do ask you to examine the ethical standards that I am applying in considering that legislation. I am asking you to remember that as we face such problems as those involved in the FEPC the eyes of the world are upon us. Many people are looking to see whether or not we can practice our principles, as expressed by us over and over again, that in this country we stand for equality of opportunity for all; that we stand for nondiscrimination among our citizens insofar as race, color, and creed are concerned.

I have just returned from Atlantic City where I attended the great international Rotary Convention. I heard representatives of China, India, France, and other countries kindly but poignantly twit the American delegates on the race question. As one representative of a foreign land pointed out, "In my country we live nondiscrimination. We would that you would too."

In closing, I wish to stress the point that dark as the hour is the hope of both domestic and international stability rests primarily with you—with all of us—140,000,000 of us.

During the next decade it is going to be up to us to determine whether our Government, which, after all is operated only by mere men, is going to be one of a people who place spiritual values in the field of politics above selfish interests.

I am confident that once, as a people, we understand the type of statesmanship that is called for in meeting this great test, our people and our politicians will practice as well as preach the ethical principle basic to the American Bill of Rights.

Resolutions Adopted by Connecticut Department of Veterans of Foreign Wars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. GEELAN
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. GEELAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following five resolutions which were unanimously adopted at the twenty-sixth annual department encampment, Department of Connecticut of Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, recently held in Bridgeport, Conn.:

Resolution 31

Whereas veterans who are inducted into training either on apprenticeships or on job training under Public Law 346 or 16 are not covered by Government allowances in the event of injuries sustained in the course of such training; and

Whereas the expenses for doctors' bills and hospitalization are borne by the private insurance companies which cover private employers under State workmen's compensation acts; and

Whereas, furthermore, the private insurance companies are obligated to pay these veterans only for one-half the wages paid by the private employer; and

Whereas the subsistence allowances of the GI bill of rights cease when training is interrupted; and

Whereas, in the case of nondisabled veterans, they may only apply for 30 days' annual or sick leave, and in the case of disabled veterans, they may apply for up to 90 days' annual or sick leave; and

Whereas it is our belief that there must be between three and four thousand veterans who are at present victims of occupational hazards while training in programs approved by the Veterans' Administration, and some of them may even be injured to such an extent that they may be totally incapacitated for work in the future; and

Whereas it is felt that an unjust penalty is imposed on this class of veterans who, in some cases, have left higher paying jobs, because of their initiative and ambition in trying to acquire higher skills which are so badly needed today in the entire Nation; it is hereby

Resolved, That appropriate action be taken and that adequate legislation be enacted to amend existing laws in order to properly provide necessary financial and medical protection to veterans taking training under Public Laws 346 and 16, who are injured in the course of such training, in that measure or those measures deemed necessary and adequate by the Members of both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

Resolution 24

Whereas there exists in the files of the Housing Authority of the city of Bridgeport better than 2,400 applications for homes by honorably discharged veterans of World War II; and

Whereas an analysis of the incomes of these veterans, who are desperately in need of housing, indicates that they can afford to pay no more than $45 per month rent either for rental purposes or combination of charges for the purchase of a home; and

Whereas better than 65 percent of these veterans have at least one growing child at the present time; and

Whereas they are living doubled-up throughout the entire area, not only in private homes, but in the 3,600 units of public housing in Bridgeport, and this situation is similar throughout the State; and

Whereas, the housing situation in and about all congested areas within the State of Connecticut is similar to that which exists in said city of Bridgeport; and

Whereas there has been approved by the Senate, the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill, which bill provides such means to construct homes and houses for veterans and their families: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the State Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars endorse the following resolution:

That this resolution be sent to each of the Congressmen representing the State of Connecticut, and

That said Congressmen be instructed to insist upon the immediate passage of the same Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill in the House of Representatives, and

That a copy of said resolution be sent to the National Encampment for the adoption of this resolution in accordance with the terms therein, and

That the Congressmen be instructed to request a change of the limitation of $1,000 per room which is imposed in said bill to conform with the locality of said homes that are to be constructed; be it further

Resolved, That all efforts should be made to aid the GI who will not be ready for home ownership for the next 5 or 10 years, but who represents 85 percent of the total discharged veterans and who must have immediate shelter at a rent he can afford to pay in view of the fact that the average income of the discharged veteran of World War II in this State averages less than $45 per week; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congressmen be instructed to pass said law immediately in order to provide low-cost public housing in Connecticut, constructing housing units sufficient to meet the needs as reported by the War Department; and be it further

Resolved, That said Congressmen be instructed to demand permanent homes of the low-cost housing type with modern conveniences, in lieu of temporary structures which is not a fair compensation for the services rendered by the GI in World War II, and be it further

Resolved, That if Congress fails to act in approving a bill for housing for the GI, that the President of the United States be urged to use his emergency powers to construct and build permanent homes for veterans in the same manner as the defense workers obtained homes during World War II.

Resolution 15

Whereas war surplus commodities are being distributed from various centers of which there are none in the State of Connecticut; and

Whereas veterans priority rights in the purchase of such commodities are prejudiced by the unavailability of such commodities and the information and sales of the same by reason of distance from such centers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this department respectfully petitions that the War Assets Administration establish a storage and sales center for war surplus commodities in the State of Connecticut for the service of veterans and others in this State desirous of the opportunity of information, inspection, and purchase of such commodities, and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives in Congress and to the Chairman of the War Assets Administration.

Resolution 14

Whereas the United States has certain secret military weapons of great value in case of war; and

Whereas present civilization has proven its capacity for and the reasonable possibility of continued wars of aggression; and

Whereas the United States under its present form of government cannot be compelled or induced to enter into a war of conquest or aggression or any military operations other than in the defense of its constitutional sovereignty and freedom in its own territories and life of its citizens: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, This department declares its opinion that the military secrets of the United States be strictly confined to the knowledge and use of the United States until such time as international cooperation and mutual good faith and confidence have reached a sufficiently advanced condition that international disagreements can be securely adjusted without the danger of war, through the medium of the United Nations or its successor agencies, and that copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Resolution 12A

Whereas the claim has been made that in many instances the court-martial systems of the armed services have not been administered fairly in that enlisted men have not been accorded the same treatment as officers charged with like offenses, and that enlisted men have been thereby improperly discriminated against; and

Whereas the claim has been made that there have been other abuses in the administration of said systems to the prejudice of our American system of justice; and

Whereas it is the desire of this organization that the above be corrected: Now, therefore, it is hereby

Resolved, That this Connecticut State encampment recommend to the National Encampment that it petition both the Congress of the United States and the War and Navy Departments, for a change both in the Articles of War, Articles of Government of the Navy and regulations pertaining to the Coast Guard, and their administration to the end that any and all inequities in the court-martial systems to the prejudice of the enlisted men be removed and that any and all other abuses be corrected forthwith.

Abolish the Filibuster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Abolish the Filibuster," written by Robert W. Ruhl and published in the Medford (Oreg.) Mail-Tribune.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABOLISH THE FILIBUSTER

The filibuster in Congress violates every fundamental principle of democratic government.

It allows one man—or a small group of men—to thwart the will of the majority and defeat any legislation, however necessary, or desired by the American people. In fact, the filibuster might, at any time, change the entire course of this country and at an extremely critical moment when it could lead to serious disaster.

Why it has ever been tolerated this department has never been able to see. Theoretically, it provides a provision for a minority.

But why in a government ruled by a majority, should a minority be protected, as far, at least, as the enactment of legislation is concerned?

Minorities have rights, it is true.

But, obviously, legislatively the greater rights belong to the majority. And in any representative government, when a majority of the people's representatives favor a certain action or a certain kind of legislation, what possible right has a handful of perverse and willful men to make such action impossible?

The answer is they have none.

And in the judgment of this department, the time has come for the American people to rise on their hind legs and tell all and sundry they have none.

If our present representatives in Washington refuse to do this—pass laws eliminating the filibuster—then replace them with representatives who will.

OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under the request to extend my remarks I include an editorial, To the Point, from the Pittsburgh Catholic. This editorial very clearly and aptly sets forth the difficulties and injustices imposed upon the masses of our people by the failure of Congress to pass a satisfactory price-control bill at this time and until production balances with consumption. Surely if such legislation is not enacted we will reap the whirlwind.

TO THE POINT

(By the Editor)

OPA-LESS

Inasmuch as a bill to revive and extend the Office of Price Administration is now before Congress, the market conditions that prevail during these 2 weeks of no OPA give only hints of what may be looked for if the enemies of price control succeed in their objective of eliminating it altogether. Those producers, distributors, and retailers who are sincerely anxious to do their part in helping the country escape the destructive effects of inflation, which will inevitably follow the increasing of prices according to the law of supply and demand, are being supported, for the present, by those who want to take full advantage of the opportunity which the current situation presents for multiplying profits but who realize that it would be unwise to show their hand while Congress is still debating the issue. Even the National Association of Manufacturers, which represents the point of view victorious in the wreck-the-OPA bill vetoed by President Truman, has warned its members that they are on trial before the public, meaning that they should refrain from doing anything during this period to alarm those Senators and Congressmen who were only dubiously in favor of ruining OPA's effectiveness.

No one need be in the least uncertain as to what will happen if the present OPA-less status becomes permanent; that eventuality is not a matter of guesswork, or suspicion, or estimate; it is a matter of stern experience, the hard, cold figures having been recorded during the almost exactly parallel period of World War I and its aftermath.

There was no OPA then. From the outbreak of the war in Europe, in 1914, until the United States entered the war, 3 years later, prices of food, clothing, and housing in this country rose about 25 percent; from then until Armistice Day, a period of a little less than 2 years, they jumped an additional 40 percent; after a brief pause, they then soared during the next two postwar years another 40 percent—until they were stopped, as inflationary orgies are always stopped, by a depression—the preliminary depression of 1920; that is, during those 6 years the cost of the necessaries of life more than doubled, as a result of the full play of free enterprise, the law of supply and demand, and absence of bureaucratic control.

And what is the record for the comparable 6 years of World War II, during 4 of which the OPA has imposed ceiling prices? How any Senator or Congressman can look at that record, and then consider killing or weakening in the slightest degree the agency responsible for saving the people a similar economic catastrophe, must remain one of the mysteries of democratic government. From 1939, when the war started in Europe, until 1942, when we entered, prices on the same three necessaries—food, clothing, housing—rose 12 percent (without any OPA); OPA then was established, and during the three and a half years until the surrender of Japan prices rose 20 percent; in the year since then they have risen another 3 percent. Thus, during the past 6 years, with far more of industry concentrated on war production than was the case in World War I, and with purchasing power and consumer demand at a far higher level than it was then, price increases have been held to 35 percent, and only 23 percent while OPA was functioning.

To do away with OPA now would be to commit the insanity of inviting a return of the 1914–20 inflationary spiral and even worse; it would mean flying in the face of all experience that tells us uncontrolled prices while goods are short leads inevitably to inflation and then depression. Isn't it the simplest sort of common sense to keep OPA as a balancing force until production is somewhere near demand?

A glance at some of the events of the past 2 weeks, bearing in mind that uncertainty about the possible restoration of price ceilings caused the profit-hungry elements to be wary, provides plenty of proof that ending OPA will mean ushering in an era of economic anarchy.

Plentiful supplies of meat appeared almost overnight. The empty stockyards that had been photographed the week before overrun with grass suddenly teemed with prime steers; hogs we had been told had died of malnutrition because of the OPA's policies on prices and feed, were resurrected from nowhere, fat and sassy. Prices, significantly, were higher. This was blandly explained as due to the elimination of the subsidies OPA had been paying the farmers and to the spread between black-market prices and OPA ceilings; yet prices on sausage and other processed meat products, which we had been told were wasted in black-market butchering, jumped, too. The village idiot could see plainly through all of this; meat had been deliberately kept off the market during the month of June to starve the public into acceptance of ending OPA, along with higher prices. And now we are asked to look for fair play by the industry that perpetrated this cold-blooded piece of antisocial extortion.

Milk has gone up in price. The effect of this, one business journal is quoted as explaining, will be that low-income families will use less, and the surplus can go into butter, cheese, and ice cream, also out of reach of people of low incomes. Thus people with money won't be annoyed by shortages. But mothers of large families will be hard-pressed to keep hunger from the door, a hideous example of social injustice that should haunt the Congressmen responsible for it.

Some landlords promptly gave notice of rent increases, although there is a general feeling that rent ceilings should be retained, and that the Congressmen may pass a special bill to accomplish this. (They did enact a separate measure to control rents in Washington, a rather startling instance of feathering their own nests.) But who in his senses, will contend that rents can, or should, be kept down, if the law of supply and demand is to be allowed to chase costs for repairs and replacements up out of sight? Apparently the landlords have no lobby in Washington, or an amazingly incapable one.

Senator TAFT, in his radio reply to the President's criticism of his destructive amendment to the vetoed OPA bill, asserted plaintively that "we tried in vain to get Mr. Porter (OPA head) to say he would decontrol petroleum, though the supplies are backing up today because they are greater than peacetime demand." Why, what argument is this? Haven't we been assured that when supplies are plentiful the good old American spirit of competition will drive prices down? If the petroleum industry has reached that stage, it should cease to be concerned about OPA ceilings, for its prices should be below them. Has anyone noticed any cut in gasoline prices recently?

Numerous retailers are advertising that they intend to observe OPA ceilings on goods now in stock, whether or not OPA is revived. Some of these advertisers have, in the past, been cited for violating the price-control law. It is to be hoped they will be more honorable in keeping their word than they were in respecting the statutes.

The foregoing are mere straws to indicate how much hope there is of avoiding inflation, and the consequent collapse, if OPA is abandoned. To be sure, there would have been no need for the OPA during the war, and there would be no need now for it, if everyone—rich and poor, consumers, producers, retailers—were fair and restrained and cooperative in meeting a critical situation that affects everyone. But while greed prevails it must be restrained; to let it triumph over the weak and the decent would be to condone rank injustice.

So the OPA should be retained, in full force, and with no date set for its discontinuance, since such a date merely encourages schemes for evasion. The moment production of any goods equals demand its ceiling price would cease to have any effect, and in this way OPA would be abandoned, item by item, as the Nation's economy returned to normal. There would be no exploitation of the public, no runaway prices, no inflation—and no depression.

Comparatively few Catholic papers have thus far published any comment on the President's veto of the lobby-dictated bill to ruin OPA, but among those who did the verdict is, with a single exception, one of praise for his courage and his defense of the common good. That exception welcomed the return of free enterprise as one of the factors that "gave most of us the highest standard of living on earth," but warned that all concerned must "exercise prudence and intelligence" to prevent inflation and panic.

From Cincinnati, home of Senator TAFT, who has accepted leadership in the "destroy OPA" campaign, comes an editorial in the Catholic Telegraph Register, official newspaper of the Cincinnati Archdiocese, strongly upholding the President's stand and calling on Congress to "fulfill its duty by enacting some type of price control that will protect the common good." The editorial is unsparing in denouncing Congress for its recklessness and short-sightedness.

Says the Albany Evangelist: "We need another year of OPA. If low-wage labor and white-collar workers let Congress do the bidding of big interests and neglect their best welfare, they can blame themselves for the bread lines and boondoggling some 18 months from now."

Russian Realities—Intellectual Stagnation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, news from behind the iron curtain which cuts off Soviet territory from the rest of mankind, is particularly necessary during the present and the next coming months of reshuffling political positions here and in Europe.

No other reporter has stated this kind of news more clearly and more succinctly than has Brooks Atkinson, who lived in Moscow from August 1945 to May 1946 and whose observations, therefore, have the advantage of both freshness and a trained judgment.

Apologists for Soviet aggression—both by force of arms in Europe and Asia, and by infiltration in the Americas—should find definitive contradiction of many of their pet theories in the following article by Mr. Atkinson, which shows the results of Soviet practice on the minds of its subjects, and the aims of Soviet leaders toward those of us who still remain free men.

SOCIALIST WORLD SOVIET AIM, TIMES MOSCOW WRITER SAYS—FINDS EVEN RUSSIAN ART LACKING IN CREATIVE SPIRIT AND VITALITY—VIEWS POOR WORK AS RESULT OF POLITICAL STRAIT-JACKET

(By Brooks Atkinson)

The atmosphere of Moscow is abnormal. All normal communication being cut off with the outside world, the intellectual climate is stagnant. Behind the iron curtain of censorship, the emotional reactions to rumors and also to facts are neurotic. When news is removed from its normal background in the day's events and manipulated for the purpose of conditioning opinion, specific items often come as a shock.

The report of Mr. Churchill's speech at Fulton, Mo., was not published in the Soviet Union for a few days, presumably while the Soviet leaders were deciding how to handle it. When finally they did publish it, with simultaneous political comment, Moscow received it hysterically, as if the atomic bombs might start dropping before midnight. Where there are no safety valves to let off pressure every day, the emotional explosions are sudden, swift, and disturbing.

After the shattering experience of two world wars, we are all familiar with the arguments for political and commercial internationalism as the only means for avoiding military catastrophes. But Moscow also illustrates the necessity for intellectual and cultural association on a world scale. There are no new ideas in Moscow. All the old ones are reiterated with stupefying regularity. All the newspapers say the same thing in almost the same way, usually on the same day; with some refreshing exceptions, every man writes like every other man.

During the long, enervating periods between microscopic changes in the official party line, even a foreigner could write a Soviet political article that could hardly be distinguished from the genuine polemics that appear in Pravda, Izvestia, and the New Times. The prolonged policy of barring foreigners from Russia, of isolating the few who do creep in, of restricting their movements in the country and of censoring news and suppressing it has created a bloodless, old-fashioned, petit-bourgeois culture that is colorless and conventional.

VITALITY LACKING IN THE ARTS

Since I know nothing about science, I have unfortunately no way of judging the results of one of the most industrious activities of the Soviet Union, although I do know that the general level of medical practice is low. But from personal observation I feel competent to report that the general level of theater, art, and music is low—and I suspect that many writers, actors, and musicians realize it. On the whole, there is no vitality in the arts; they are reactionary and moribund. Under the dead weight of political control there is little opportunity for individual enterprise and experiment.

It would be logical to expect a new society, such as the Russians are trying to create, to be daring and bold in the arts. But it seems to me that Soviet art contains just as much hokum and pathos as ours, without producing occasional works of originality that compensate for the failures. The combination of isolationism and totalitarianism has resulted in the death of new ideas.

In an abnormal climate of this kind, group aberrations flourish. And it seems to me that the most conspicuous and also the most irritating abnormality in Soviet leadership is a group paranoia. The leaders imagine that every man's hand is against them; they imagine that they are surrounded. And of course, there is no more certain way of arousing first the bewilderment, then the contempt and finally the enmity of other nations. In view of the size, strength, courage, and inexhaustible resources of the Soviet Union, this phobia about being trapped and cramped would be hilarious, if it were not so troublesome to foreigners who want to find some way of getting on with the Soviet Union.

As far as danger from abroad is concerned, the United States, with its highly integrated economy, is more vulnerable, even with the atomic bomb in the cellar. But differences of opinion and differences of interest in international affairs are interpreted by the Soviet leaders as aggressive hostility to the Soviet Union, for that is how they would interpret differences of opinion and interest inside Russia. A Soviet citizen who opposed a Stalinist policy would be removed from society as an enemy of the state. The area of tolerance is invisibly thin.

In America, there is a kind of old wives' tale to the effect that the leaders of the Soviet Union are shrewd, cunning, and realistic men who always know from one moment to the next where they are going. But I suspect that they are rather commonplace men who have had no experience of democracy at home and are confused by manifestations of democracy abroad. After successfully destroying differences of opinion at home for the holiest Marxian reasons, they instinctively regard differences of opinion abroad as treachery to the Soviet Union and to the common people. Marxianism is a splendid science that has purged itself of the unscientific spontaneity of human nature.

The most formidable impediment to amicable international relations is the basic fact that the Soviet Union is a Socialist state developing and expanding in a capitalist world. According to the Communist Party line, the Soviet is not secure from aggression so long as capitalist countries like the United States and Great Britain also hold dominant positions in the world. Russia has in the past maintained workable relations with capitalist countries, including Nazi Germany when Hitler was fighting the west.

But the party line has now reverted to the theory that "monopoly capital," as the Soviet writers invariably describe it, is Fascist, is preserving the centers of fascism and is bent on the destruction of socialism. Since, according to Marx, "monopoly capital" is also destroying itself, there seems to be quite a lot of destruction going on, and the atomic bomb is obviously superfluous.

In the meantime, the United States is portrayed in the Soviet press as a violent, imperialistic nation that is extending its power throughout the world and is trampling on the rights of small nations, and the "monopoly capitalists" in the United States are portrayed as thwarting the "broad masses of the peace-loving peoples of the world," which is another daily idiom of the Soviet press.

UNITED STATES ALWAYS PAINTED BLACK

During my 10 months in Moscow, I never discovered in a newspaper or magazine any reference to the United States suggesting that, like the Russians, we also have creditable characteristics. Great Britain is portrayed in a baleful light, despite the fact that socialism has come to power at one time or another in England, New Zealand, and Australia. This latter fact might throw some doubt on the theory that the trouble lies between socialism and capitalism. Perhaps the trouble lies elsewhere.

After my tour of duty in Moscow, I prefer the western type of capitalism because it is more interested in individual men and women and places a high value on human freedom. The preservation of human freedom was the cause of the war; it remains the paramount issue in world society. Socialism is a rational approach to the problems of the world. And, as we are likely to find out in Britain, socialism does not necessarily involve the destruction of human liberties.

In the case of so vast and varied a country as Russia, which has many nationalities to group together, socialism is probably the only system that can open the way to material progress. If there were any way of distinguishing between Soviet socialism and Soviet totalitarianism every man would watch with interest and hope the development of socialism inside Russia for the light it could shed on the problems of the rest of the world.

As a matter of fact, every thinking man will watch it with interest because, whatever else may be true of Russia, the achievements of socialism there so far have had the most profound effect on the rest of the world. People everywhere profoundly want to believe that some economic system is ideal, and, knowing nothing about the misery of life in Russia, they want to believe that Soviet Russia has found the ideal solution. By our standards, the Soviet Union has so far not solved any of the problems of freedom—including freedom from want and freedom from fear.

"MANIFEST DESTINY" IS SPUR

To anyone who is attracted by the theory of socialism, the police regimentation of the Soviet people is not only disillusioning but frightening. But again, in my opinion, socialism in isself is not the source of the trouble between the Soviet Union and the United States and Great Britain. Other things being equal, the two western democracies could get on with the Soviet Union more profitably than Nazi Germany did during the period of the fraudulent pact of friendship. Indeed, I expect that they will.

But that is not the point of view of the Soviet leaders. They regard themselves as custodians of the future of the world. In their opinion everything is going their way; as leaders of a Socialist state with a Communist goal, they regard themselves as the advance agents of manifest destiny. In Poland and the Balkans they believe that they are helping manifest destiny along, although the resistance is terrific from the "unenlightened," who are in the vast majority.

In their current relations with the Governments of the United States and Great Britain the Soviet leaders are not certain that they are dealing with the true representatives of the "broad masses of the peace-loving peoples." In their opinion perhaps, these Governments are to one degree or another imposed on their people by political knavery, ignorance, inertia, and the trickery of "monopoly capital."

Perhaps the Soviet Government which champions the people at the same time that it pushes them around, will be able to get behind the facade of the American and British Governments into more direct contact with the people through trade unions and political pressure organizations. And, to continue looking at things from the point of view of the Politburo, perhaps the current representatives of the United States and Great Britain are only the old guard doomed to repudiation by the people when "monopoly capital" succeeds in cutting its own throat.

Whether the Soviet Government and the Communist Party, which are virtually identical, are promoting revolutionary changes in the United States and Britain is not circumstantially known, although there is reason to believe that they are meddling in the politics of France by subsidizing and advising the French Communist Party. But one of the causes of Soviet Russia's tenacity in international affairs is that it regards socialism as the most stabilizing factor in international peace. Any deviation from Soviet policy logically becomes a threat to world peace by reactionaries who are defending a dying economic organization.

COMMUNISM ALSO A RELIGION

For communism is not only a political science but a religion, and its conduct is governed by dogma as well as by reason. The believers have to accept it without reservation. This religious fervor underlies the Soviet attitude toward foreign countries, and is assiduously cultivated at home. The modern ikons are the heroic statues and portraits of Lenin and Stalin in every public building and the huge portraits of the minor prophets carried by the believing multitudes on holidays. On great occasions the statues and images are decked with flowers or ribbons like the representations of the saints in the churches.

The literary style of Soviet propaganda overflows with religious expressions of love, gratitude, high resolves, and sacrifice for a future life. Moscow is not only the capital of Soviet Russia but the holy city of the Communist faith; and Lenin is the father and Stalin is the son. Since the Soviet Government has done so little to solve any of the human problems of living, the holy attitude it takes toward its mission in the world may seem ludicrous and fatuous.

But the parish letters to the faithful, which are the leaders on the front pages of the newspapers, solemnly declare that the Soviet Union is the most blessed nation in the world because it has embraced the one and only true faith, and that the future will overflow with love, joy, and singing.

When the Soviet representatives meet ours at the conference table they are in effect meeting the last tottering princes of original sin, and they cannot give way to us without yielding divine principle. That is one reason why the Russians are so difficult to get on with in "pagan" assemblies that do not worship Marx, Lenin, and Stalin.

What American Farmer Gains by Extension of Loan to Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM R. THOM
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, I am reproducing herewith the statement in part of Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, in behalf of the British loan, made before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee:

The American Farm Bureau Federation, of which I am president, favors congressional approval of the British loan as set forth in the agreement dated December 6, 1945, between the United States and the United Kingdom. The American Farm Bureau Federation represents approximately 1,000,000 farm families in 45 States. The American Farm Bureau Federation believes that it is good business, not only for the American farmer but for the entire Nation, to make this proposed loan to Britain. Our organization has vigorously supported efforts toward world cooperation. We believe that our interests can be served best under a system of expanding world trade. Not only is cooperation and an expanding trade important from an economic standpoint, but also from the standpoint of the over-all goal of peace among nations.

In this connection I should like to quote from our resolutions on international cooperation and leadership, and on international trade, which were adopted at the American Farm Bureau Federation annual meeting in December 1945:

"If this Nation is to make its maximum contribution in maintaining world peace and security, we must have a realistic foreign-trade policy designed to expand the volume of international trade. Not only is foreign trade necessary for sound international relationships, but it is also essential in order to maintain a higher level of industrial activity and employment here at home. * * *"

"We favor long-term capital loans to other nations of the world as a means of increasing the productive and consumptive capacities of the countries involved. Experience indicates that the countries with the higher standards of living are the best customers for American trade. Increased living standards through increased production in many countries of the world offer vast potential markets and opportunities for capital investment, to say nothing of the humanitarian aspects. We believe that in the main these loans should be on a sound business basis, and to the largest practical extent, by private capital with Government supplementing only when private capital is not available. The lending of surplus capital to foreign nations can be a sound investment which not only promotes domestic business, but also fulfills our position as a world monetary center. In addition to private business loans, we believe there are conditions, such as the present loan to England, under which the long-time interest of this Nation in promoting world trade, maintaining desirable forms of government, and promoting our best international interest can be furthered by making direct governmental loans."

On March 7, 1946 our Board of Directors, which is comprised of 22 agricultural leaders from all over the United States, again went on record favoring this loan to the United Kingdom.

I realize that many well-qualified witnesses have preceded me, so in my testimony today I am going to confine my remarks principally to why this loan to Britain is good business for the American farmer.

Foreign trade is essential to the American economy. If we are to prosper in this Nation, we must have foreign trade. During the war we expanded our agricultural and industrial production to record levels. Very soon we must face a grave domestic problem, namely, what we are to do with the expanded industrial plant which produced some 90 billion dollars worth of goods annually for war. It must be obvious to everyone that we now have the capacity to produce far more of certain goods than the home market can possibly absorb. It is quite certain that much of our added plant capacity must lie idle unless we can develop new markets to replace the limitless markets which war activities created.

A very important consideration, often disregarded, is that the welfare of agriculture depends not only upon the opportunity to export our farm surpluses, but also upon the opportunity for American industry to export a substantial part of its production. That opportunity means additional jobs in manufacturing, and additional jobs in manufacturing means better domestic markets for meat and milk, fruits and vegetables, and countless other farm products. Many of us were astounded during the war by the volume of food that American workmen consumed as a result of higher standards of living which were made possible by higher wages and full employment. Many of the additional jobs created by war demands were filled by people from the farms. Those people, for the most part, will not go back to the farms. If they do not find opportunity for continued employment in industrial activities, they will become a serious problem to the cities in which they live, and to the Nation itself. Anything we can do to increase the number of industrial jobs will be in the long-time interest of agriculture. There is no question about it, we need the additional outlets for goods and commodities which will be possible under a policy which encourages the expansion of international trade.

Since the beginning of this Nation, agricultural exports have flowed from this Nation to the United Kingdom and the nations of western Europe. Whenever this flow of agricultural products has been interfered with or checked, serious repercussions upon American agriculture and upon our entire economy resulted. This was clearly illustrated in the interwar period when loss of foreign markets contributed to a depressed agriculture which eventually affected our entire economy.

A serious contraction of trade with the United Kingdom and the sterling-area nations would result in the necessity of a sharp adjustment in the production and export pattern of certain major agricultural commodities in this country, such as cotton, tobacco, and wheat. A reduction in the trade with the sterling-area countries would likewise necessitate a readjustment in the output of our manufactured products. This Nation has taken a positive position against world cartels and undue trade restrictions. This loan to Britain is essential as a forward step in eliminating these undesirable practices.

It is realized that our most important market is our market here at home. Nevertheless, it must also be realized that the foreign market is basic to agriculture. In the decade before the war we exported 50 percent of our cotton, 31 percent of our tobacco, 18 percent of our lard, 16 percent of our rice, and 9 percent of our agricultural exports went to the farmers produce these products. Agriculture must have foreign outlets.

Britain is our best customer for agricultural exports. In 1938 approximately 35 percent of our agricultural exports went to the United Kingdom. The last year before the war Britain bought the following proportion of our exports: 18 percent of our raw cotton, 21 percent of our corn, 31 percent of our wheat, 62 percent of our lard, 72 percent of our tobacco, 84 percent of our canned fruits, and 85 percent of our hams and shoulders. In light of this evidence I need not impress further upon you gentlemen that American agriculture has a very vital stake in seeing that Britain remains a good customer. As we all know, the British Isles is a deficit food-producing area. They must import food. During the years 1936–38, 27 percent of our total exports to all nations were made up of agricultural products. During this same period 54 percent of our total exports to the United Kingdom were agricultural products. Thus our exports to the United Kingdom were weighted twice as heavily of agricultural products as they were for the world at large.

The United Kingdom is in desperate need of credit; the United Kingdom must have credit in order to rehabilitate her trade. During 6 long years of war Britain decreased her exports and increased her imports. This resulted in large obligations to the sterling-area countries. In 1944 British exports fell to 30 percent of those of prewar. In order that Britain may increase her exports again she must first import. In order to import she must obtain credit. If the credit is obtained entirely within the sterling area, she must then export and import largely within this group. This rules out the full importation of products from this Nation.

Today the United States finds itself in the position of a wholesaler whose best customer has had a fire. In this country, under such circumstances it is not uncommon for the wholesaler to extend reasonable credit to his retail customer, in order to permit the customer to get on his feet and again become a good outlet for merchandise. This is what we are doing in this loan to Britain.

Testimony in Favor of Postal Employees' Pay Increases

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, the postal employees of the United States enjoy the distinction of working for one branch of Government service that produces revenue for the Government. While Congress appropriates money for the expenses of the Post Office Department, this is one Government agency which has an income that makes it almost self-supporting.

In this connection, when Congress was considering an increase in pay for the postal employees, I appeared before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives on February 28, 1946, and submitted a statement in favor of a pay increase. This statement appears in the printed hearings of the committee and is as follows:

STATEMENT OF HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

The CHAIRMAN. Let us hear Mr. PITTENGER next.

Mr. PITTENGER. I know I am making a hit with our friend NOAH MASON by telling you I am going to extend my remarks.

I have appeared before this committee on other occasions, and somebody has suggested that it might be well to hear the Congressmen who are opposed to these proposed postal salary increases. We do not always have unanimity, but I doubt that there is anybody who wants to be heard in opposition to this pending proposal.

The ground will be fully covered; therefore I need to say only a little. This proposed increase should have been granted last year.

My appearance before this committee is nothing new for me, because in 1929 it was my pleasure to serve as a member of this distinguished committee and to become acquainted with the operations of the Post Office Department. This is the only committee that handles departmental work where the Department almost pays for its operation. Some say it does more than that. Anyway, the Post Office Department is an income-producing agency of the Government, which makes it the only such organization in the world. It stands in a different relationship on this basis than other Government departments and its employees are in a different relationship than are other Government employees.

I say that without disparaging the efficiency or indicating anything unfavorable with reference to the problems of other Government employees. Anyway, it seems to me that the postal employees stand on a different basis, but whether they do or do not I do hope that the committee passes on this pending bill or one granting a little more than the very efficient and conservative and able chairman of this committee has named. I would increase the amount proposed for these folks in order to effect a justice that has been long delayed.

As I have said, in 1929 I served as a member of this committee, and during that time I developed considerable familiarity with the problems of the postal clerks, postal carriers, and other postal employees. In fact I knew something of their struggles for fair treatment dating back some years before I entered Congress. I knew of the time when a certain Postmaster General served notice on the men employed in the Department that any attempt to contact Members of Congress for increased wages or other betterments of conditions under which they worked would result in a summary dismissal of the man involved. Of course, we have traveled a long way since that time and it is now recognized as entirely proper for these Federal employees to come before Congress and present whatever testimony they wish to support or to disapprove of any particular legislation.

On many occasions since I became a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives I have appeared before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and joined other colleagues in urging legislation that would be of help to the postal workers.

I am interested in this bill introduced by Congressman BURCH, H. R. 5059, which is all right as far as it goes. The measure is temporary in character, and since it has been introduced a number of suggestions have been made along perfectly proper lines. The bill should be amended to provide a 30-percent increase in the wages of these employees. There are other worth-while amendments which will be presented to this committee while these hearings are in progress.

Postal workers have had only one pay increase in 20 years, and during past years there has been an increased cost of living with no increase in pay to postal workers to offset the same.

This committee, as I see it, can adopt one of two alternatives. First, it can pass this temporary measure with the assurance that another bill will be presented to the committee providing for a further increase in wages and also for other changes in present legislation which relates to postal workers. I shall have no hesitation in supporting a bill which will pay the postal workers an increase which would be equivalent to $500 a year. That figure has been suggested by a great many people familiar with the subject.

The officers of the different postal groups are here and will set forth in greater detail their problems and the nature of the amendments they would like to see adopted to the pending bill.

As I said before, I want to urge early action on this matter. These men were entitled to relief last year and I regret that some bill was not passed before Congress adjourned in December.

Thank you for hearing me.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you.

Russian Realities—Doctrine of Force

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, few Americans, reporting from Moscow, have been so well equipped to judge and to tell of the realities of the Soviet scene as is Brooks Atkinson, dean of the dramatic critics of the New York Times.

Mr. Atkinson went to Moscow from China, where he had established a reputation for being very sympathetic to the efforts of the Communist minority to bring about economic and social reforms in the ancient land of the Middle Kingdom.

This reputation, honestly earned, makes ridiculous any attempt to picture Mr. Atkinson as a congenital Red baiter, or one who went to Moscow with any preconceived criticism in mind.

Also, Mr. Atkinson's long training in evaluation of human emotions gives him a measuring stick for extremely accurate appraisal of the effects of the great Kremlin experiment upon its individual subjects.

For the better understanding of our Russian friends, in their present condition, I ask leave to insert Mr. Atkinson's report on Russia in the RECORD, so that both legislators and the public may have them available:

RUSSIA BARS AMITY WITH UNITED STATES, RETURNED TIMES WRITER SAYS—EX-HEAD OF MOSCOW BUREAU FEELS ONLY "ARMED PEACE" IS FEASIBLE FOR YEARS—CALLS DOCTRINE OF FORCE INSTINCTIVE

(By Brooks Atkinson)

In the attempt to establish workable relations with the Government of the Soviet Union we have to abandon the familiar concepts of friendship. Friendship in the sense of intimate association and political compromise is not wanted, is not possible, and is not involved. For the Soviet Government "apparatus," as the Russians use the word, is a political machine; and human approaches, like those implied in the word "friendship," are wide of the mark.

On the whole, the Russian people are admirable people—genuine, hard-working, and practical. You can trust their strength, native intelligence, and courage. But between us and the Russian people stands the Soviet Government. Despite its sanctimonious use of the word "democracy," it is a totalitarian government. The familiar dictatorship of the proletariat is actually the dictatorship of the 13 members of the Politburo of the Communist Party.

There are no freedoms inside the Soviet Union. As far as I know, the Government is not imposed on the people against their will, nor is it a corrupt government that puts the personal interests of any one group ahead of what are regarded as the true interests of the state. Despite many internal disorders and disloyalties, like the factory frauds recently penalized and the treason of large groups in the Crimean and Chechen-Ingush Republics, my impression is that the people of the Soviet Union generally trust and respect the wisdom and integrity of their leaders. Like people everywhere, including the United States, the people of the Soviet Union are getting the government they deserve.

But, by nature, the Government is a machine for generating power inside the Soviet Union and as far outside as the power can be made to extend; and all attempts to deal with it in terms of friendship are doomed to failure. Although we are not enemies, we are not friends; and the most we can hope for is an armed peace for the next few years.

UNITED STATES NEEDS TO EXERT EQUAL POWER

Where our interests lie, we have to apply equal power in the opposite direction. This is the most reactionary method of arranging world affairs. But the spirit of the Soviet Government is fundamentally reactionary, as its attitude toward defeated nations and the behavior of the Red army in Manchuria suggest. Accustomed to the use of force inside the Soviet Union, the Soviet Government instinctively thinks in terms of force in its external affairs.

Westerners who have seen that force in action are shocked by the mechanical power with which it crushes opposition, builds political bases, and pushes people around. It recognizes no margin of tolerance between those who have submitted to it and those who have not. Without tolerance there can be no friendship in the western democratic sense of the word.

Why are the Russians so difficult? There are a great many reasons. One reason is that their leaders have come up the hard way as professional revolutionaries trying to win power in a hostile environment, and they still believe in the methods that succeeded in 1917. In the Czarist state, which was also a tyrannical, police state, the professional revolutionaries maintained their organization by submitting to an austere discipline; and they developed to a high degree the technique of activity in secret. Vigilance and discipline got them to power; they believe that both are necessary to developing power today.

Among other things, they agreed to the vicious doctrine that the end justifies the means—which, incidentally, may be the reason why the first socialist state in the world has not released the workers from slavery but has reduced them to totalitarian slavery that includes the mind as well as the back.

SECRECY TRADITION SURVIVES

The revolution was created in an underworld of planning, strategy, deceit, secrecy, and violence. Since by force of circumstances the revolutionaries are not lawbreakers now but are law-givers, they can afford to relax and they do. But much of the old tradition survives. They still conduct the affairs of state in secret. Soviet citizens have no more information about the current affairs of the Soviet Government than foreigners do.

In some cases they have less, because information that is not commonly known inside the Soviet Union leaks out through foreign channels. Although the most violent period of the Soviet revolution has probably passed, a streak of violence persists. No one knows how many million political prisoners are now living in jail or an exile. The estimates run all the way from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000. No government in the world has so many internal crises and problems to face as the Soviet Government, which must conduct an industrial revolution simultaneously with its political revolution, and educate its people swiftly and effectively.

To survive, it believes that it must be free to conduct its affairs in secret and to act swiftly, by force if necessary. It naturally carries the same psychology into the satellite States where people are less used to that kind of treatment from a foreign source. In our relations with the Soviet Union we are dealing with men who have been conditioned in this revolutionary environment—some of them as active participants, all of them as adherents.

In view of the success of the Soviet Government inside the huge area of the Soviet Union, it is a little difficult for foreigners to understand the feeling of insecurity that the Soviet leaders have. Premier Stalin is probably the most heavily guarded person in the world. Every Soviet citizen as well as every foreigner has to carry with him at all times his passport and personal identification papers, and he has to make frequent use of them. What we regard as wartime security methods are the daily security methods of the Soviet Union. To get to the Red square for a celebration you have to show your special pass and ordinary passport to eighth guards, all of whom read it thoroughly, and compare the photograph with the bearer.

No foreigner knows much about what goes on throughout the length and breadth of the Soviet Union; as Paul Winterton has expressed it, there are only varying degrees of ignorance about the Soviet Union. But I know of no active, organized opposition to the Government, although it is rumored that "certain circles" (a common Soviet newspaper phrase) in the Ukraine are restless and need watching.

"Certain circles" there are said to believe that they have paid too high a price for the war and, no doubt irrationally, hold the present Government responsible for their disasters. The imposing Communist headquarters in Odessa was burned last December in a fire that is thought to have been sabotage. There is active antisemitism in the Ukraine. In other parts of Russia, not all the Moslems are satisfied with the central government. But the central government should be able to cope with dissident groups. As far as a foreigner can tell, the Soviet leaders are in a strong position. They have led their people to a remarkable victory over an efficient, modern foe; and the Communist Party is naturally taking full credit for winning the war—in various degrees ignoring the contributions the other Allies made to the defeat of Germany, and taking credit for the knock-out blow against Japan.

PEOPLE HAVE FAITH IN REGIME

Apart from normal grumbling about the hardness of living, the people seem to believe in their Government. But it is not in the nature of men like members of the Politburo to feel secure. As leaders of a backward, poorly fed, loosely organized country that is trying to lift itself by its bootstraps in a hurry, they have many unpleasant duties to perform and many labors to lay on the backs of their people. No doubt they feel that the circumstances require that they have freedom to act at the top without criticism, opposition or observation. Although their motives may be above suspicion, they behave instinctively like conspirators. Their behavior abroad is the same as it is at home, except that they do not have abroad the protection of a controlled press and the means of silencing opposition.

Part of our difficulties with the Soviet Union are owing to the ignorance of the Soviet leaders. Very few of them have been outside the Soviet Union. After many years of isolation, and also some bitter experiences with foreign countries, they have developed a phobia about the rest of the world. The spirit of the Soviet Government is anti-foreign. Ever since the bloody purges of 1936 there has been a nameless terror about foreigners, who are regarded as spies and enemies of the Soviet Union.

Association with foreigners and active interest in foreign countries has in some vague way come to be regarded as treachery to the Soviet Union. Even the leaders are not immune. Leaders who get on too well with foreigners or who rationalize foreign points of view are treading on dangerous ground. They may find themselves in the doghouse before they know it.

STALIN POSSIBLY IS UNINFORMED

Even Mr. Stalin, who is regarded as having more common sense and balance than most Soviet leaders, does not understand freedom or democracy; in addition to his training in the doctrines of Marxism, he probably develops his ideas about foreign countries from prejudiced and incomplete information supplied by Soviet diplomats and journalists.

The Soviet leaders are the victims of their isolationism. Although they have access to an enormous mass of information from abroad, they lack the experience to analyze it. Having lived all their lives behind the "iron curtain" (a marvelously apt phrase), they cannot meet foreign problems or foreigners on what we regard as a normal basis. Contact with foreigners has in many ambiguous ways acquired the illusion of guilt. Since the peace of the world is at stake, the pity is that so many of our day-to-day frictions are unnecessary.

After the Moscow Conference of last December, many foreigners believe that the Politburo made a deliberate decision to return to the status quo ante bellum and to regard foreign nations with a capitalist economy as inevitable enemies of the Soviet Union. Whatever the sincerity of such a point of view may be, it obviously creates inside the Soviet Union an atmosphere that is easier for a dictatorship to dominate. It is easier to rule a people who believe that a hostile world is organizing to exterminate them. As we have learned by our own experience during the war, people work better when they believe that they are working to save their national life.

The Church and Economic Tensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent having been granted so to do, I have pleasure in placing in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter to me dated June 26, 1946, from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, together with a significant statement by that group of Christian men and women dated March 1946.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS DIVISION,
New York, N. Y., June 26, 1946.

Hon. CLYDE DOYLE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America adopted the enclosed statement on the Church and Economic Tensions at its special meeting at Columbus, Ohio, March 5–7, 1946. This body of nearly 500 delegates represented 25 of the denominations of this country.

I believe that you will find the full statement of interest. Because of its relevance to issues that are currently before the Congress in a special way, I am noting particularly section 9.

I am,

Respectfully yours,

CAMERON P. HALL.

THE CHURCH AND ECONOMIC TENSIONS

The confusion and uncertainty which exist widely today in regard to desirable purposes, principles and methods in the economic aspects of our common life, lead us to express what we believe should constitute the approach of those who seek to be sincere followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. We are convinced that—

1. It should be the endeavor of Christian people to consider these matters on a level higher than that of group partisanship and in the light of their understanding of Christian teaching.

2. It is the duty of the churches, pastors and people, to seek to arouse the conscience of the Nation on all matters involving moral principles.

3. The social ideals of the churches as previously adopted by the Federal council constitute a general statement on these subjects which continues to be of enduring value.

4. Two specific actions are even more significant now than when they were originally adopted.

A. At the 1944 biennial, the council voted to "urge our Government to establish permanent procedures for securing the objectives which have been sought by the Committee on Fair Employment Practice," believing that "discrimination in employment because of race, creed, or national origin is one of the great moral issues before our Nation today."

B. In November 1945 the executive committee voted to favor "an increase of the minimum wage to 65 cents an hour with 75 cents an hour after 2 years, in order to provide for our lowest paid workers, under present conditions, an adequate American standard of living," believing that "the current provision of 40 cents an hour or $16 for a 40-hour week in the Fair Labor Standards Act is wholly inadequate under present costs of living."

5. As investors of funds in substantial amounts and as employers of labor in considerable numbers, the churches have an opportunity to demonstrate the Christian ethic at vital points in the economic order. The fact that they are exempt from the pressures of competitive enterprise and largely exempt from taxation, puts them in a favored position and invites them to exercise leadership in matters of investment and employment. Too often however the economic policies of the churches reflect an uncritical attitude similar to that of the less enlightened portion of the business community.

As stewards before God the churches carry a responsibility in the administration of their funds that includes but goes beyond prudence as to their financial soundness and the rate of return on their investments; it involves in a particular way the exercise of the Christian conscience and of understanding in relation to the social character of the purposes, policies, and practices of the economic undertakings in which the funds are invested. The freedom to choose from among investment possibilities is an important element in the choices that determine the effectiveness of the testimony of the churches to the Christian ethic.

The lives of many lay persons are joined to the churches in the employer-employee relationship. There are relatively few churches that do not have at least a part-time helper, and in many instances the denominations, in their national and area offices, in their printing establishments and elsewhere, employ large numbers of employees. This means labor practices based upon labor policies, which should reflect vigorous examination and revision in the light of the principles made manifest in the faith which the churches proclaim. The churches have an obligation to support by their own example the highest standards in such matters as wages, hours, vacation provisions, and labor-management relations.

6. All Christians recognize the higher ethical value inherent in the cooperative as over against the competitive motive and that as cooperation is emphasized and competition subordinated we approach more nearly to the teachings of Jesus. We therefore encourage the extension of cooperative techniques and other similar means of bringing about economic justice and brotherhood.

7. Since our churches affirm both the priesthood of all believers and also the sacredness of all vocations, proper for Christians, one of their major tasks today is to give vocational guidance in terms of God's activity through men in their various vocations.

All Christians, whether in lay tasks or in ecclesiastical service, share exactly the same necessity for sacrifice for the Christian cause, and receive like spiritual rewards. Corporations and cooperatives also have responsibilities, commensurate with their powers, for serving the common good, and for making it possible for their employees to do likewise through their labor.

Christian education should not only train students to serve humanity, but it should reveal more clearly the need of a more equitable distribution of personnel to lands which now suffer from lack of Christian workers.

Inasmuch as many people tend to accept their vocational ethics from the secular world, the churches should help them revaluate their vocations in terms of Christian service, putting human welfare before one's own profit. Christians of all vocations should be joined in a fellowship of sacrifice, distinguished from the secular world around them.

The churches should emphasize the sacredness of personality lest men become pawns, exploited for profit, or pushed about for convenience, instead of being regarded as having the right to be workers together with God, and should lay constant stress upon this principle of the stewardship of life.

In view of the tragic shortage of full-time Christian workers, we would call to the attention of those who are responsible for vocational guidance in schools and colleges the desirability of their pointing out the possibilities of life service through the church, as well as of interpreting all vocations in Christian terms.

8. The nature of man and the structure of modern industrial society have caused the right to an opportunity for employment at an equitable wage to become a basic right. The responsibility for assuring full employment therefore rests upon all people as members of management, organized labor, agricultural, consumer, and other groups, and through their Government. We welcome the recently enacted Employment Production Act as a significant step in the right direction.

9. The strategy which labor and management follow in industrial disputes should be adopted in full recognition that consequences of their decisions may extend far beyond the locality or area immediately involved, and transcend the interests of the two parties. In our interdependent national economy the outcome of a major industrial dispute is so affected with a public interest that an early and constructive settlement is imperative. This calls for the maximum exercise of self-discipline on the part of both management and labor.

We reaffirm labor's right to strike, and we recognize the long-term benefits which the acknowledgment of this right has brought both to labor and to the public. But we urge the moral obligation that rests upon labor and management always to enter into and carry on collective bargaining in good faith, and to utilize fully such methods of settlement as conciliation, mediation, and arbitration. Furthermore, added democratic procedures should be established whereby the essential interests of labor, management, investors, and consumers may be better safeguarded.

10. On the international level economic justice and brotherhood are essential to world peace and order. It is always easier to state these principles than it is to find the public response to implement them. Therefore the churches should seek more earnestly to discharge their responsibility of educating their people so that these principles will be established in the community, the nations, and the world.

11. In addition to these matters, on which we believe a broad Christian consensus exists, other questions press upon the Christian conscience with new urgency, questions calling for earnest study. Among them are these: The role of government in maintaining economic and industrial stability; the problem of preserving a maximum of economic freedom while guaranteeing a "floor" of economic security; the ever-recurring question whether the pursuit of profit, in the sense of a reward beyond compensation for work done, can be reconciled with Christian principles; the extent to which wage determination properly involves assumptions concerning profit and price levels; the merits of organized labor's demand for union security; and ways in which conflict between economic groups can be kept within manageable limits without curtailing essential freedoms.

These questions are not external to Christian ethics: they are issues which the Christian conscience cannot evade. We therefore urge full cooperation by the membership of our churches in the currently announced study of the relation of Christianity to the economic order by the Department of Research and Education. Only by patient and conscientious inquiry, conducted in all humility and directed toward discovering the will of God, can we find our way through the complex issues of our day.

Exploitation of Veterans by Rightist Blocs Expected

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an article which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of Boston on Monday, July 8, 1946, in which reference is made to the very able statement of Prof. James H. Sheldon, administrative chairman of the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League.

EXPLOITATION OF VETERANS BY RIGHTIST BLOCS EXPECTED

NEW YORK, July 8.—Groups calling themselves nationalist but charged with aggressive and subversive activities are out to capture as much as they can of the tremendous political potential represented by the 13,000,000 veterans of World War II.

Operating behind the facades of veterans' organizations, these extreme right-wing groups give evidence of exploiting for their own political ends the economic and social dislocations of the postwar period.

This fringe of the veterans' movement seeks to capitalize on the frustrations and difficulties of a veteran's experience on his return home—his inability to buy clothes, find a place to live, the reduced power of his savings. Most of these individuals and groups lure prospective members with big bonus promises—reaching as high as $7,800 for each veteran.

Names well known in extremist circles crop up in the sponsorship of some of the new veterans' organizations. Among them are Gerald L. K. Smith, leader of the America First Party; Edward James Smythe, who was indicted in wartime for sedition; Joe McWilliams, Christian Front leader, and others.

ONLY FRACTION OF VETERANS

Membership in these veteran organizations represents only a fraction of the total veteran figures, according to spokesmen for the Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League and Friends of Democracy, which keep careful check on the activities of such organizations.

Pursuing a familiar party line, the hypernationalist veterans organizations are bitterly opposed to the United Nations, Russia, labor, and religious groups at variance with their own. Anti-Semitism and race hatred are also prominent features in their program.

In reporting on the full employment bill, the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency recently quoted from a statement submitted to the Committee by Prof. James H. Sheldon, administrative chairman of the anti-Nazi league:

"Every evidence indicates that the known leaders of nationalist, anti-Semitic, anti-Catholic, Ku Klux Klan-like, and other subversive movements in this country are looking forward to a possible period of unemployed defense workers and jobless veterans as a time for reaping a golden harvest.

AGITATOR'S FERTILE FIELD

"The Nazi or nationalist agitator finds a fertile field for his activities in any group of jobless men and women—and he always is at pains, as his first move toward ensnaring their minds, to promise them money, jobs, and security. His next move is to blame their unhappy condition upon the shortcomings of democracy, or upon some minority or different religious or racial group—whether Jews, Catholics, Negroes, Italians, Mexicans, or whatever group will most conveniently serve as a scapegoat."

Apparently the most conspicuous nationalist in the scramble to enlist veteran support is Mr. Smith. He has formed the Christian War Veterans headed by Frederick Kister, prewar associate editor of the isolationist Scribner's Commentator.

Mr. Smith was formerly associated with Senator Huey Long, the Louisiana dictator. Mr. Smith's America First Party has become the political catch-all for a wide variety of nationalist organizations of which the Christian War Veterans is an offshoot.

SMITH'S INTENTIONS

Mr. Smith has made his plan clear:

"My time will come in the postwar period. In 1948 * * * if business conditions are bad * * * then my candidate (a young veteran of this war) will be elected and the extreme nationalists will come into power."

Edward James Smythe has revived his long-established Protestant War Veterans of the United States in an effort to capture support of World War II veterans.

A frequent speaker at Ku Klux Klan and German-American Bund meetings before the war, Mr. Smythe was indicted in 1942 for conspiracy to violate the Sedition Act. He has not been brought to trial.

Joe McWilliams, formerly active in the Christian Front, formed the servicemen's reconstruction plan and proposed to give veterans a bonus of $7,800. The McWilliams organization has, apparently, been inactive for some months.

BUNDLIKE, ANTI-SEMITIC

A New York organization, the German-American War Veterans, with headquarters in Yorkville, has yet to prove whether it will confine itself to its announced program of social activities and goodfellowship. A person who attended one of the first organizational meetings said it had all the atmosphere of prewar bund meetings. Speeches were heavily laden with anti-Semitism and denunciation of other minorities, praise for the "correct" behavior of the German occupation armies, attacks on the "demoralized" actions of American occupation troops. Speakers emphasized the need to preserve German culture by organizing all German-American veterans.

Russian Realities—Official Frenzy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the essential humanity of the Russian people, and the frantic efforts needed for the Soviet government to keep them subject and deceived are plainly shown by the two following articles. The first is by Brooks Atkinson, who returned from an 8-month stay in Moscow only last May. The second is the official reaction to his factual report on his sojourn in Soviet Russia, which appeared in Pravda, the organ of the only political party permitted in the Russias—the Communist Party. Pravda, of course, corresponds in its "line" and "party regularity" to our domestic Daily Worker, published in New York. It is what the Daily Worker would be if both Republican and Democratic parties were abolished, their leaders sent to labor camps—or shot—and all other newspapers suppressed.

Comparison of these two statements is a basic lesson for those who want to "understand the Russians."

For this purpose, I ask leave to insert them in the RECORD.

SOVIET SEEN WANTING PEACE DESPITE ITS AIR OF CHALLENGE—BOGEY OF CAPITALIST SERFDOM BEHIND "IRON CURTAIN" VIEWED AS HIDING DEFECTS IN RUSSIA—PEOPLE ARE DYNAMIC

(By Brooks Atkinson)

In one respect, we and the leaders of the Soviet Union heartily agree: that the maintenance of peace depends upon peaceable relations between them and us. In view of their many problems, their war weariness and the wounds of the war that have not yet healed, they are eager for peace. They know more than we do about the horrors of war. Although they do not give us much credit for our share in the victory, that is no reason why we should withhold from them credit and admiration for their magnificent war record. Nor should we forget for a moment that their people have suffered painfully and are suffering still.

But, to eliminate as much as possible extraneous emotional factors, we should follow the Soviet leadership by ridding our minds of any assumption that peaceful relations are identical with friendship. Americans are likely to imagine that people in the rest of the world trust us, like us, envy us, and probably want to borrow some money from us.

Only the last of these things is true of the Soviet leaders. They do want to borrow money from us to accelerate the tempo of the current 5-year plan. Americans would probably regard a loan to Russia as a gesture in friendship. The leaders of the Soviet Union would have no such sentimental feeling.

Refusing a loan to them after making loans to Great Britain, China, France, Poland, and other countries would probably be interpreted as an act of hostility on the part of a chaotic, irresponsible, spendthrift country dominated by reactionaries. Relief shipments to a country that has an antiforeign government should reflect nothing more devious than the humanitarian impulses of the American people. The Russian people living in the areas devastated by the Germans sorely need help, get what is sent, and are grateful for it.

But it should not be expected that relief shipments will alter in any way the austere and detached attitude of the Soviet Government, which, as a matter of fact, would like to be in a position to provide for its people without foreign assistance. Russia's isolationism cannot be broken down by munificence from abroad. For any man with self-respect in any part of the world resents, if he does not actually dislike, Father Bountiful, who, to tell the truth, has a sort of smug expression.

WE CANNOT BUY FRIENDSHIP

Father Bountiful cannot purchase friendship with his surplus food stocks and worn-out clothing; nor can Father Bountiful break down the stone wall of censorship or establish the free exchange of scientists, professors, artists, and students or promote free travel throughout the Soviet Union by footloose Americans.

All these things seem to us casual and normal and the only basis for mutual understanding. But it is a matter of deliberate policy on the part of the Soviet Government to eliminate foreign influences during the period when it is trying to develop socialism in a conditioned climate.

Although the Soviet Union is challenging the rest of the world, it cannot afford to compete with the rest of the world or let its people know that in the wesern democracies people not only have civil freedoms, but very much higher standards of living. The myth of persecution of the worker by monopoly capital would disappear if free association were permitted with the common people of the West.

Despite all these impediments to pleasant and easy relations—despite the truculence, the tenacity, the cries of persecution, or the injured silences, despite the flamboyant retirements from unfavorable sessions of the United Nations—the Russians really do not want to lose friends throughout the world, nor build up resistance. They do not want to defy world opinion. Sometimes they are surprised by the vehemence of criticism from abroad.

TURKEY'S NERVES STEADY

Accustomed to tyrannical police control at home, they are surprised when milder versions of totalitarian tyranny produce screams of protest in Poland and the Balkans and bellows of righteous indignation from such remote citadels of "monopoly capital" as England and the United States. Public opinion from abroad forced Russia to withdraw from Iran, although there was nothing concrete then, and there is nothing concrete now, to prevent the Soviet from adding Iran to its satellite nations. Russia has the troops and the techniques to take Iran any time she wants to range the rest of the world solidly against her.

In the flush of victory last autumn the Russians opened a war of nerves against Turkey. Russia had enormous military strength in the vicinity, as she still has, and have "liberate" Turkey from Turkish sovereignty, although not without fighting. But Turkey's nerves were strong, public opinion abroad began to grow restless, and the United States, taking a bland part in the war of nerves, sent a powerful battleship to Turkey bearing the ashes of a former Turkish Ambassador, as well as a few unspoken implications.

It would be foolish to assume that the Soviet has written Iran and Turkey off the agenda. Some day the Soviet Government may be willing to pay the cost in world prestige or consider that the price has fallen, for the whole Near East is shaky. But at present the Russians do not want to defy the rest of the world.

From time to time during my stay in Moscow I used to test the censor's alertness by unobtrusively inserting the following sardonic remarks into my dispatches: "The Soviet foreign policy is very human. The Soviets want to remain on good terms with the whole world and meet with no resistance anywhere." The censor was always keen enough to remove those mischievous sentences. It was a game we played; he was always the winner.

In spite of the ironic phrasing, there is a decent trace of truth in that assertion. Matters of right and wrong are not of much consequence in power politics anywhere at any time. But at present the Russians do not want to let loose the whirlwind that might blow up another war.

UNITED STATES, RUSSIA BOTH TITANS

In these articles I have suggested some of the reasons why the Russians are so difficult to get on with in international affairs. If we are not friends, neither are we enemies. But whether we like it or not, we are competitors for influence on the rest of the world. Marxism is ultimately a program for the whole world. Being doctrinaire Marxists, the leaders of the Soviet Union naturally see our relationship in those terms, and we may as well keep the whole thing in perspective by looking at the future with their point of view in mind.

There is no reason why we should feel complacent despite the backwardness of Russia and the low standards of living there. For Russia is potentially the most powerful nation in the world. She embraces a huge land mass that occupies the pivotal position between Europe and Asia. She has immense natural resources. She has comparatively unlimited manpower. As a totalitarian government, the Soviet leaders can make highly effective use of their manpower (which is also womanpower), and their workers ought to become more efficient as time goes on.

By and large, the Russian people are not only strong but decent, according to their standards of patriotism and devotion. The lack of what we regard as vital freedom does not distress them, for they do not know what western freedoms are.

As a matter of personal faith, I believe that freedom is more creative than dictatorship. Our record in the war, I think, proves it. Now that the war is over, there is no point in congratulating ourselves on our achievements in field and factory. But at least we have concrete evidence that under certain circumstances that threaten our freedoms the United States can organize and achieve a national goal. Although our manpower is more limited than the combined man and woman power of Russia, it is still very large.

RUSSIAN PEOPLE FRIENDLY

We, too, have abundant natural resources, and our geographical position is also strategic. In international competition, our greatest asset is the high level of technical skill. Man for man, our population is infinitely more productive in the factory and on the farm. But in peacetime we are not organized for maximum production. Many other human considerations come first. Nor can we guarantee our people economic security.

It is true that there is no unemployment in the Soviet Union, although work is not in any sense a matter of individual choice, and every job is immensely overmanned. In competition with Russia, which is a dynamic force in the world, we have to maintain our supremacy by growth that is also dynamic. We have to increase production and raise standards of living on a dynamic scale. Our basic problem is how to organize for maximum production without infringing on the Bill of Rights. How thoroughly can we organize for the common good without curtailing human freedoms? Speaking as one American citizen, I don't know. What I do know is that the problem is there.

After 10 months in Moscow I started for home a month ago very low in mind. On a basis of personal experiences and personal observations, I could see no prospect of cordial relations with the great power of Europe and Asia. To put it in the simplest terms, that is a pity because it would be pleasant and enriching to have friendly association with these people.

My wife and I traveled in a Soviet plane from an excellent modern airdrome in Moscow to Odessa, by way of Kiev. The plane was a Russian version of our Douglas transport, and contrary to what many Americans report about Soviet flying, the whole flight was managed with a high degree of skill, comfort, and dispatch. We enjoyed the other passengers, as we always enjoyed being with any group of Russian people. They had a warm family feeling toward each other, and it reached out a little to include us.

Little courtesies were extended to us now and then; they proved that although we could not join the family, we were not excluded. These are small things, but they represent my experience with Russian people apart from officers of the Government, and they confirm my belief that the Russian people are sincere and good-hearted. It is a pity, perhaps it will be a tragedy, that as a nation we have to live with the Russian Nation in an atmosphere of bitterness and tension. But we have to. There is no other way.

PRAVDA CASTIGATES ATKINSON AS A "BANDIT" NOT FIT TO WHIP—AUTHOR OF TIMES SERIES ON SOVIET IS VILIFIED AS SAVAGE AND "UNTALENTED CALUMNIATOR" HIRED TO "FAN ENMITY" IN THE WORLD

Moscow, July 11.—Today's issue of Pravda, official organ of the Soviet Union's Communist Party, carried a column-and-a-half article by David Zaslavsky, political commentator, criticizing the series of articles by Brooks Atkinson, published in the New York Times this week. The Pravda commentary headed "An untalented calumniator," follows in full:

"The owners of large capitalist enterprises for the manufacture and distribution of the daily news—large newspaper publishing houses and telegraph agencies—have circulated an invention regarding a certain 'iron curtain' dividing the Soviet Union from the rest of the universe.

"It is coupled with demands from these same enterprises for unlimited liberty in the concoction and dissemination of newspaper commodities in all countries. For which purpose, informers of these enterprises must possess a sort of diplomatic immunity and complete irresponsibility in absolutely all countries of the world, including the Soviet Union, in which, as it is known, there are no capitalist industrial and commercial enterprises.

"We are in position to exhibit such an informer. It is Mr. Atkinson. He is a commercial traveler for the firm of the New York Times. For 10 months he supplied his firm with news from the Soviet Union, and now, back in his home country, he is concocting this news in the office itself.

"Atkinson declares there is an 'iron curtain.' He considers that this is 'a marvelously apt phrase.'

"Thus jumps up in front of American readers a man who for 10 months had been living behind the notorious curtain. Isn't this sensational! With pricked-up ears and eyes popping, gullible Americans are all burning to learn the secrets of the world behind the curtain.

"However, profound disenchantment awaits them.

"Behind the veil Atkinson did not see anything novel that he had not known previously. He says with wonderful authority: 'There are no new ideas in Moscow. All the old ones are reiterated with stupefying regularity. * * * The general level of theater, art, and music is low. * * * On the whole, there is no vitality in the arts. They are reactionary and moribund.'

ART BACKGROUND IS DOUBTED

"These words prove that 'our correspondent' in one of the New York establishments understands as much in ideas and art as any other 'our own correspondent' from a Chicago meat-packing plant understands about oranges.

"But let Atkinson keep his esthetics and philosophy to himself. It is important, however, that he was bored by Moscow. He didn't see anything new and that which he did see he thought was ancient and reactionary.

"But in this case, wherefore the 'iron curtain'?

"We see that Atkinson repeatedly beats his own records of absurd inventions. At every step.

"And it is for this that the man came from America and lounged in Moscow for 10 months! But he not only saw nothing but couldn't see anything at all. He did not desire to see. The reason he became 'our own correspondent' was just to refresh the stale and ancient slander, nearly 30 years old, with the label of a new 'our own' manufacture.

BOSSES' INFLUENCE SEEN

"And he knows himself that behind the 'iron curtain' he didn't see anything but that which his bosses expected from him; he knows full well that there is no such thing as an 'iron curtain.' And for this reason, he, in the long run, fabricates the following news: "'* * * There is reason to believe that they (the Russians) are meddling in the politics of France by subsidizing and advising the French Communist Party.'

"It is just here, by these foulest of words, that Atkinson has given the last touch to his portrait as one of these very 'informers' that capitalist newspaper owners wish to have obtain untrammeled entrance to all corners of the globe.

"For instance, behind the iron curtain he saw the Russian people. Atkinson scatters compliments: 'On the whole, the Russian people are admirable people—genuine, hard-working, and practical. You can trust their strength, native intelligence, and courage.'

"Atkinson also saw behind the iron curtain that the Soviet Government enjoys the full support of the people. He says: '* * * the people of the Soviet Union generally trust and respect the wisdom and integrity of their leaders. * * * I know of no active, organized opposition to the government. * * *'

ALLEGED CONTRADICTION ASSAILED

"With this confession Atkinson himself kills the absurd invention of the iron curtain. To save it, he there and then adds: 'There are no freedoms inside the Soviet Union'; that democracy does not exist in the Soviet country, but that there exists totalitarianism. He repeats ancient and hackneyed gossip, not noticing the awkward and funny position he places himself in.

"His discourse on the Soviet Union is a phantasmagoria of phrases, each one better than the other. It is a quadrille, in which one pair of ideas dances against the other. It is no ordinary calumny but untalented calumny. If there are no liberties in the country, then how can a wise, strong, and courageous people trust their Government? And how can a people be wise, strong, and courageous if they be alien to democracy? Here not only do the ends not tie but in general there is neither end nor beginning. It is the delirium of an impudent person bearing responsibility neither to conscience nor to logic.

"Only a person mercenary from head to heels can write so of the French Communist party. For Atkinson there do not exist any relations in the world other than those of purchasing and selling. It would be absolutely useless to tell this savage that it was not for the sake of money, not for personal profit, that the best people of France waged heroic war against the German invaders, that there exist such feelings and conceptions as patriotism.

"Atkinsons do not comprehend this word. Their depraved souls do not have any understanding of feelings and conceptions that are not measured by dollars and cents. Atkinson can sell himself to whom he pleases, and he judges the entire world by himself.

PRODUCT OF STOCK EXCHANGE

"Can this product of the Stock Exchange and black market understand that the party that united a considerable part of the French people does not need any outside instructions and would not tolerate such instructions? No, he is used to judging individuals by 'how many dollars they are worth.' And, in the same way, using the Stock Exchange yardstick, he judges nations, democratic parties, and historical events. If Atkinson were a historian, he would investigate the question of how much Napoleon was paid to lose the battle of Waterloo.

"If he were a literary scholar, he would search all sources for an answer to the question of how much Romeo paid Juliet for her love.

"This is the kind of scum for whom newspaper capital-monopolists demand 'freedom of the press.' They demand complete liberty for slander and lies. They desire to establish as international law, irresponsibility for avowed rogues and bandits of the pen. In the United States, in his editorial office, the despicable Atkinson is free from all obligation to present facts; he is free from all responsibility.

DISCERNS PRESS "BANDITISM"

"How can you influence him? He is just as free of all honor as he is free of all logic. In the old days, you did not challenge such persons to duels, because their villainy made them incapable of dueling. Such persons were not even beaten, so as not to stain one's hands.

"It is the Americans' own affair if they tolerate in their country newspaper banditism under the mask of 'freedom of the press.' but it would be naive to think that other peoples will be gulled by this production of the capitalist-newspaper world and will trustfully open their doors to Mister Atkinsons.

"These gentlemen are dangerous. They are hired for the express purpose of fanning enmity between nations and undermining the cause of peace. Their despised profession consists in this—untalented calumniation. Atkinson frankly let that cat out of the bag, which the organizers of a new war are trying to hide behind their holy curtain.

"A journey to the Soviet Union, a 10 months' stay, unpardonable lies and senseless hash about the 'iron curtain'—all this was necessary to tell American readers: 'In the attempt to establish workable relations with the Soviet Union we have to abandon the familiar concepts of friendship. Friendship in the sense of intimate association and political compromise is not wanted, is not possible and is not involved.'

"Hence, Atkinson's conclusion is that the American Nation, in its relations with the Soviet Union, must 'apply equal power.'

"Slander and blackmail—these are the weapons of Atkinson and his kind.

"Our poet long ago wrote about such calumniators:

"'A slanderer and untalented,
He finds blows, by instinct led,
And lying every month,
He earns his daily bread.'

"It is appropriate to say of Mr. Atkinson—that he gets his salary every month and lies every day."

Dairy Products Should Remain Decontrolled

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, since the OPA bill was vetoed by the President and later the old act died a natural death at midnight, June 30, 1946, the producers and those dealing in dairy products have demonstrated that dairy products should remain decontrolled.

Generally speaking, the prices of dairy products have remained at the former OPA ceiling price as of June 30, 1946, plus subsidies, and in some cases they are selling for less than the ceiling plus the subsidy.

The hated black market has almost completely passed out of the picture. The supply is ample, and the people are now able to buy dairy products at former OPA ceiling prices plus subsidies, which should be recognized as a legitimate procedure.

Of course it always takes a little time for readjustments. But the leveling off has taken less time than was originally anticipated. No one should object to paying the price that was determined by OPA as being a fair selling price on a given commodity, plus the subsidies that were being paid the producers and distributors out of the taxpayers' money or out of money being borrowed by Uncle Sam from our citizens. This is paying as we go. It is eminently better than passing ever-increasing debts to future generations. It is cowardly for this generation not to pay its way as it goes. We should be willing to pay for what we get and pay for it now, and not unload a part of our grocery bills on posterity. In the long run we will profit greatly, for we will be rid of the heavy burden upon our people occasioned by keeping on our pay rolls the 34,000 salaried OPA employees.

It should make all of us feel like real Americans to realize that we are able to obtain these dairy products when we want and need them—and they are in plentiful supply now. Shortage cannot be used as an excuse for reimposing controls in this instance. Then we too feel relieved that we are not having to pay black-market premiums and being subjected to artificial scarcity resulting from bureaucratic regimentation and control.

Mr. Speaker, I am just in receipt of a letter from the Tulsa manager of a large dairy-products company of Oklahoma, which expresses the situation with reference to dairy products in northeastern Oklahoma, since the death of OPA. This letter sets forth in clear, cogent, and convincing style the reasons dairy products should not be placed back under any OPA, or price-control bill that Congress may pass. I am pleased to quote the entire letter, as follows:

JULY 1, 1946.

Hon. GEORGE B. SCHWABE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is our desire to have you oppose the return of dairy products to OPA control, and we set forth the following reasons for our request:

(1) To reinstate subsidy payments now, instead of cash, and to roll back the cash prices would be extremely discouraging to the producers and would undoubtedly discourage production.

(2) Dairy products are selling at about OPA ceiling as of June 30, plus subsidy, and in some cases they are less.

(3) Since the ending of OPA, black market in the dairy products has been eliminated.

(4) In several States in the United States authorities sanctioned the increase in the price of milk to offset the subsidy.

(5) The opinion in the Oklahoma dairy circles is that markets will not go higher than at present. Some are of the opinion that next year prices will average lower than ceiling prices plus subsidies.

The Oklahoma dairy prices remained the same from 1942 until June 8, 1946, and this increase in price was given by OPA to cover increased ceiling prices to producers. During this period the processors have been faced with increased labor, supplies, and material costs.

These are some of the reasons for which we ask the continued decontrol of dairy products. We believe that with the continued decontrol of dairy products it will be an incentive to the producers to produce more milk and will eventually take care of the price by the law of supply and demand.

We trust that we will receive your support on the above subject.

Sincerely,

H. D. JOHNSTON, Manager.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, there is one question on which there seems to be no disagreement and that is the basic theory that the long-range antidote to inflation is production. If we can get our economy to a point where it once more is producing consumer goods in abundance, we shall be able to abandon price regulation and leave the determination of prices to the free competition of the market place.

Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, demonstrates a clear grasp of the situation in a message he delivered to members of his union regarding inflation control. He said:

Our major need is increased volume of production. Our safety lies in getting through this period of transition with no major increases in costs or stoppages of production. Major changes will be cumulative in effect and may start the chain of dangerous inflation. Wage earners can best stabilize their wage dollars by helping to increase volume of production which can wipe out the scarcities and the danger of runaway inflation.

This is an admirable statement and Mr. Green again shows that he has a keen understanding of our economic problem and proves that he is worthy of the trust placed in him by a great labor union. Any price-control law that does not expedite full production of the items controlled will fail in its purpose.

Another Treasury Vagary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, the editorial which appeared in the New York Journal-American in its issue of July 11, 1946, entitled "Another Treasury Vagary" presents an accurate analysis of the Treasury proposal. I am inserting the editorial under leave to extend:

ANOTHER TREASURY VAGARY

Little noticed in the controversy over the OPA has been a suggestion from the Treasury Department that Federal taxes might be increased as a measure against inflation if price controls are not restored exactly as the New Deal wants them to be.

The intimation was just OPA propaganda and not very good propaganda at that.

It was plainly intended to frighten taxpayers into supporting the OPA, regardless of its defects, in order to keep their own tax bills down.

As a financial measure, New Deal taxation as a counterinflationary influence would have no economic value and would cause a great deal of economic damage.

The theory behind the threat—an old one—is that taxes can be applied to take excess money out of the possession of the public so that it may not be spent for goods and services and thus bid prices up.

The money that actually causes inflationary pressures is in the hands of millions of consumers—meaning largely wage and salary earners—and the bulk of this money is either in the low income-tax brackets or else is exempt from any income taxation at all.

A large portion of it, also, is not savings but current income.

Consequently, in order to tax inflation out of existence the New Deal would have to tax heavily the very groups on which it depends for votes.

There would have to be a Government check-off in the pay envelope of every labor union member many times greater than the present withholding taxes.

The standard of living of these people would suffer in the same degree as their taxes were increased; and they would be sure to visit their resentment upon the New Deal at the polls.

Of course the New Deal would try to avoid this dilemma.

It would spare the workers and thus fail to reduce inflation in any degree.

The tax increases would fall upon the relatively small surtax-income groups, which is not where the inflationary problem lies.

The largest incomes are now being virtually confiscated by income taxes.

Any substantial increase would wipe these incomes out entirely, and would reduce still further the real incomes of the middle class.

The surplus funds of these classes—if they have any—are not used as inflationary spending money, affecting the general situation, but as investment money, either directly or through savings accounts and insurance; and to the extent that investment money is absorbed by taxation, business expansion is retarded or prevented.

Logically, there would be no new industries established and little or no growth of old industries, and new employment would be brought to a stop.

There would be fewer jobs for workers.

And, in the end, the Government itself would lose, since business concerns provide a large share of the income-tax revenue, and if business is stagnated, this source of revenue will inevitably diminish.

From every point of view, therefore, the Treasury's idea of using taxation to combat inflation is merely another New Deal chimera.

The Treasury Department has yet to learn that the only way in which the Government can reduce inflation is by balancing its Budget and eliminating deficit financing and applying its resources to reducing the existing Federal debt.

Veterans Can Be Loyal Citizens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article which appeared in the July 3 issue of the Christian Century on the recent convention of the American Veterans' Committee—AVC—in Des Moines, Iowa.

I was fortunate in having been present at AVC's first national convention as a guest speaker. I took advantage of the opportunity to watch the delegates at work. As were other observers, I was forcibly impressed by their seriousness and their sense of responsibility. These young veterans knew that they had an important job to do and they worked intently on that job almost 24 hours a day.

In the midst of the turbulent world in which we live it was indeed an encouraging sign to see these young men, intent not on asking special favors for themselves but on working democratically to build a better America and a peaceful world. America needs an organization of this type. In the midst of the pleas of a hundred special interests seeking their own selfish ends it is good to hear the voice of a young and energetic veterans' group which is determined to speak courageously for the general welfare of the entire Nation.

VETERANS CAN BE LOYAL CITIZENS

When the young veterans of a major war organize for the purpose of serving the public welfare instead of raiding the Public Treasury, something new and important has happened. Because the American Veterans Committee is starting out with such a purpose, its recent first convention in Des Moines has attracted widespread and favorable attention. Here at last is a body of veterans of the Second World War whose 60,000 members appear determined to assume the full responsibilities of citizenship in a democracy. In their convention resolutions, in the caliber of the men they elected to leadership, and in the platform with which they now appeal for the support of their former comrades in arms and the public at large, they are citizens first, veterans second.

If the AVC continues to follow the course it charted in Des Moines, the civic conscience of America can be depended upon to ally itself—for the first time—with a veterans' organization. That "if," to be sure, is a big word. For the past 80 years, veterans have been teaching the Nation to anticipate little good from their organized enterprises. Those who recall the idealistic pronouncements made by the American Legion in its early stages will remember the reasons why the late S. Parks Cadman referred to that body as the greatest disappointment of the disillusioning period following the First World War. Ever since the Civil War, the Republic has been compelled to defend itself against the parasitism of veterans' organizations. The AVC has to live that history down.

At Des Moines it made a good beginning. It did so because it is based on a philosophy radically different from that of other organizations. Instead of assuming that the general welfare will take care of itself if only each pressure group grabs all it can, the AVC maintains that all citizens, including veterans, have the obligation to place the general welfare above their own desires. It proceeds upon the sensible conviction that unless democratic society as a whole is healthy and vigorous, none of the special interests within it may expect to thrive. And it believes that, since America cannot isolate itself from the world community, every citizen must recognize his responsibility to make this country a force for peace based on justice. So the AVC has set itself to try to deal with the live issues of current national and world affairs.

The Des Moines veterans, instead of spending their time in the usual convention debauch while a little group of self-seeking insiders made all the decisions, spent long hours debating such issues. They voted to support adequate housing, not for veterans only but for all the public, financed by private business where possible but with public funds where necessary. They favored the abolition of racial bars to jobs, education, and housing. They approved a national program of full employment supported by a legally defined minimum wage. They were concerned with the problems of small farmers and small business. They voted to do what they could to maintain price controls and to assist in the organization of labor in the South. At the end of their meeting they congratulated the Des Moines city authorities for intervening in their behalf when two Negro delegates were refused service in a restaurant.

Looking abroad, the AVC declared itself in favor of the development of world government through the United Nations. It endorsed a return to food rationing as America's answer to mass starvation in former enemy countries. It was the first veterans' organization to approve international control of atomic energy, stoppage by the United States of the manufacture of atomic bombs, and the destruction of those now in existence. It favored lower immigration barriers throughout the world. It voted for lower tariffs, the immediate entry of 100,000 Jews to Palestine, and the severance of diplomatic relations with Spain. Language like this is not dictated by the military branches of Government or by a few ambitious leaders who place their private intentions above the opinions of their fellows.

So the American Veterans' Committee is well launched. In view of the fact that veterans have played an important and often a predominant part in American politics for the last three generations, and that this war put a larger proportion of our population into uniform than any previous struggle, the appearance of an organization with such principles is propitious for the future. It is to be hoped that it will secure the million members it seeks this year. It must have a considerable basis of mass support if it is to demonstrate that veterans can counteract the efforts of selfish pressure groups and actually advance the purposes they have undertaken to support.

The first obstacle the AVC will have to overcome is the almost universal cynicism concerning all pressure groups and the general reaction against groups which attempt to mask self-seeking by vociferating patriotic slogans. Next, it will have to be alert to defend its integrity against forces which seek to capture it for their own ends. The organization acted wisely at Des Moines when it defeated repeated attempts by a small Communist-minded minority to gain a foothold in the directing body and elected a slate of officers whose democratic convictions are above suspicion. But a much harder thing to handle will be the personal ambitions of its own leaders.

This veterans' body frankly recognizes that moral decisions are made effective in the life of this Nation by the functioning of the democratic process. It is organized to participate in that process. But for it to become a political party or an adjunct to such a party would be fatal. Equally disastrous would it be for the committee to decide that political influence can be exerted only by people who hold office. As William Allen White pointed out in his recently published autobiography, some of the most effective forces for good in American society have been persons who not only did not seek office but refused it when it was offered.

Perhaps the greatest obstacle now confronting the AVC is the psychological gulf which yawns between the returning veteran and the rest of the American people. That gulf was dug by America's relative immunity to the sufferings of war. Our people experienced nothing that would enable them to understand what their own sons and most of the world had to bear. In almost every land except our own civilians suffered fully as much as did the average soldier. But our people were spared. The veteran, staggered by the horrors of global war, returns home and is appalled to discover that life goes on just about as usual. To him that means that we have learned nothing and are blindly coasting toward another catastrophe which will impose on another generation the outrages he has witnessed and endured.

The churches of America have an obligation to help the veteran probe beneath surface appearances of complacency to understand what has happened to his Nation's mind and soul during the war. When the returning soldier reflects on the reasons why the churches of the victor powers join those of the vanquished in common repentance for the sins that led to the war, when he learns why the churches of America maintained throughout that the church was not a belligerent, he may conclude that he has more allies than he suspects in his determination that "it shall not happen again." He will be more inclined to welcome this assistance if church people throughout America learn to distinguish between the good and the dubious in the numerous attempts now being made to organize the 11,000,000 veterans of this war. The American Veterans' Committee has started out to give this country a type of ex-soldier leadership which it has not seen before. The likelihood that it will hew to the constructive course it has projected is increased by every man or woman of good will who lends a helping hand.

William Green Pronounces Labor Policy and Itemizes Four Safeguards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE DOYLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent has been granted me to insert the following editorial by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. It appeared in the July 1946 issue of the American Federationist.

OUR NATION'S LABOR POLICY
(By William Green)

Every time a crisis in labor affairs ties up a large portion of our economy there is an immediate demand for legislation to stop strikes by drastic regulations and penalties. Such a demand ignores the fact that strikes are the culmination of a series of efforts to adjust views on matters of joint concern.

Any real effort to prevent strikes must begin by making help readily available in the early stages of negotiations. Legislation of the type often proposed would result in undermining the economic government and the kind of law and order which is being worked out jointly in industries and in all kinds of workshops by management and organized labor. The strength of the economic agencies has its roots in the fact that they are agencies through which individuals can plan and work together for their own interests and control in accord with their own best judgment.

Collective bargaining is the basic procedure of democracy. Applied to work problems, it provides that representatives of workers and management shall agree upon terms and conditions of work and set up the agencies to put the contract into effect. It rests upon recognition of mutual interests in production and in the distribution of returns on joint work.

As the union becomes increasingly effective, there is an approach to equality in bargaining and hence increasing justice in the terms of agreement. Progress in work contracts is aided by making more information available on wage rates, hours, overtime, productivity, job classification, shares going to management and to stockholders, etc. It is not enough to have such information at central offices, it should be made available in all areas through a labor extension service.

In addition to factual information, the other service which Government may render is conciliation and mediation at the time when first needed and before controversies develop. Such service should be available through the United States Department of Labor and supplemented by local aids. Conciliation is one of the most important duties of the Secertary of Labor. He should see to it that not only is the conciliation personnel adequate and well equipped, but that all the divisions in the Department are coordinated to make services timely, adequate, and understanding.

The Department of Labor should emphasize the constructive achievements of cooperation between management and workers. It should have information on continuous production without stoppages due to labor disputes. It should contribute to better labor relations by publicizing achievements of companies and unions able to maintain satisfactory relations without work stoppages and make details available to aid other unions and managements. This relatively commonplace suggestion would revolutionize the thinking of the public and legislators.

The Department of Labor, by analyzing files of all union agreements, should be the first to detect new trends in union provisions and to make available to all unions comparative information. Such information would help many to avoid pitfalls that might necessitate strikes.

The public should expect uninterrupted service only when unions and management negotiate in good faith. Its interests lie in facilitating such negotiations, not in penalizing those who are unwilling to endure injustice. A strike may be the only way to induce employers to agree to new provisions—even though vital to workers and to the Nation—as, for instance, the health and welfare fund of the miners. Mine accidents and occupational diseases, together with substandard sanitary conditions of mine villages and inadequate medical-care facilities to give miners at least normal life expectancy, had long been discussed in collective bargaining. The facts were indisputable. But the employers would do nothing.

Strikes in the past have been labor's main dependence in lifting standards of living permanently to new high levels. The only safe way to establish them is to increase the effectiveness of collective bargaining. The right to strike distinguishes the free worker from the slave. The right to strike involves the foundation of our free democracy. But as workers value this right, they must use it with wisdom and responsibility. Equally essential is it that employers learn the value of responsible collective bargaining in good faith and not try to trick the union into indiscretions.

To recapitulate: The first step which the Federal Government should take in a program to prevent strikes is to provide a well-equipped Department of Labor headed by an experienced person who knows labor problems. Then there must be an effective conciliation service, supplemented by a technical staff and by research information on wage rates, productivity, labor costs, and a wide range of other information made readily available for all workers by a labor conciliation service. Next, make available for labor's study and use comparative data on union agreements, management techniques, health and welfare funds. Finally, emphasize the constructive gains of collective bargaining.

Such a program would help the public to assume its responsibility for standards in order to enjoy uninterrupted production.

TAKE YOUR STAND

The world is passing through one of those great transitional epochs which determine trends over a century or more. This struggle will decide as between the basic importance of each human being with guarantees of personal rights and the all-powerful state which denies these rights.

So long as totalitarian states were content to keep their philosophy within their own borders, though we wondered at their judgment, we felt they had a right to choose whatever kind of government they wanted provided it did not interfere with the same right for other nations. But now that the U. S. S. R. has decided that "security" for communism requires the seizure of neighboring countries and the establishment of Communist governments to control those nations contrary to their will, it has initiated a policy of aggression and imperialism that menaces world peace.

The U. S. S. R. has prevented decision on peace treaties which would result in withdrawal of armies and efforts to restore a civilian economy. Large Russian occupation armies are maintained which are a heavy burden on food supplies and afford a smokescreen for Communist activities. These activities are facilitated by secret police.

Communist organizers are given automobiles or other means of travel, printing presses and paper, typewriters and other essential supplies, while free trade unionists are denied these facilities.

Whenever a new "menace" to Soviet "security" is discovered, Communists are sent in to take up residence in the country. A fifth-column organization is built up and the country is soon brought under the Soviet Union.

All this has been going on despite the fact that the U. S. S. R. signed the Atlantic Charter and agreed to participate in the organization of the United Nations. Obviously, Russia's pledges of cooperation do not rule out activities to promote Soviet imperialism at the expense of the rights of other nations.

By its policy of extreme secrecy the U. S. S. R. acknowledges there is no reconciliation between the philosophies of democracy and totalitarianism of any brand. Its iron curtain prevents its people from getting information from the outside or the information to counteract baseless rumors.

The U. S. S. R. is promoting dissension and chaos on a world-wide scale, reaching eastward through Asia to the Western Hemisphere and westward across Europe to our eastern coasts. Within the new world it is using its Communist Party members to bore into governments and into labor movements to gather military and other secret information. The highest allegiance of Communist Party members everywhere is to the U. S. S. R.

This period of world revolution places on our free trade unions a special responsibility to protect their own rights as well as to safeguard democratic institutions for the whole country and this hemisphere. Observe these safeguards:

(1) Keep your union free from Communist control. Communists use unions to promote the party.

(2) Carry on collective bargaining and other union activities in good faith to assure workers continuously risin_ standards of living and management dependable work contracts.

(3) Seek to broaden the field for cooperation between unions and management for the mutual advantage of those the industry serves.

(4) Be on guard against cooperation with Communist-front organizations and party followers that further party-line objectives.

No trade unionist can be neutral in this world crisis in which democracy and human freedom are at stake throughout the world. The roots of democracy are in the principles of the Christian religion.

The Man About Town

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP A. TRAYNOR
OF DELAWARE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. TRAYNOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article from the Journal Every Evening The Man About Town column, Wilmington, Del.:

Delmarva Hatcheries are drowning baby chicks by the thousands, a nearby Pennsylvania egg and chicken dealer tells us.

The truck farmer, who comes into Wilmington with eggs, chickens, and general truck products, explained that on a recent trip to a Maryland hatchery, he found the owner was very much disturbed over the prospects for his crop of baby chicks.

He explained that many other hatcheries in the district had been forced to drown thousands of chicks for lack of takers.

Early in the season, on the basis of orders received, hatching eggs were placed in incubators. Before the young chicks were actually hatched, cancellations started to come in by the hundreds. This resulted in an oversupply of chicks, and since the space at most hatcheries is somewhat limited after the chicks get to a certain age, the hatcheries were faced with a difficult problem.

In many cases the chicks were given away by being added in large quantities to the active orders on file. But since even raisers of chickens have a feed and space problem, too, only a limited number of left-over chicks could be sent out.

Liberals on Liberalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 18 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Liberals on Liberalism," by Eric F. Goldman and Mary Paull, published in the July 22, 1946, issue of the New Republic.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIBERALS ON LIBERALISM

(By Eric F. Goldman and Mary Paull)

For many years now the confusion of liberalism has been a stock conversation piece. No doubt much of this impression of confusion comes from the fact that whatever liberalism is, it is not a closed system. By the very nature of its opposition to conservatism, it must proceed on the assumption of a changing world, and has willingly to subject itself to the tug and pull of events. Consequently, it is a way of thought and action which can always profit from an asking of the question, What's with liberalism today?

In an attempt to contribute to such an inquiry, a series of questions were put to nine people—Thurman Arnold, Senators Wayne Morse and Claude Pepper, Chester Bowles, Representatives Helen Gahagan Douglas, Estes Kefauver, and Charles M. LaFollette, and Robert R. Nathan and Paul Porter. No pretense is made that the group is representative of liberalism. They are simply nine persons prominent on the Washington scene who consider themselves liberals and would be accepted as such by most people in the United States. The questions put to them ranged from their general conceptions of liberalism, through their specific estimates of the liberal situation today, to their suggestions for furthering the liberal cause.

The answers reveal certain striking areas of agreement. In assessing the present state of liberalism, all nine share Senator PEPPER'S conviction that "in important ways, we are being thrown for losses." But they are also unanimous in believing that liberalism is progressing in the long-time battle for the public mind. Representative LAFOLLETTE, for example, contends that "in many places the efforts to create political awareness are not well thought out or adequately implemented," yet he goes on to say that "the attempt itself evidences progress." Chester Bowles puts it: "In every community in the country there is a stirring demand for more democratic action and political leaders who more clearly express the views of the common man. The war has taught us that full production is readily attainable and, perhaps most important of all, that we know how to attain it." Thurman Arnold confidently adds that "as the industrial revolution goes on, the country will be pushed more toward liberalism, in spite of the stubborn efforts of vast organizations wedded to obsolete techniques that are trying to fence themselves in. A new age of science-applied-to-industry has made individual opportunity again an economic reality."

The Republican Senator MORSE is sure that optimism about the trend can include the rank and file of both parties: "The most significant barometer reading of recent years was the Gallup poll which disclosed that there is no marked difference between rank-and-file Democrats and Republicans as to the objectives of government, or as to the social and economic legislation which they want Congress to pass. I am satisfied that if a clear-cut referendum could be held, the liberal point of view would win by at least 3 to 1 and, in all probability, by a much higher ratio. Our primary job is to get the average voter to see the importance of sending to national conventions liberal-minded delegates to break the control of the reactionary political machines which in 1948 will control both party conventions unless the voters do something about it in the meantime."

Questions concerning the Truman administration and liberalism brought only slightly less agreement. Senator MORSE dismisses the administration as "an exceedingly reactionary one, characterized by political expediency and dangerous machine politics." But the other eight liberals, including Representative LAFOLLETTE, who still sits on the GOP side of the House, are satisfied with the over-all objectives of the President. Quite typically Robert Nathan says, "One must distinguish between the administration and Congress. The President has proposed to Congress on numerous occasions a well-balanced, comprehensive, liberal economic program, but Congress has failed to enact his program." Representative LAFOLLETTE goes even further and credits President Truman with one victory in the Senate which Roosevelt could not win. "In August 1944, with the European campaign bogged down and the Philippines still in the hands of the Japanese, the Commander in Chief's appeal was at its highest. President Roosevelt called Congress back to enact reconversion legislation. The unemployment-compensation feature of the Kilgore bill was eliminated in the Senate and snowed under in the House. Despite all the yelling about Truman in 1945 and 1946, he did get through the Senate a provision for 26 weeks at State levels, which was more than Roosevelt did at the height of his personal appeal."

Most of the comments are less favorable than LAFOLLETTE'S in discussing the administration's relations with Congress. The general emphasis is, like Nathan's, on the difference between what the President has proposed and Congress has adopted. The general explanation is the administration's lack of the skill and drive necessary to maneuver a program through a difficult Congress in still more difficult times. "Both the Roosevelt and Truman administrations," Thurman Arnold remarks, "have attempted to steer a course in a country torn by the economic struggle of powerful groups in industry, in agriculture, and in labor. Roosevelt's unequaled political ability, his sense of compromise, his inspirational leadership, were his great contribution. His separate policies were not consistent, but he always managed to move forward. Truman faces even more difficult times. His government is only a balance of power among strongly organized groups, each seeking security for itself rather than industrial progress for the country as a whole. Any general criticism of the Truman administration amounts only to saying that Truman does not have the political genius of Roosevelt." Senator PEPPER, less inclined to emphasize forces outside the administration, warns that "the President will have to be careful lest the impression grow that the liberal sentiment no longer dominates his program. This impression would spring from the fact that he is taking advice from people who are not recognized as sympathetic to liberalism."

Differences of emphasis rather than actual disagreement emerge when the nine liberals discuss the weaknesses of liberalism. Quite naturally, they stress things closest to their own type of experience. The four men and one woman who hold elective office emphasize the political individualism of liberals, their lack of a program which binds them together for effective political action, their balking at the give and take of politics. "Their greatest weakness," Representative DOUGLAS believes, "is the tendency to throw up their hands every time they lose any ground, or don't get what they want, or don't get it in the combination that they wanted. Why liberals think they can win every time, I don't know." Representative KEFAUVER comments: "Each fellow goes more or less his own way. There is little concerted action. There can be none because there is no agreement on the aims to be accomplished. Harmony could best be established through one of the political parties. Failing in this, conferences of true American liberals, not Communists or those with special axes to grind, would tend to eliminate some points of difference."

Fresh from a buffeting by pressure groups in his work as Economic Stabilizer, Chester Bowles pleads for recognition of the fact that "too often liberalism becomes subordinate to group interest. It accepts certain groups to be always right and certain other groups to be always wrong. In doing that, it loses its moral standing and integrity. Liberalism also has had too little interest in good, coordinated operations and administration. Ideas are no good unless they can be made effective and they can only be made effective through good management and good honest administration. There are too few really good operators and managers among the liberals and too many people who are ready to make speeches in glowing, idealistic terms, but haven't the least idea how to make them effective." Paul Porter, Bowles' successor as OPA Administrator, expresses Bowles' pragmatic note another way when he criticizes the "over-theorizing" of liberals—especially the "over-theorizing" taken from the Left that a strong liberalism is a hard-times phenomenon. I do not subscribe to that theory. The New Deal was erected on the basis of a depression and economic despair, but that does not mean that the two must go together."

Where the nine liberals show the most significant divergence is in their conceptions of liberalism's general problem. That divergence appears alike in their definitions (see end of article) and in practically all their other comments. The root of the difference is that some of the liberals are putting their emphasis on bringing economic security to everyone while others place equal stress on security and the extension of the individual's opportunity to function as an individual. Still others are most concerned over the individual's freedom of action and believe that the liberal drive for security is seriously endangering it.

There is, of course, nothing new in these variations. They have shown themselves in modern liberalism ever since it added the aim of economic security to the nineteenth-century ideal of individual freedom. It is inevitable that different liberals will emphasize differently these two objectives, for, while one supplements the other, they can decidedly get in each other's way. As Chester Bowles remarks, "There can be no real individual freedom in the presence of economic insecurity," but Bowles also agrees with the many liberals who have long seen the possible conflict between the pursuit of security and freedom of individual opportunity. Senator MORSE and Thurman Arnold emphasize this possibility in their definitions of liberalism, and in another comment, Arnold goes on to denounce "those so-called liberals whose principal social value is security for the underdog, rather than opportunity for the individual. For example, one of the popular liberal causes is strong labor organizations. Many liberals would fight for every strong labor organization until it became a force which restricted production, throttled new enterprise, prevented individual collective bargaining by local units and destroyed democracy in labor. At that point, they would seek to curb it by strong Government action. The pro-underdog liberals rely on superorganizations of labor and Government, under the delusion that dictatorial power will be used reasonably if it is preached at and cajoled."

Unfortunately for those who would like liberalism to be a system of jeeplike compactness, there is no way of getting rid of the confusing variations between the Arnolds and the essentially security-minded. After all, the omnibus of liberalism has been heading toward two objectives which no other way of thought and action has ever tried to reach simultaneously, and which most systems consider ultimately irreconcilable.

What the comments of the nine liberals do point up significantly is that the traditional difficulty of modern liberalism is seriously aggravated in 1946 just because of its successes in pushing security. Fortunately, the attitudes of these people who have been engaged in the business of trying to make liberalism work, contain an element that cannot fail to be helpful in alleviating the difficulty. When LAFOLLETTE lashes away at the personalization of liberalism in terms of Roosevelt, when Bowles attacks indiscriminate applause or condemnation, when Arnold assails the labor-is-always-right contingent, they are calling for a liberalism which faces the fact that it cannot afford the luxury of irreproachable heroes and immutable techniques. The unavoidable conclusion is that liberalism has to ask of all its men and all its measures, not once but continuously, whether they are toppling that delicate and necessarily changing balance between the increase of security and the extension of individual freedom of opportunity.

Making modern liberalism an incessant reexamination of itself is making it a tough life to lead. But at that, it would only be bringing it back to its great tradition, formed when overly intoxicating successes and overly depressing failures had not combined to encourage clinging to fetishes.

NINE DEFINITIONS OF LIBERALISM

Thurman Arnold: "Liberalism today has become deuces wild. It can be used to fill any hand. If I had my way, however, I would make it a criminal offense for anyone to parade under the banner of liberalism who was not conscientiously and even religiously devoted to the ideal that in an industrial democracy, freedom of opportunity is the great value that must be preserved above all others. Unless this freedom is preserved, no other freedom will be secure."

Chester Bowles: "It is the duty of the liberal to protect and to extend the basic democratic freedoms. And because there can be no real individual freedom in the presence of economic insecurity, liberalism carries a heavy responsibility in fighting continuously to expand our economy and to put into effect the economic bill of rights. But fundamentally, liberalism is an attitude. The chief characteristics of that attitude are human sympathy, a receptivity to change, and a scientific willingness to follow reason rather than faith or any fixed set of ideas."

Representative DOUGLAS: "Liberalism is a program that aims for the greatest good for the greatest number."

Representative KEFAUVER: "Liberalism means an intelligent effort to keep the political and economic development of our Nation abreast of the responsibilities that come from the atomic age. It means an extension of the use of our resources for the common good, the solving of the problem of maintaining democratic principles, and free, competitive enterprise in a day of big business, big unions, and big government."

Representative LAFOLLETTE: "Liberalism is a series of fundamental departures from the economic, social, racial, and political conditions as exist in America today. It should include the proposal of effective means to realine these adjustments in accordance with the democratic ethic inherent in the Declaration of Independence. In seeking its ends, it should insist on the use of objectivity and the appeal to reason rather than indirection or emotionalism."

Senator MORSE: "Liberalism cannot be defined in the abstract in any helpful way. Liberalism in politics can best be defined in terms of specific issues. Political liberalism should also be defined in terms of objectives. A major objective is the protection of the economic weak and doing it within the framework of a private-property economy. The liberal, emphasizing the civil and property rights of the individual, insists that the individual must remain so supreme as to make the state his servant."

Robert Nathan: "Liberalism is a movement which seeks the adoption of policies that will assure the 'four freedoms' at home and bring about the maximum utilization of our productive resources, full employment, and sustained prosperity, and a resulting high standard of living."

Senator PEPPER: "Liberalism is the greatest good for the greatest number of the people. It is really a synonym for democracy, as Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, and F. D. R. would have defined 'democracy.'"

Paul Porter: "Fundamentally, liberalism addresses itself to the questions of equality of opportunity and respect for individual dignity. But the people cannot be simply divided into liberals and nonliberals. Liberals do and should frequently disagree on specific issues. By disagreement, they define their ideas and arrive at conclusions which will further equality of opportunity more than any black-and-white program."

Rent Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM J. GREEN, JR.
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Record of July 18, 1946:

BUT IN PENNSYLVANIA

Other States aren't waiting to see what Congress does about OPA before protecting their people from unjust rent increases.

In New Jersey, a special session of the legislature will meet next Monday to set up rent-control boards.

In Michigan, the legislature passed a rent-control law permitting increases of no more than 15 percent. In Massachusetts Governor Tobin issued an executive order freezing rents. New York already had a rent-control law on the books. Other States are considering calling special sessions.

But nothing is happening in Pennsylvania.

Governor Martin, GOP candidate for the United States Senate, says he hasn't the power to act by executive order and he won't call a special session. The session is needed not only for rent-control laws, but for veterans' housing, and other purposes.

Remember Martin, if your rent is suddenly boosted.

OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Indianapolis Star:

END THIS CONFUSION

The President and his advisers have been holding out for continuance of OPA with all its previous powers. Members of Congress, aware of widespread dissatisfaction with OPA's administration throughout the country, have been seeking to cut back those powers. So far they have accomplished nothing but stalemate. It has now reached the point where almost any decision is better than none.

A congressional compromise on OPA, such as the bill now before the House, probably will be worse than no OPA bill at all. It is obvious by now that the President will not get a strong OPA bill. Consequently, he might do the country a favor by vetoing any halfway measure, and getting the country back to full economic freedom. There seems to be a rising feeling in America that since controls have to be dropped some time, now might be as good a time as any.

The days just past without OPA controls have not produced panic or startling change. The people have not lost their heads. If they can keep them for a few months longer while production gets rolling, there is a good chance that we can go through the rest of this year without being hurt much by inflation.

Neither the President nor Congress has provided the American people with wise economic leadership this year. It has been one long period of squabble, indecision, and confusion. When all controls except OPA were dropped it became obvious that OPA itself would not be able to function as it did during the war. Maladministration by Chester Bowles, which hindered the resumption of peacetime production, did not add to that agency's usefulness. Now that we have been without OPA for a few weeks our whole national economy has so changed that resumption of controls probably would cause even more confusion than we have.

We can't stand much more of political dilly-dallying with the economic life of the Nation. Some clear-cut decision is needed. Labor, industry, and the general public can make no settled plans for the future while this situation exists. If we cannot have all, at least do something so we can get to work.

Britain Must Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Post of July 17, 1946:

BRITAIN MUST ACT

Nearly 11 months have gone by since President Truman, in a letter to Prime Minister Attlee, strongly recommended the immediate admission of 100,000 refugee European Jews into Palestine. Stating that "the future peace in Europe depends in large measure upon our finding sound solutions of problems confronting the displaced and formerly persecuted groups of people," the American Chief Executive added: "The main solution appears to lie in the quick evacuation of as many as possible of the nonrepatriable Jews, who wish it, to Palestine. If it is to be effective, such action should not be long delayed."

That was in August of last year. It was not until the following November that the British Government bestirred itself sufficiently even to propose that the matter be looked into. Then, on Foreign Secretary Bevin's recommendation, a committee of inquiry was set up to look into the Palestine problem and the related plight of the Jews in Europe. Six members of this committee were chosen by the British Government, the other six by President Truman. There were many who felt that the setting up of this body, the last of a long line of commissions which have investigated the Palestine problem, was merely a British ruse to gain time. So far it has proved to be just that. For after the commission issued its report last April, and with the six British members unanimously concurring, recommended the immediate entry of 100,000 Jews, the British Government still refused to act. And that remains its position today although, in the meantime, still another commission has been set up and another inquiry begun.

This latest commission, representing on the American side the Secretaries of State, War, and Treasury, is now in London conferring with the British. So far as the American Government is concerned, its task is the technical one of finding actual ways and means of moving the 100,000 Jews to Palestine as well as to discuss the other recommendations of the Committee of Inquiry. But British spokesmen have made it clear to American correspondents that the problem of immediate immigration cannot, so far as Great Britain is concerned, be considered aside from the rest of the committee's plan. On this basis it would take months and possibly even years before 100,000 Jews could be given entry into Palestine. With another winter coming on, the responsibility for the ensuing wave of deaths and suicides in the refugee camps in Germany and Austria would rest squarely with the British authorities.

Those authorities have advanced all sorts of excuses and arguments for refusing to carry out a program which every instinct of humanitarian sentiment dictates. Foreign Secretary Bevin, whose remarks on this subject were unfortunate, to say the least, and magnified opposition to the British loan, has spoken with specious magnanimity of the need of the Jews to reintegrate themselves in Europe. In view of recent developments in Poland, his words have taken on a grim connotation.

Prime Minister Attlee in a recent statement in Parliament declared that the British Government cannot accept for the Holy Land any policy that is enforceable only by the use of arms. He made this remark at the very moment when British troops in Palestine were employing force to maintain order. Other British spokesmen have emphasized Britain's inability to shoulder the cost of moving the 100,000 persons. This argument has been spiked by the American offer to pay the bill. As for the contention that more British troops would be needed in Palestine if the proposed influx were permitted—Mr. Bevin said it would take another division and Great Britain cannot spare it—the Jewish War Veterans have called what many feel is a transparent bluff by informing President Truman that if any American troops are needed for this purpose they will undertake the recruiting of a full division of Jewish volunteers.

Great Britain's dilatory tactics have not made matters easier for her or for the pitiful survivors of Nazi gas chambers and execution squads. Up to now British spokesmen could argue that any last-minute action by the London government to carry out the President's recommendations would have the appearance of being taken to influence congressional approval of the British loan. In that great debate such men as Representatives BLOOM and KLEIN and such Zionist leaders as Rabbi Stephen S. Wise demonstrated statesmanship of a high order. It is up to the British Government to act with equal intelligence, high-mindedness, and courage.

Does Security Mean Slavery?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by W. G. Montgomery:

DOES SECURITY MEAN SLAVERY?
(By W. G. Montgomery)

Security is the most used word in the dictionary today, and the worst used. It has become the shibboleth of politicians in all parties, and by this doctrine you may know them. It is a beguiling word because it's natural for us to want security. But can a man or nation have security and be free?

Advocates of economic security tell us they would abolish poverty, want, and fear, make everybody secure "from the cradle to the grave." It's just as easy as that. All you need to do is do nothing. Just let the "expert" planners plan the lives, labors, education, and religion of all the people, and society will be turned into a utopia in no time at all.

What they fail to tell you is that if economic security is even possible, it would demand the surrender of your personal freedom, and not many, I'm sure, would want security at the price of slavery.

More people than ever before in our Nation are being razzle-dazzled by glib talkers into the belief that everyone can have all he wants anytime he wants it by turning to some form of stateism, socialism, or communism, and the word "security" is used to sell the plan to those who detest atheistic communism.

Millions of good Americans see no objection to the word "security" and fall for it, not knowing that it has lost its decency because of the company it has fallen into. The word "security" as now used by scheming politicians is only a synonym for communism.

Now, because of this fact, and it is a fact no thinking person will dispute, we need to be wary of this word wherever used. Because most persons feel that security offers them something substantial, the word is being blatantly used by communistic schemers under various party labels to destroy freedom of speech, the press, and religious liberty. Economic security as proposed in this country is just a short cut to communism, and if it comes, dictatorship will come with it.

Do you want the state to furnish you food and shelter, and thus make you secure, or do you want to be free? You may have one; you cannot have both.

The slaves before the Civil War had economic security. And so do the slaves in Russia and all totalitarian nations have security. But that's all they do have. Let a Russian citizen criticize communism and see what happens to him before sundown.

You can have security inside a prison, but who wants to go there to get it? Since this word has strange but obvious meanings, let us go a little further into it.

Can there really be such a thing as economic security, or is it just a political will o' the wisp? And if security were possible, would it be desirable? Would a man improve his life by knowing that his every want would be provided for, such as medicine, food, shelter, or would he settle down in his tracks and rot?

Is it not a fact that the best security on earth is insecurity? Let a man know that he has nobody to lean on but himself and he will put his best into life. That has been proved by millions who have climbed out of cabins into greatness. Poverty carries a spur that is often worth more to a man than a gold mint.

Economic security nationally directed means that everybody else, everyone, leans and nobody lifts. This is why communism has always failed, and always will as a source of security. This is why 5,000,000 people starved to death under communistic Russia. Destroy individual initiative and the rewards of labor, and society sinks to its lowest levels; nobody works except while driven hunger and want spread everywhere, and decency dies.

Probably the silliest slogan ever devised was that of being freed from want. If this could be made to work it would mean the end of the human race. All prosperity, progress, decency, and religion are based upon want. Because a man wants to establish a home he goes to work. Because he wants to escape hell he lives religiously. Because he wants an education he gives up drifting and begins rowing. But the irony of this doctrine is that if it were possible for us to be without want we would soon be in want. It is want that destroys want. Take an example.

The writer has carefully studied communism, going back to its beginnings nearly 2,000 years ago. The heart of communism is atheism. God is ruled out altogether; and, this being true, society is equalized by leveling down instead of lifting up. The industrious are penalized and the indolent are rewarded. The idea is that nobody shall be in want, even those too lazy to work. Result: Soon everybody is in want.

Communistic security has been tried several times in our own country. The writer has spent days in New Harmony, Ind., and Nauvoo, Ill., going over the old school records and viewing the old buildings left by the Communists when they attempted to establish new nations here with everyone sharing alike and owning all the resources in common.

If it were possible for communism to succeed it would have done so on the banks of the Wabash and the Mississippi. It had everything to begin with. In each case the city had already been established when the Communists moved in. On the Wabash, a religious sect known as the Rappites had built a city, which the Communists took over in 1920; and 25 years later, the Communists took over Nauvoo, a city vacated by the Mormons. Neither one lasted longer than 2 years. Beginning with storehouses full of food, livestock, buildings to live in, land to cultivate, orchards and looms and all the conveniences of that day, each settlement was soon reduced to starvation because everybody leaned on somebody else.

Nor does state socialism mean security. It means slavery. All history shows that when men attempt to make earth into a heaven by social planning, they always turn it into a hell. It simply is not God's way to leave God out of our social processes; nor will anybody ever get something for nothing so long as this is God's world.

Thus, it will pay us to be cautious about any kind of security politicians offer us, lest it cost us our own freedom. It is also an indisputable fact of history that liberty has always been destroyed by some new freedom promised the people. The Constitution and Bill of Rights give us all the freedoms we need; and the "security" of communism is not for us whose great security is still in God.

Statement of Policies and Principles of the Commissioners, Directors, and Secretaries of Agriculture of the North Central Association Adopted at Their Annual Meeting Held at Yellowstone National Park on July 11, 12, 13, 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement:

The commissioners, directors, and secretaries of agriculture of the North Central Association recognize the outstanding achievement of the American farmer in producing the maximum quantity of food so essential to the winning of the glorious victory in World War II. They further recognize that this production was made in the face of many adverse conditions such as the shortage of labor and shortages of machinery, farm implements, and equipment. The food production and achievement of the American farmer stands as the most noteworthy accomplishment of the American people during the war period.

We now turn to the problems of a postwar America and a postwar world. We sense that the production of food is still the most important job in the immediate postwar world.

Given the tools and machinery, the American farmer will again produce the food supplies necessary to feed our own people, and to supply the needs of many of the war stricken areas of the world where starvation threatens as a world rebuilds after years of destruction. Every effort should be made to make available such tools and machinery at the earliest possible time.

We believe it to be all important that permanent policies be adopted by the Government in order that farm management may again plan farm production with confidence in a stable agricultural policy. Such confidence has been seriously impaired by day-to-day rules of Federal administrators. We believe that maximum agricultural production will do much to prevent further inflation, and will be a valuable contribution to the future American economy. American farmers must be assured by their Government that prices of farm products, based on production costs, will be maintained through a program of price support to prevent a recurrence of ruinous price periods. We ask that Congress give consideration now toward such a permanent farm policy.

We oppose a policy of setting ceiling prices of food products, and commend the Congress for its efforts to end such price controls.

We believe that the Department of Agriculture, National and State, working in cooperation with the agricultural colleges, should explore the possibilities through research, of finding new uses for agricultural products, and to create new markets to sustain a prosperous American agriculture, and to encourage production of farm products now being imported, which are adaptable to our soil and climate.

We believe that the States can play a very important part in the development of such a new agricultural use and markets, and we strongly urge that the Congress in dealing with the problem, leave the administrative functions in the hands of the Department of Agriculture in the various States. As an example for the need for a return of such administrative functions to the States, we cite the inequalities that presently exist in the distribution to the States of high protein feed.

We commend the work that has been done by the Federal Government, the various State governments, and the local communities in adopting soil conservation practices, and urge that such a program be further extended and developed.

We believe the food inspection service is a State responsibility, and we disapprove of the efforts of the United States Public Health Service to duplicate inspection services now given by the Department of Agriculture in the various States. We urge that the States become more active in providing sound and practical protection to consumers of agricultural products.

We appreciate the efforts of the United States Department of Agriculture in developing cooperative work in agricultural statistics with the State in order to provide adequately for the growing needs of agriculture and statistical service at local and State levels. We recommend that both Federal and State agencies direct their efforts toward strengthening the State and county work in this field. Since the needs and problems in this field vary in the different States, we urge that the program of decentralizing this work and developing strong State statistical offices to meet the State and local needs of agriculture, be further emphasized and expedited.

OPA and Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the hue and cry of the administration and those who have clamored most for extension of OPA and the resurrection of it from the dead, have said that the principal reason for their favoring price controls is to avoid inflation.

The contention of the administration and the bureaucrats is not tenable. I have many times stated in this RECORD that we have inflation and that everybody knows it. I said before the OPA died at midnight June 30, 1946, that we had inflation. I stated that the OPA did not avoid inflation nor prevent it. I stated repeatedly that OPA produced inflation, or encouraged or aided inflation. I said we have inflation now. In a recent insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 26, 1946, I stated that we had inflation at that time, while OPA was still in operation. This statement seems to have incurred the wrath of the Office of Price Administration, for Mr. Paul A. Porter, Administrator, Office of Price Administration, under date of July 2, 1946, addressed the following letter to me:

OFFICE OF PRICE ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 2, 1946.

Hon. GEORGE B. SCHWABE,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SCHWABE: On June 26 you entered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from Thomas Marshall of Oklahoma City and in doing so you said:

(1) That we have inflation now;

(2) That production will move forward, "if bureaucratic strangleholds do not prevail".

In World War II wholesale prices advanced 41.2 percent. That is inflation. But 33.3 percent of the 41.2 percent rise came before the Stabilization Act was passed. In World War I (which cost $32,000,000,000 instead of $301,000,000,000) wholesale prices rose 102.5 percent; more than two and one-half times as much as in World War II; both rises being measured by the same yardstick, the Bureau of Labor Statistics Index. Although we have inflation, it seems clear that we have far less than we would have had Congress not ordered prices controlled.

The Federal Reserve Index of Industrial Production shows volume of output at a rate 66 to 69 percent above 1939 levels; and at the highest peak in the peacetime history of the Nation.

In 1919, the year after World War I ended, there was no price control or other bureaucratic stranglehold. Prices rose sharply; but industrial production did not follow suit. It was only 17 percent above production in 1914, the year the war broke out in Europe. In March 1946, industrial production was 69 percent above the level of 1939, the year World War II broke out in Europe. In other words the gain this time is four times what it was in World War I, when there was no bureaucracy to impede production.

None of the figures quoted is of OPA origin. The facts cited are from standard Government sources; maintained for many years.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL A. PORTER, Administrator.

The above letter was written to me voluntarily and without solicitation on my part. It will be noted that Mr. Porter criticizes me for saying on June 26, while OPA was in full force, that we had inflation then. It will also be noted that in the second paragraph of his letter he admits in two different sentences that I was correct—that we had inflation while OPA was operating.

Mr. Porter says:

In World War II wholesale prices advanced 41.2 percent. That is inflation. But 33.3 percent of the 41.2 percent rise came before the Stabilization Act was passed.

Let us analyze Mr. Porter's statement. He says that during World War II wholesale prices advanced 41.2 percent. He says, "That is inflation." Then he says that one-third of this advance in wholesale prices of 41.2 percent came before the price control, OPA, or Stabilization Act was passed.

If one-third of the advance in wholesale prices came before we had OPA, it necessarily follows that the remaining two-thirds of the advance, which produced inflation, came after we had OPA and during the operations of OPA. In other words, if an advance in wholesale prices of 41.2 percent constituted or was inflation, as Mr. Porter says, and two-thirds of this advance came while OPA was operating, then OPA is at least two-thirds responsible for inflation.

But this is not all the truth. If the wholesale prices advanced during World War II 41.2 percent, the retail prices advanced during the same period from 80 to 150 percent. Everyone knows that the mark-ups, from which we get our retail prices, or the prices to the consumer, averaged at least twice as much as the wholesale prices or advances. In other words, it is but fair to say that during World War II, based upon Mr. Porter's own statements, and based upon our knowledge of mark-ups straight across the board, the consumers' or retail prices advanced from 80 to 150 percent, or perhaps an average of better than 100 percent. I say that is inflation. Mr. Porter will have to admit that that is inflation. This means that the retail prices, or the prices to the consumers, were permitted, authorized, and approved by OPA to such an extent that OPA was responsible for at least two-thirds of our inflation which he admits existed at the time of the demise of OPA.

Why should Mr. Porter criticize me for saying that we had inflation then, when he admits that we had it? He says that the advance in wholesale prices, two-thirds of which was with OPA approval, constitutes inflation. I wish he had talked in terms of retail prices and prices to the consumer. Then he would bring home to the people the real facts in the way they can understand them best. Then he would be admitting the truth, that prior to July 1 we had OPA and inflation. They were necessary accompaniments.

Inflation simply means scarcity of commodities and consequent higher prices, with more abundance of money and cheaper money. In other words, the American dollar would buy on June 30, 1946, less than one-half of what it would have purchased before World War II. Mr. Porter says that that is inflation, and I agree with him. He says that one-third of this inflationary condition existed before OPA, and the irresistible conclusion is that two-thirds of it came about during the time and with the approval of OPA.

Mr. Porter tries to get some consolation out of the last sentence in the second paragraph of his letter to me of July 2, when he says:

Although we have inflation, it seems clear that we have far less than we would have had Congress not ordered prices controlled.

Mr. Porter in this same paragraph twice admitted that we had inflation under OPA operations and with OPA approval, but he says that the inflation would have been greater if we had not had price controls. Why criticize me for saying that we had inflation then? We did have it on June 26, and Mr. Porter admitted it.

In the third paragraph of his letter to me, above-quoted, Mr. Porter states that the volume of output is "66 to 69 percent above 1939 levels; and at the highest peak in the peacetime history of the Nation." What does this mean? Does anybody believe that these figures are correct? If so, why is everything so scarce? One of two things has happened. Either volume production and output of commodities is not "at the highest peak in the peacetime history of the Nation," or our citizens have been prevented from getting their hands on this production and the commodities they want and need. In the first place, I doubt the accuracy and the truthfulness of these figures and statements. But if they are true, then I am of the opinion that we have been giving our products away to foreign countries, building up their economies and ideologies, instead of taking care of our own people. If our production is at such a high level, which I do not believe, and which the people do not believe, then what is the Government doing with it? Or why are the people not able to obtain these commodities? Something is wrong, and it happened during OPA operations.

Mr. Speaker, I say that during the operations of OPA, their regulations of prices on over 8,000,000 items constituting nearly everything that we eat, wear, and have for shelter, impeded progress of postwar development and reconversion, slowed down production, paved the way for, condoned, approved, and was responsible for scarcity, resulting in inflation. Hence, I say OPA and inflation. One has accompanied the other. I think it was planned that way. I believe it was truly a part of the planned economy program of the "New Dealocrats."

The bureaucrats, and particularly the 34,000 salaried OPA employees, have told us—times without number—that we should continue price controls until production catches up with demand, to avoid inflation. Now, Mr. Porter says that our production is 66 to 69 percent above the 1939 level, when we did not have and did not need price controls. He says that our production is at the highest peak in the peacetime history of this Nation. Then, why price controls? This argument simply will not hold water. It is not sound. It is not convincing and should show that the administration arguments are not tenable. Mr. Porter, Administrator of OPA, admits that we have inflation now. He admits that at least two-thirds of it was produced with OPA approval. Hence, OPA will not prevent inflation, for we are justified in judging the future by the past. He tells us that we have the greatest production in the peacetime history of this Nation. If that is true, then production exceeds the demand and there is no scarcity, unless we are giving away our production to the peoples of other lands and depriving our own citizens of their wants and necessities. Mr. Porter's letter exposes the fallacies of the arguments for OPA and price controls.

Oklahoma's President of State Board of Agriculture Protests Enactment of H. R. 6932

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by unanimous consent of all Members to extend their remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in connection with H. R. 6932, I take this opportunity to express the attitude of the president of the State Board of Agriculture of the State of Oklahoma with reference to this measure. Therefore, I submit the following letter, which was received by me from the president of the State board of agriculture a few days ago:

JULY 6, 1946.

Hon. GEORGE SCHWABE,

Member of Congress, House Office Building Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SCHWABE: I have just received a copy of H. R. 6932, and it occurs to me that this would be a great lot of money poorly spent and would be of very little benefit to agriculture.

There are already thousands and thousands of dollars being spent by the Department of Agriculture on research work from which there has been no visible benefit whatever.

I want merely to express my opinion to you as one who is engaged in agricultural work.

Sincerely yours,

JOE C. SCOTT, President.

Atomic Energy Control

REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, in view of the serious importance of the atomic energy subject, it seems to me that we would have done better to spend 4 days in debate on that subject and 4 hours on the British loan rather than 4 hours on that subject and 4 days on the British loan. I hope that adequate consideration may be given to this bill, but I am sure that the time is much too short.

Under authority to extend my remarks I desire to include the following letters which have been addressed to me by distinguished men of science:

CALIFORNIA INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY,
Pasadena, September 17, 1945.

The Honorable CARL HINSHAW,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HINSHAW: I should like to express my support for any measures, proposing that the secret of the atomic bomb (that is, the methods of its construction, etc.) be shared with all members of the United Nations Organization. As a condition for the transmittal of this information it is suggested that a commission of the United Nations Organization shall have access to all laboratories and industrial plants of all member countries.

It is clear to anyone who has worked on such matters that there is no such thing as secrecy pertaining to the results of scientific work. Even if security of information on details of the atomic bomb were maintained, any country with reasonable scientific facilities and manpower will be able to produce an atomic weapon within a few years. It is the writer's considered opinion that no measures aiming at increased security of information can have any effect other than causing mistrust among the allied nations. Similarly, attempts at monopolizing the sources of uranium cannot have any lasting effect, since it is quite possible that other substances may form the basis of an atomic weapon.

At this moment there exist only two realistic alternatives which can form the basis of legislation on these matters: One alternative is to assume that there will be another great war and that such a war will be fought with atomic weapons on all sides. If we are to assume that this will be the case, no measures aimed at increasing our naval, ground, and air strength (if by strength is meant numerical strength), no measures proposing the acquisition and fortification of outlying bases, will improve our position in such a conflict. Our only hope toward preparedness for such a war is the maintenance of a small, professional, flexible armed force equipped with the newest means of defense against atomic weapons. This also implies that scientific development for defense purposes must continue at a rapid pace under proper direction. Experience in this war has shown that the Army and Navy are not able to carry on such work alone at present.

The second alternative is to devote a strong national effort toward the use of the atomic bomb in the interest of peace. This means that we must avoid causing international distrust among the "Peace-loving Nations" by maintaining secrecy concerning this weapon. In the same sense it is essential that any progress on military research and development be known to all member nations of the international organization. Finally, if the Security Council is to have any significance at all in this atomic age, then atomic devices must be at the command of the council.

Evidently the second alternative is our only practical hope concerning maintenance of international peace. If we fail to share our new military knowledge with the United Nations Organization, then our participation in that group becomes a farce.

For the reasons outlined above, I should like to request your support for any measure (such as the bill recently introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. JERRY VOORHIS of California) aiming at utilizing our new knowledge in the interest of international security. Similarly I should like to suggest that you oppose any measures based on such unrealistic ideas as the possibility of maintaining secrecy on a development as fundamental as the atomic bomb. Finally, in the light of the new developments concerning the nature of warfare, I should like to enlist your support for a small, well-trained military force as opposed to universal conscription.

Yours very truly,

WOLFGANG K. H. PANOFSKY,
California Institute of Technology,
Director, NDRC Project 17.3–13,
Consultant, Manhattan District,
Corps of Engineers.

I am in agreement with the views expressed in the attached letter and should like to request your support for the measures recommended.

Bell, Assistant Physicist OEMsr 600; Chas. A. Dana, Draftsman OEMsr 600; E. Richard Cohen, Associate Physicist OEMsr 600; Lail Margrave, Draftsman OEMsr 600; R. PASADENA 3, CALIF., March 19, 1946.

The Honorable CARL HINSHAW,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I take this opportunity to present to you a point on the control of atomic energy and on security regulations in scientific work generally which I have not thus far seen raised and which I believe merits your attention.

I have been connected with the California Institute of Technology, first as a student and then as a research staff member on one of our war projects, since 1937. Although my viewpoint will almost necessarily be that of a scientist, I differ with many scientists in some respects and the views expressed here are my own and not those of any organized group.

I will consider the following points to be self-evident: First, that no thoughtful citizen wants to release information of which we are at present the sole possessor if the release of that information will in any way imperil the national security of the United States. Second, that no person who has worked under military security restrictions can consider such restrictions as anything but a necessary evil; an evil because they prevent the free discussion among scientists which is the key to rapid progress, and because they prevent the dissemination of information to scientifically related but militarily unrelated fields where that information might be of great use to industrial, medical, and general humanitarian work. This second point is of such importance that it cannot be emphasized too heavily. It is not generally possible to divulge classified information to an individual working on another war project, even if that individual's work might be materially aided by that information.

The dangers inherent in the passage of any legislation giving detailed control over security matters to a military group are so great that I cannot help feeling that the passage of such legislation will actually defeat the purpose it is intended to serve, of enhancing the national security. It will work toward this end in the following ways:

(1) No scientist of my acquaintance is willing to work on nuclear physics problems or any other scientific problems, in peacetime, if he can be subjected to extremely severe penalties for divulging information which can be found in any textbook. This is exactly the situation guaranteed by the May-Johnson bill (H. R. 4566) or any similar legislation. Without top-notch scientists working on military research on at least a part-time consulting basis, we shall certainly be outstripped by our competitors in this field.

(2) Unnecessarily stringent security regulations can throttle progress by making impossible the interchange of ideas between coworkers within a given field on which all scientific and technological progress is based. Most scientists, when they are working on a new problem, will consult with their coworkers (by this, I mean other men working in the same field; they may be across the country in another university, or abroad) to find the best way of attacking it; indeed, without such consultation, scores of man-years can be wasted in the investigation of problems which have already been solved. Only by keeping an absolute minimum of information under security restrictions can we be sure that we will not waste millions of dollars in money and hundreds of thousands of man-hours—technical man-hours, one commodity we are already dangerously short of—in senseless duplication of effort and lost motion.

Under the May-Johnson bill or any equivalent legislation, the classification of documents will be governed by Army officers whose only knowledge of science is the smattering they have obtained at the Military Academy or elsewhere, in most cases many years ago. The possession of the very numerous broad general qualifications necessary for a professional Army officer and the possession of the narrow, intensive, specialized qualifications necessary for a competent scientist are two mutually exclusive things—merely keeping up with the general literature in science is already more than a full-time job. No professional Army officer can hope to be able to decide, except in a very general way, what should be classified information and what should not, because nobody who is not a specialist in the field involved can know what information is already generally available. Almost all the important progress in both nuclear physics and high-frequency radio (radar) has been made within the past 15 years. The training of the senior or general officer antedates these developments, even if it were sufficiently broad to include them, which it cannot be.

This intense recent development, which is still taking place to a much reduced extent, makes it completely impossible for a nonscientist to know what is secret and what is not; it is as ridiculous for a professional

Army officer to attempt to set security regulations in scientific matters as it would be for a scientist to attempt to set security regulations on a purely military problem. Make no mistake about it; unnecessarily stringent security regulations can cripple our research to such an extent that we might better have no security regulations at all.

Everyone who has worked on classified projects can cite dozens of examples of drawings of common articles—bearing balls, to cite one concrete example—or drawings of parts which are, in themselves, completely meaningless, which are burdened by security classifications. This is bad enough in the production of more or less common articles—airplanes, radio parts, and so forth, where the security regulations have the principal effect of delaying the start of volume production but do not materially interfere with it, once it has begun; however, it can be disastrous in research work where no achievement is an end in itself, but merely a stepping stone to something better.

The most important thing to realize is that, in the strictest sense, there can be no lasting secrecy regarding scientific matters; nature, asked the same questions, will give the same answers to all. No power on earth can keep any other nation from developing an atomic bomb. The basic information required for this purpose was generally known to scientists throughout the world before the war; there remained only the technological (not scientific) problem of realizing in practice what the scientists had shown to be possible in theory. Any nation, given a few years, can solve those problems if it cares to. It may be argued that we would be justified in maintaining very rigid security regulations during those few years, but those very regulations would ensure our being outstripped in the armament race which would surely ensue.

To sum up, I would say the following:

(1) Military security regulations on basic scientific information is an anomaly which could be seriously considered only by individuals completely ignorant of the processes by which scientific progress is achieved. The attempt to enforce this grotesque contradiction in terms by legislative fiat will certainly impede progress to such an extent that our national security will be harmed, rather than helped, by the attempt.

(2) Some restrictions of a purely technological nature may possibly be appropriate, but

(3) Only the men who make those scientific and technological developments are in a position to decide what should be classified information and what should not, because only they know what is already general knowledge in their own specialized fields of endeavor.

I therefore urge that you exert every effort to aid the passage of the McMahon bill, S. 1717, in its original form.

Very sincerely yours,

CHAS. F. ROBINSON.

PASADENA, CALIF., March 11, 1946.

Hon. CARL HINSHAW,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Intelligent congressional action on the question of the control of atomic energy is possibly the most important requirement of present-day policy. The most important phases of this problem immediately confronting our country are:

1. By whom shall this policy be controlled?
2. How shall we insure the maximum possible research and inquiry into this problem?

It is my firm conviction that control of this policy should be vested in those persons whose scientific knowledge insures that they possess a maximum understanding of the essential facts concerning the investigation and application of atomic energy. Congressional and military control and liaison are of only secondary importance in this connection.

Any country whose research facilities include modern physical laboratories is capable of producing effective atomic energy. All of the essential theoretical facts in this problem were known, even published, some years ago, although during wartime such publications were discouraged. All that remains for these countries to accomplish are actual measurements of certain constants and solutions of elementary chemical problems soluble by any student of chemistry.

By attempting to conceal facts and data we do ourselves a far greater disservice than any potential enemy; indeed, we may be certain that they would laugh, quietly, at such a policy. The greatest possible public service may be performed by actively promoting dissemination of all factual data, and encouraging all possible research, on all levels of accomplishment. Only by following a policy of this sort can we insure that we maintain preeminence in this field; and only by appointing qualified persons to a control commission may we be assured of an intelligent policy.

Very truly yours,

W. E. NELSON.

Three Hundred and Eighty Newspapers Support Reorganization of the Congress

---

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 12, 1946

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to call the attention of the membership of the House to the exceptionally strong endorsement of America's newspapers for the reorganization of the Congress. Rarely in recent history has such almost unanimous support been extended to a measure.

Every State in the Union, with the exception of Mississippi, is represented in the list of newspapers which have commented favorably in their editorials regarding the plan to reorganize the Congress. Most of these same papers have given enthusiastic editorial support to the action of the Senate in passing the reorganization bill on June 10 and have urged the House to follow suit.

While the list is long and distinguished, it is not an all-inclusive list. Many of the Nation's outstanding magazines also have commented favorably on the move.

Taken together, they furnish overwhelming proof that public opinion demands action now toward strengthening Congress. Such action would revitalize our National Legislature, expedite the solution of our postwar problems, and renew popular faith in American democracy.

Cooperatives—Bulwark of Democracy

REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on April 9, 1946, the House Committee on Small Business submitted an interim report to the House entitled "The Competition of Cooperatives With Other Forms of Business Enterprise." More than a year of study and investigation went into the preparation of that report which was approved and authorized by the entire membership of the committee.

The report in question has recently been attacked in a letters-to-your-Congressman campaign inspired and principally financed by a small group of men whose apparent purpose is to eliminate the cooperative methods of doing business from our American system of free enterprise.

If these attacks were based on facts or if they were made in good faith by their principal sponsors, I should not feel obliged to make reference to them other than to admit their accuracy. Their unfairness, however, and the underhanded manner in which they attempt to credit the Small Business Committee with a position it has never taken prompt me, as chairman of that committee, to beg your indulgence while I review this matter in some detail.

In the first place, the House Small Business Committee never recommended, in its report, or elsewhere, that one form of private enterprise should enjoy tax exemption privileges not available to other forms of private enterprise. However, these critics, in their propaganda, would have you believe that we are seeking special privileges for cooperatives.

In the second place, while pointing out quite correctly that corporate income is subject to double taxation, these critics overlook and disregard the report of the House Small Business Committee, made to the House Ways and Means Committee in October 1945, wherein our committee recommended unanimously that double taxation of corporate income be eliminated. Such an action would, of course, then place corporations, cooperatives, partnerships, and individual proprietorships on a more equitable tax basis.

Lastly, these critics take no heed of the fact that our committee submitted certain specific recommendations designed to prevent the accumulation by cooperatives of unnecessarily large tax-free reserves which could be used to expand the cooperatives' business activities in competition with other forms of private enterprise. They seem to disregard the fact that our recommendations along those lines are exactly in line with their own and designed to overcome the points of criticism they have been making against cooperatives in their own arguments for many months past.

PLAN TO DESTROY RATHER THAN EQUALIZE

It is for these reasons that I have reluctantly concluded that these able propagandists are actually seeking the total elimination of the cooperative method from our system of free enterprise rather than merely trying to secure the needed, but minor, revisions in our Federal agency procedures which our committee has recommended in its report.

Cooperatives are just as much a part of the American scheme of things as any other form of private enterprise. There is no fundamental difference between a cooperative with a thousand members and a corporation with a thousand stockholders or a thousand employees. In fact, I can think of cases where a cooperative might be called a more truly democratic institution than some large corporations of equal size and stature in the business economy.

Let us examine for a minute the credentials of this small group of propagandists who seek the death of the cooperative movement.

SO-CALLED TAX EQUALITY GROUP

At the present time they operate through a vehicle known as the National Tax Equality Association. Their president and most active leader is a prominent grain dealer in Minneapolis who, I am told, is considerably irked at the competitive activities of the Farmers Union Grain Terminal Association, a cooperative operating in his part of the country. I am told that the farmers who market their grain through this cooperative do not share his displeasure at the marketing medium in question.

Originally, the National Tax Equality Association was known as the League for Protection of Private Enterprise. The formation of this organization was described in the September 9, 1944, issue of the Chicago Journal of Commerce as follows:

A Nation-wide movement of protest against cooperative organizations was initiated at a closed meeting in the Morrison Hotel, and first steps taken to form an active organization, temporarily to be known as the League for Protection of Private Enterprise, it was learned yesterday. * * * Additional meetings are to be held in the near future to round out the initial steps taken to bring the new organization definitely into being as an active group. It is understood that protests will be brought before legislative groups, and an intensive educational campaign fostered. For the present, it was emphasized, the progress made will be closely guarded.

A FIGHT TO KILL

Lest it be assumed that these propagandists are considered prophets of honor in their home communities, let me read to you from an editorial in the St. Paul Pioneer Press which speaks for itself. It is entitled "A Fight To Kill." It reads as follows:

The really amazing feature of the letter on this page from Ben C. McCabe, president of the National Tax Equality Association, is its flat rejection of plans, worked out by leading men of business, economic research, and finance in four great tax studies, for relieving business of inequitable taxation without disturbing the cooperatives. The clear implications of that rejection deserve close attention by businessmen and farmers.

Although backed by the Nation's best tax authorities, including Minnesota businessmen who worked out the Twin City tax plan, proposals which would rescue business from inequitable taxes without hurting the cooperatives are unacceptable to the NTEA. What does this mean? It means that destruction or injury of the cooperatives, not tax relief for business, is the main aim of the NTEA. This is a fight to kill.

Never before has that purpose been uncovered so completely by the NTEA. Publicly, the organization has professed to love the co-ops and to want them to live forever. Even now, its real purpose scarcely will be left exposed very long and ardent, public professions of endearment for the co-ops are to be expected again soon from the NTEA.

Why would the co-ops be so gravely hurt by the NTEA proposition? The proposition strikes at the foundation of the cooperative movement. That foundation is the principle that Americans who want to can get together and do things for themselves with their own products for their own financial benefit, without being forced to fit every wrinkle of the corporate tax mold. That is the American principle which helps small competing units such as the family-sized farm to survive through united efforts in selling and buying.

The foregoing newspaper reaction on the activities of these propagandists so closely parallels my own observations of their activities that I hesitate to dwell on them in further detail except to point out one specific example of their unfair tactics, an example which I feel borders on the criminally libelous.

AN EXAMPLE OF A DISTORTION OF FACTS

An NTEA release in 1945 contains the following statement:

While he was Vice President, Henry A. Wallace wrote a book in which he said, "The cooperative way of life must dominate the community. * * * We may hope that such action may be taken * * * bloodlessly."

Actually what Mr. Wallace said in his book, Whose Constitution, was:

The cooperative way of life must pervade the community.

And 13 pages farther is to be found the sentence:

We hope that such action can be taken bloodlessly as the Constitution was enacted and that the handiwork will be as enduring.

In this last sentence Mr. Wallace was referring not to cooperatives taking over the state but to the state as a whole adapting itself to the inevitable changes of social and political life.

HOUSE SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE MISREPRESENTED

In like manner, NTEA issues its propaganda criticizing the Small Business Committee's report in question. With scare headlines and propaganda in rainbow hues, NTEA has written to various associations of small merchants located in all parts of the country telling them that the House Small Business Committee has acted to oppose the interests of small business in its report. No copies of the report accompany this propaganda. No statement of what the report actually says is given to these small merchants and their trade associations. Instead they are asked to contribute cash or checks to NTEA to carry on its work on behalf of small business.

What is the individual member of a cooperative if he is not a small businessman? Why should our committee's refusal to damn cooperatives be construed as a blow to small business? Why are the men behind NTEA claiming to represent small business when, in effect, they are all large operators whose manipulations have run afoul of the small man's attempt to drive a better deal for himself?

These men who unfairly attack cooperatives are nothing more or less than professional lobbyists. Their methods are so unscrupulous, their arguments so meaningless that I have reluctantly concluded that their principal business is that of scaring people for the main purpose of building a large organization and collecting a lot of money in order to shadow-box with straw men. Unfortunately, an honorable and extremely democratic segment of our economy is being damaged by their selfish actions.

The tragic part of all this is that the very funds that these men collect and so freely spend are in themselves exempt from taxation and deductible from the income tax returns of their contributors. There is no justice in arrangements of this kind.

ATTEMPT TO TAX SAVINGS

Now let us see what these propagandists would actually like to see happen to cooperatives. At present, savings rebated to members of farm cooperatives are taxable in the hands of the recipients. NTEA would like to have us tax these savings while they are held by the cooperative as trustee for the farmer members. They would also like to have us tax the reserves which State laws require these cooperatives to set aside to cover contingent or possible liabilities.

The fallacy of this argument is best shown by a homely example. Let us suppose that 50 persons decide to take a train trip between two cities, the unit fare of which is normally $5 per person. However, because the railroad would like to secure their business, it offers them a special rate of $100 for the entire group, thus reducing the individual's fare charge to $2 per person. Now, although this is precisely what a cooperative does when it saves money for its members, we would certainly not think of levying a tax on the saving made by these railroad passengers who were able, through shrewd purchasing, to save $3 per person on their individual transportation expense. That, however, is precisely what NTEA would have us do to cooperatives.

Another thing on which NTEA has beat its drums is an allegation that cooperatives are subsidized by government, and thus able to do business more effectively than private business. This is pure bunk. Our committee's report analyzed this charge in considerable detail and concluded on that point, as follows:

There is no evidence to show that cooperatives have been granted a type of preferential financial treatment by the Federal Government that has not likewise been made available to and accepted by other forms of business enterprise, including banks, savings and loan societies, manufacturers, distributors, and other types of private enterprise operating for the principal purpose of making profits. An examination of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Smaller War Plants Corporation, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, and other Federal financing agencies gives proof that thousands of private firms operating for profit have sought and enjoyed the benefits of such agencies' financial assistance in a manner comparable to that received by cooperatives from the Farm Credit Administration and its allied financing groups.

The Small Business Committee of the House of Representatives has had the question of tax exemption of cooperatives as an alleged threat to small business under investigation for more than a year. As stated in greater detail in our interim report, here are some of the things we found out:

First. Generally speaking, there are some 35,000 cooperative enterprises in the United States, most of which operate under the same laws that are applicable to the operation of sole proprietorships, partnerships, and corporations. Section 101 (12) of the Internal Revenue Code provides that certain types of farm cooperatives, if they elect to do so, can qualify as exempt cooperatives under the provision of the code provided they operate in the manner prescribed and confine themselves to the activities outlined, and handle their funds according to the provisions of the regulation.

Second. There are approximately 10,800 farm cooperatives which might qualify as exempt cooperatives. Of this group, however, only 54 percent have elected to so qualify. The other farm cooperatives have apparently felt that the disadvantages of operating under the restrictions of the code more than outweighed any nebulous advantage they could receive by virtue of being an exempted cooperative. Exemption under the regulations is very limited.

Third. The exempt cooperative is exempted primarily from the payment of taxes on earnings which are allocated to the payment of interest on capital stock. They and other cooperatives pay all other taxes in a manner similar to corporations, partnerships, and individual proprietorships. In the payment of State taxes, cooperatives, as a general rule, pay more taxes than do other forms of business enterprise.

Fourth. A Federal agency study on the amount of taxes actually paid by cooperatives found that, generally speaking, a larger proportion of cooperatives than private businesses of other types paid the three important taxes of social security, Federal income, and property taxes.

Fifth. Dun & Bradstreet reports that 6 out of every 10 retailers pay no Federal income tax because they operate without profit or in a loss position. Thus, as far as tax exemption is concerned, these same retailers may be considered as serious a threat as so-called tax-free enterprises. Sales and excise taxes paid by cooperatives normally exceed those of private businesses of other types by extremely wide margins.

Sixth. As to the argument that cooperatives are subsidized by the Federal Government, the Government did, through the Department of Agriculture, establish the Bank for Cooperatives and the Government did invest $178,500,000 in the capital stock of these banks. These banks, however, are self-supporting in that each pays, from its own revenues, its own operating expenses, its examination costs and its share of the supervisory costs of the Farm Credit Administration.

Seventh. Only exempt farm cooperatives are eligible to borrow money from the Bank for Cooperatives, thus less than one-seventh of all existing cooperatives in the country have access to any funds which may be categorically labeled as Federal funds.

Eighth. On the other hand, private business of other types has had billions of dollars of Federal funds made available for its use through RFC, HOLC, and many other Federal agencies. If anything, it may be alleged that cooperatives are in an unfavorable position in relation to other types of private business with respect to access to governmental and other capital sources.

Ninth. As to the NTEA argument that cooperatives are growing at a rate appreciably faster than private business of other types, this argument is not supported by a study of reliable statistics. The cold facts are that cooperatives are doing very little, if any, more of the consumer expenditure business today than they were doing 20 years ago. The number of cooperative associations has decreased although the number of members has increased. The dollar volume of business enjoyed by them has increased almost in direct proportion to the increased cost of the goods sold.

Tenth. Cooperatives, as a general rule, operate at market prices. They only offer to their members the savings which they may effect and do this in the form of rebates which are proportionate to the patronage given by the individual member. Thus, as far as the normal market is concerned, cooperatives do not engage in cut-rate selling.

The growth of monopoly and concentration of power in certain economic fields is well known even to the casual observer. It increased, rather than decreased during the war and the present trend toward larger units of business continues now during the reconversion period even though at a slightly lower rate. The soap industry, the bakery field, the war-born electronics industry, and the rubber tire field are all examples of where the small businessman has felt the pinch of direct and powerful competition from the few dominating firms in those respective fields.

It may well be assumed that, in the not too distant future, should the present concentration in certain fields continue, the only chance for either the consumer or the businessman to retain any semblance of free enterprise in those fields will be for them to form cooperatives to protect themselves against the monopolistic trend. To do away with cooperatives would be to do away with a real bulwark of this democracy.

MISLEADING PROPAGANDA

Fairness dictates that the Congress and its standing committees should give careful and serious consideration to both sides of the argument on this question of the taxation of cooperatives. The subject is one which should not be judged on the basis of irrelevant and misleading propaganda put out by selfish interests who seek to drag red herrings across the path of equity.

Cooperatives are a truly democratic form of doing business. They are the only means in many cases where the small operator, the man who seeks to preserve his independence in the competitive fight of today, can own and operate the tools of field and commerce which provide him with his daily bread.

To let these selfish interests besmirch the average member of a cooperative with the name "Red" or "Communist" or "Socialist" as these unscrupulous opponents do is nothing short of criminal in my opinion and a reflection only upon those who use the phrases in question.

There are certain changes in our Federal agency procedures which should be put into effect immediately to tighten up on the too liberal accumulation of reserves which accrue to some cooperatives. Our Small Business Committee made strong and specific recommendations along those lines in order to assure all types of business an equitable tax status for purposes of competition. Also, it is the duty of the Treasury Department to collect all taxes legally due the Government whether owned by corporations and their stockholders or by cooperatives and their members. To blame the cooperatives for abiding by laws which Congress originally adopted, however, is patently foolish.

I feel that the recommendations and conclusions contained in our interim report of April 9, 1946, are worthy of consideration at this point and I conclude my remarks herewith by appending them. They were as follows:

FULL TEXT OF CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS CONTAINED IN INTERIM REPORT OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS ON THE COMPETITION OF COOPERATIVES WITH OTHER FORMS OF BUSINESS ENTERPRISE

CONCLUSIONS

In summarizing the testimony introduced at the hearings and supplemented by exhibits representing articles and complaints filed subsequent to the hearings and supplemented by an independent investigation made by the House Small Business Committee, the following conclusions have been reached.

1. Agricultural cooperatives were originally formed as a possible means of providing assistance to the independent small farmer who was at a marked disadvantage in his bargaining position, being forced to accept low prices for his products and to pay high prices for all of the articles which he required for his production. The committee is of the opinion that the conditions which gave rise to the cooperative movements have not entirely disappeared, and, further, that the growing trend of economic concentration into large-scale organizations and growing concentration of control of industry groups is reaching into the agricultural field to a marked extent. As the trend grows the difficult position of the individual farmer will be increased, and the abnormal conditions that led to the original cooperative movement may become intensified.

2. Tax-exempt farmer cooperatives apparently do have an advantage over competitive businesses operating in the same fields to the extent that amounts of income available for the payment of dividends on capital stock and accumulated in reserve for the use of the cooperative for its corporate operation escape Federal income taxation. Nonfarmers may invest in the preferred stock or other nonvoting stock of tax-exempt farmer cooperatives, but this stock is not rated as attractive to investors since the dividends are limited and the stock does not constitute controlling stock. The cooperative reserves apparently constitute a substitute for the capital markets normally available to other business enterprises, since the capital for an exempt cooperative comes principally from farmers, and they have a very limited capacity for supplying capital at any one time.

Apparently only about 54 percent of the farm cooperatives have elected to and have taken the requisite affirmative action necessary for qualification as an exempt cooperative. As a result of the limited number of cooperatives which have qualified as exempt the aggregate amount of income available for the payment of dividends on capital stock and/or retained in one allocated reserve is relatively small. No appreciable revenue would accrue to the government if income tax were levied on these amounts.

It does not appear that the tax exemption available to exempt farmer cooperatives has any true bearing upon any competitive advantage which the cooperative might have in its normal operations.

3. Agricultural cooperatives which are nonexempt from Federal income tax and all consumer cooperatives apparently enjoy no privileges or advantages under the tax laws which are not available to all other types of competitive businesses operating in the same lines of endeavor. It seems readily apparent that noncooperative business agencies, if they are willing to render services at cost, would not be subject to any income tax.

4. There is undoubtedly some relaxation or nonobservance of the restrictions of section 101(12) and (13) in some cases, the exact extent of which, however, was not developed or determinable. Enforcement of the restrictions of section 101 (12) and (13) is a matter of administrative and not legislative responsibility. More strict administrative supervision is indicated. If rigidly enforced, no competitive advantage can be afforded agricultural cooperatives over other types of business with which they are in competition.

It is obvious to the committee that no benefit would derive to private business if section 101 (12) and (13) of the Revenue Act were repealed. It appears possible that farmer cooperatives having to qualify for tax exemption under the act do have income which escapes taxation, but it appears that no substantial advantage is afforded them by virtue thereof. The operation within restrictions of the statute seems to constitute a disadvantage of comparability at any time to the advantage, and, further, since the amount of income involved seems so insignificant, any advantage may be hypothetical only.

The enactment and reenactment of section 101 (12) and (13) of the Internal Revenue Act appears to represent a continuing attitude on the part of the Congress that the maintenance of a sound agricultural economy is necessary for the preservation of the national well-being. It has now become an established national policy coexistent with all other policies designed to extend all possible support and assistance to agriculture. This policy apparently is further reflected in State legislation and the combined policy has been affirmed innumerable times by the Supreme Court.

In the case of Liberty Warehouse Co. v. Burley Tobacco Growers Coop. Association (176 U. S. 71), the Supreme Court said:

"The opinion generally accepted and upon reasonable grounds, we think, * * * is that the cooperative marketing statutes promote the general interest. The provisions for protecting the fundamental contracts against interference by outsiders are essential to the plan. This Court has recognized as permissible some discrimination intended to encourage agriculture."

In a later case, American Sugar Refining Co. v. Louisiana (179 U. S. 89), the Court reaffirmed this national policy in the following language:

"But from time out of mind it has been the policy of this Government, not only to classify for purposes of taxation, but to exempt producers from taxation of the methods employed by them to put their products on the market. The right to sell is clearly an incident to the right to manufacture or produce, and it is at least a question for the legislature to determine, whether anything done to prepare a product most perfectly for needs of the market shall not be treated as an incident to its growth or production. The discrimination is obviously intended to encourage agriculture and does not deny to persons and corporations engaged in a general refining business the equal protection of the law."

It does not appear at this time that there is a sound argument for the complete reversal of the national policy of encouragement and support of a sound agricultural policy.

5. As in all cases where privileges are extended, there should be corresponding responsibilities. It appears that most farmer cooperatives have assumed the responsibilities commensurate with their tax-exemption privilege. Some, however, may have failed to fully share their responsibility, but this does not mean that legislative action is necessary to correct their abuses resulting from their failure to observe existing laws.

Existing income-tax laws clearly spell out a nonprofit operation by farmer cooperatives. A strict application by the Bureau of Internal Revenue would provide a marked deterrent to any group which attempts to abuse the exemption granted to true cooperatives, and which has tried evasion of corporate taxes behind a cooperative mask. The Internal Revenue Department has broad powers to promulgate and enforce rules and regulations to give full force to the intent of the Congress as inferred by its acts.

6. Since nonexempt cooperatives are subject to all of the taxes normally assessed against comparable noncooperative organizations it appears that to tax the income of a cooperative would require a drastic change in the basic principles of our revenue laws. The Bureau of Internal Revenue has ruled, and the courts have upheld, the principle that the cooperative entity serves only as an agent for and on behalf of its members, and that at no time does its income belong to other than its members. Since the apparent intent of the Congress in levying taxes has been to levy on ability to pay, it does not appear to be reasonable or equitable to attempt to levy a tax on a cooperative for income which does not belong to it nor to levy a tax for which it has no funds to pay. The levy of a receipts tax on such a cooperative would probably raise constitutional objections. Such a tax would have to be levied against all types of organizations which have income, which, by virtue of their charter, does not belong to them as an entity, but which belongs in a nonprofit sense to their members. Such a tax would seriously affect schools, churches, charitable, and scientific organizations, and many social clubs which have a comparable advantage of tax exemption.

7. There is substantial evidence to show that the cooperative movement operates as a very successful means of combating monopolistic concentrations and, as such, is a very healthy addition to the American economy.

8. There is no evidence to show that cooperatives have been granted a type of preferential financial treatment by the Federal Government that has not likewise been made available to and accepted by other forms of business enterprise, including banks, savings and loan societies, manufacturers, distributors and other types of private enterprise operating for the principal purpose of making profits. An examination of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Smaller War Plants Corporation, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation and other Federal financing agencies gives proof that thousands of private firms operating for profit have sought and enjoyed the benefits of such agencies' financial assistance in a manner comparable to that received by cooperatives from the Farm Credit Administration and its allied financing groups.

9. There is substantial evidence to indicate that many of the most vocal opponents of cooperatives are themselves members of cooperatives and their firms engage as members in cooperative enterprises. One particular industry group has organized and operates one of the largest cooperative insurance agencies. Other wholesale and retail groups have organized and operate cooperative purchasing and distributive organizations. Many similar cases were called to the Committee's attention.

10. The theory that the cooperative movement is seriously endangering other economic forms of business operation can be utterly disregarded inasmuch as the volume of business enjoyed by cooperatives and their degree of participation in the national income is very nominal.

RECOMMENDATIONS

It is recommended, after due examination of all of the facts disclosed herein, that the following procedure be followed by the Congress with respect to cooperatives:

1. That a single agency of government be authorized and directed to compile and maintain complete and accurate records and make periodic reports to the Congress on the operation of all types of cooperative enterprises; and that this single agency shall be held responsible for supplying all other interested agencies of the Federal Government with information pertaining to cooperatives and the cooperative movement.

2. That the Bureau of Internal Revenue be requested to amend and restate its regulations pertaining to section 101 (12) and (13) of the Internal Revenue Act with respect to cooperatives as follows:

(a) Specifically designate what shall constitute reasonable reserves and what shall constitute a necessary purpose in an example farm cooperative which qualifies under the act.

(b) Require that the allocation of all capital and other reserves to each patron be made in accordance with the decision of the circuit court of appeals in Fertile Cooperative Dairy Association v. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue (19 Fed. (2d) 274).

(c) Require that, as to all amounts retained in capital reserves, a certificate or other evidence be issued to each patron indicating the amount of his equity or investment, and further require the cooperative to file information returns with the collector of internal revenue showing the amount of patronage refund of each patron, whether paid in cash, stock, certificate of participation, or otherwise.

(d) Require that farm purchasing cooperatives limit their transactions to the handling of farm production supplies, and place upon cooperatives the burden of establishing the fact that it meets this restriction.

(e) Require that all refunds due the patrons but retained as reserves by the cooperative be subject to mandatory payment at stated intervals not to exceed 5 years, thereby limiting the furnishing of capital for the cooperative to those patrons currently using its facilities.

3. That the Bureau of Internal Revenue be requested to revise Form 990, which it is required be filed by tax-exempt corporations under section 54 (f) of the Internal Revenue Act as amended in 1943, to show in detail the amount of member and nonmember business, the amount of reserves, the allocation of reserves, the manner in which patrons' equity and capital is evidenced and other data which would indicate readily a compliance or noncompliance with the exemption restrictions.

4. That there be established by legislative action a basis upon which nonexempt cooperatives may be established, operated, expanded, and be or become federated in their various types of combination operations. Section 101 (12) and (13) establishes certain criteria for the establishment of exempt farm cooperatives. General law covers the establishment of corporations under State control. No such law exists controlling nonexempt cooperatives with the exception of minor State regulations. Legislation seems necessary which will provide the manner in which patronage funds will be handled, interest rates on capital stock will be computed, reserves will be limited, and which will describe the scope of operations of nonexempt cooperatives.

The Bulwinkle Bill—Conflicting Interpretations of Transportation Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. TUNNELL

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 19 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Morning News, of Wilmington, Del., of July 15, 1946, with reference to the so-called Bulwinkle bill.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO END A DILEMMA

Once other immediate "must" legislation is out of the way, the Senate should turn its attention to the Bulwinkle bill which is designed to end the confusion caused by conflicting interpretations of our national transportation policy and as a result of which the railroads are put squarely in the middle of an impossible situation.

The facts in the case are simple and so is the bill which has been reported out by the Senate committee and which ought promptly to come before the whole Senate for favorable action. As is well known, common carriers operate under the Interstate Commerce Act. To meet the responsibilities which the law imposes upon them, they find it necessary to maintain cooperative arrangements for the efficient administration of matters of common concern. The Interstate Commerce Commission recognizes this necessity and has approved this kind of cooperation. Yet the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice contends the whole program is a combination in restraint of trade and thus illegal under the antitrust law.

All this leaves the railroads and other common carriers in the position of being threatened with prosecution under one law for doing what another law literally forces them to do. They now ask, and properly, that they be relieved of this dilemma and the Bulwinkle bill is the common-sense answer. If it becomes law, as it should, carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act may file with the Interstate Commerce Commission any agreement which they may make among themselves. Then the Commission will decide whether the agreement is in furtherance of the national transportation policy declared by Congress. If the Commission's reply is in the affirmative, antitrust laws would not apply. If in the negative the application of the antitrust laws would stand. How can anybody possibly object to that?

Proposed Income Tax Reduction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES R. CLASON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, my recent proposal that income taxes be reduced to the extent that subsidies on foods such as meat and milk will no longer be paid has received widespread response from individuals and newspapers. Furthermore, Congresswoman ROGERS, of Lowell, spoke in the House today in support of it.

At present, the Government is saving at the rate of more than $2,600,000,000 a year by reason of the veto of President Truman which brought the Office of Price Administration to an end on July 1. Since the public now has to pay the amount of these subsidies which has been added directly to the price of meats, milk, and other items when purchased by housewives, it is only fair that the Government turn back to the housewives and their husbands the tax money which has been collected for the purpose of the Government paying subsidies to producers.

The amount involved is more than $2,600,000,000. A substantial increase can be made in the amount of the exemption for each individual on his income tax if my proposal is carried out. I trust that Congress will act speedily on a tax measure which will bring this relief to the housewives. Otherwise, I believe that history has taught all of us that the present administration, through its bureaucrats, will spend every cent of this money on unnecessary, wasteful ideas.

I believe you will all be interested in the following editorial:

OUR INCOME TAXES

Let's cut the income taxes of the American people. It can be done easily, and it should be done, according to Representative CHARLES R. CLASON. He estimates that, now that Government no longer pays food subsidies, expenditures in the sum of $2,644,380,000 have been terminated. Hence he proposes that income taxes should be lightened in a corresponding amount. "After all," he said, "the collection of taxes financed the subsidy program. Now that it is over we ought to discontinue tax collections at least in the amount of $2,644,380,000 and that doesn't include the costs of administration by OPA and various other Government agencies and departments."

We agree heartily with this view of things. And the tax relief should come quickly, for, now that the subsidies are no longer paid, the price of most food items has been increased to make up the difference. Hence this essential increase alone is responsible for the addition of 11 cents to the cost of each pound of butter the household uses, 3 cents to the cost of each quart of milk, and several cents more to the cost of each pound of meat.

Somehow there is always great difficulty in decreasing taxes. No matter how clearly the need for decrease may appear to the average citizen, there are always a good many bugs in all plans offered for reduction.

It would seem to the average citizen, which is to say the average taxpayer, that the current case calls for immediate action to bring about this reduction in the income tax. However, there is noted no mad rush in Congress to pass the essential legislation, although we can think of nothing which would please the people more. And most Congressmen just now almost ache to please the home folks, with elections looming within 4 months.

Income taxes should be reduced immediately so as to offset the increased prices of those commodities whose "ceiling" costs did not disclose their total cost to the buyers.

Too Few Private Organizations Are Doing a Sincere and Conscientious Job To Aid Small Business—Exception: Washington Small Business Newsletter, Published by a Former SWPC Official

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House Small Business Committee, I have long observed the lack of truly representative activity on the part of private organizations in the small business assistance field.

It is true that there are numerous small business organizations or associations which purport to be acting solely in the best interests of small business but, more often than not, these so-called small business groups prove on investigation to be merely fronts for some special programs which their leaders favor personally and which are not actually in the best interests of our smaller firms.

Consequently, it is with considerable satisfaction that I call your attention to the work of a new organization which I believe is doing something extremely worth while for small business on a practical and disinterested basis. I refer to the new weekly publication known as the Washington Small Business Newsletter, edited by Mr. Jesse Robison, formerly secretary of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, whose publishing firm is known as Small Business Reports, Inc.

Rather than take your time in explaining just why I am personally so impressed with the quality of this group's work, I am taking the liberty of appending herewith a copy of a letter I have just received from Mr. Robison which explains his organization's purposes in considerable detail in language with which we must all agree. I also append to his letter a copy of the latest issue of his publication which speaks for itself.

I feel that I would be remiss in my duty as chairman of the Small Business Committee if I did not call attention to any private group which comes to our attention which we believe is really doing a conscientious and impartial job of supplementing the fine work along small-business assistance lines already started by various agencies of the Federal Government. Those agencies include, for example, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, with its new Small Business Division, and the Department of Commerce, with its Office of Small Business.

Mr. Robison's letter of July 11 follows herewith:

SMALL BUSINESS REPORTS, INC.,
Washington, D. C., July 11, 1946.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR Mr. PATMAN: As chairman of the House of Representatives Small Business Committee, I know that you are deeply interested in any effort to help small business solve its problem—not only for its own sake, but because solving these practical problems means saving the essence of our democratic economy.

For this reason, I take the liberty of writing you about the Washington Small Business Newsletter. This is a new weekly publication. It is designed to keep small business up-to-date on every important Washington activity affecting its success.

During the war, when I served as Secretary of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, we often discussed the difficulties facing the small businessmen of this country. Their importance in aiding production for the war effort was our immediate concern. I am sure that you, who helped them in so many practical ways, have not forgotten the remarkable part that these most ingenious, hardworking, and often hard-pressed American small businessmen played in the battle of production.

That battle—and the war—is won. But the battle for survival has just begun. This bulwark of the free enterprise system must not be shattered. Without its competition, our economy will lose all vitality. Ingenuity will perish. How can our veterans hope to use their initiative fully if the only prospect before them is to work forever for a giant corporation in a monopolistic economy?

Many of these boys have come home with a dream of starting a business of their own. Yet, before they can take the first hesitant steps to organize their enterprise, they are beset with disheartening difficulties. Worst of all, statistics gloomily predict failure. Yet, you, Mr. PATMAN, with your personal knowledge of the character and ability of these potential small businessmen all over the United States, know that the high mortality rate among small businesses is largely unnecessary.

One of the principal answers is information—enough information in time. If the owner of a budding enterprise starts out with up-to-date production information, the knowledge of the newest technical advances, new materials, new processes, if he knows how to replace his old machinery with modern equipment, if he is able to get capital on as reasonable terms as big businesses can, many will survive to enjoy a prosperous old age. Think what millions of successful small businesses would contribute to employment and production, and to the growing strength of our democracy.

This technical and financial information, and much more, is available if only small businessmen, up against hard-to-solve problems, knew it. The Government has it. The committee of which you are chairman has been one of the most effective forces in making these helps available to small business. But, from my experience as secretary of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, I know that there is a great gap between what the Government has to give and the ears and eyes of small business.

I am attempting to bridge this gap with my Washington Small Business Newsletter. This practical weekly describes and explains each of the various Government services and aids now or shortly to be available to the small businessman. It tells him how to use them profitably. It keeps the subscriber fully informed on what Washington is thinking, doing, or proposing to do, that will directly or indirectly affect small business.

Now, in this period of reconversion turmoil, are great opportunities for men of imagination and enterprise to build themselves strong positions in the industrial world. If the 3,000,000 small businesses are to succeed, however, in the keen competition of these postwar prosperity years, they must know what Government services and aids are established for their special benefit. They must know how to use them.

Finding and training the right kind of help, solving labor problems amicably and without loss of production or services—these are among the most acute small-business headaches. Getting priorities for materials, exercising the small-business priority for surplus, taking advantage of the research discoveries of Government laboratories and investigators—these are some of the opportunities which most small businessmen fail to grasp.

I intend to point their way in the Washington Small Business Newsletter, to show where the information is, what service or facility is available, and how it can be used.

Finally, Mr. PATMAN, I want to make clear to you and to your small-business supporters that the Washington Small Business Newsletter is completely independent of party, bias, or "ism." It exists only to serve small business, not to organize it or lobby for it. I am determined that it will live up to the fine record that you and your colleagues have made in strengthening the competitive position of small business, and, at the same time, assuring the continuance of the American competitive democratic system.

Sincerely,

JESSE ROBISON.

WASHINGTON SMALL BUSINESS NEWSLETTER,
Washington, D. C., July 6, 1946.

DEAR SIR: The on-again, off-again status of price controls has raised the question: How long can small business survive price jitters?

Congress won't pass a strong price act, "hold the line" is history. Truman will get a retailored OPA bill, with Taft-Wherry amendments modified. Small business is trapped in this dilemma:

Under a weak act, price increases will be piecemeal, spasmodic; may take 60 days to be made official. Small business may find costs rising faster than income. Profits will shrink.

If you buy now, you may be temporarily squeezed by a roll-back of prices to July 1 levels, until OPA adjusts price ceilings.

Bowles' high command also predicts a tidal wave of public fury against the local grocer, hardware dealer, and department store under inflationary conditions. Many a small businessman will be labeled peace profiteer, just as in the twenties big business bore the stigma of war profiteer, say these officials.

To smooth out the inflationary line, official have this plan:

1. Increased taxes: Treasury Secretary Snyder will recommend higher income and corporate taxes if prices rise.

2. Controlled distribution: Rationing, though talked about, is a pipe dream. Controls at the distribution level? Well, maybe.

3. Bonds: The savings bond drive will be intensified to sop up consumer dollars.

4. Retail credit controls: Plug up the credit leaks. Don't weaken controls (see below).

5. Allocations and priorities: Extend them and protect the priority holder against being outbid.

(NOTE.—Civilian Production Administrator Jack Small has shied away from strong measures, such as priorities help for small business when shortages have been acute. * * * We understand that Small will quit soon. There may be a turn-about in policy—a better break for the small businessman needing help. It depends on Small's successor.)

RETAIL CREDIT—CONTROLS WON'T WEAKEN

Tighter credit controls are due if (1) consumers throw buying caution to the winds, and (2) there is a price spiral.

As for easing of credit controls, there won't be any, at least until early 1947. Federal Reserve Board heads point out that regulation "W" controls are anti-inflationary because:

1. They siphon off part of the consumer hunger for installment-type hard goods—refrigerators, washing machines, furniture.

2. They discourage reckless use of consumer charge accounts.

Biggest argument against relaxing controls is the $2,000,000,000 increase in outstanding credit in the last 12 months; increase in May alone: $200,000,000. Buying fervor, greatest in history, will push total consumer credit, now $7,500,000,000, to peak 1941 levels of over $10,000,000,000 within a year at present rate in spite of the regulation. Hence, no backtracking on existing controls.

Charge account credit is almost 50 percent higher than a year ago, but FRB authorities say the jump would be greater but for regulation W.

NOTE: In spite of press stories, there is no business pressure to relax credit regulations, as there is to loosen price controls. But watch the pressures build up when goods become more plentiful.

UNION STRATEGY

Labor has two programs as a follow-up to an impotent OPA.

1. If the cost-of-living price level skyrockets, the wage demands will be across-the-board.

2. If individual producers or distributors try to profiteer out of the present confusion, their workers will demand a share of the increased profits. Local labor leaders have been tipped by national headquarters to watch for price increases, particularly by primary producers.

Advice: Talk over your situation frankly with your employees' representatives. If you are entitled to a price increase, show them why. Try to work out the wage problem reasonably.

Some members of the National Wage Stabilization Board—which doesn't know where it stands—may urge Truman to freeze wages. He can, with his renewed war powers, theory being that stationary wages would anchor prices. But Truman won't freeze wages—political suicide.

GOVERNMENT SUBSIDY FOR VET TRAINEES

Small business is missing out on Government help in getting skilled workers at a minimum cost. With acute labor shortages in the offing, particularly in construction, you are going to have a tougher time competing for employees with know-how.

Under the Government's on-the-job training program for World War II veterans, you can train new workers for permanent jobs in any type of production, retailing or distribution, with Government paying part of the bill. The Veterans' Administration pays the trainee (maximums $65 a month for single men and $90 a month for married men) the difference between his apprentice or learner wage rate and what he will receive after training.

Administration is left to the Department of Education or its equivalent in each State. If in doubt about your own State, write the Retraining and Reemployment Administration, Department of Labor, Washington, D. C. To qualify, fill out application available from your State Education Department, showing:

1. Titles and description of the specific jobs involved.

2. Length of the training period in hours.

3. Operations required and the length of learning time on each.

4. Wages or salary to be paid at the beginning of training, at each successive step in the program, and at the end of training.

5. Wages or salary paid by the employer to workers already trained in the same kind of work.

6. Number of hours of supplemental instruction required.

The State agency will investigate your training set-up to see that (a) the veteran has a reasonable certainty of getting a permanent job when he completes the course; (b) the veteran's pay scale will be fair; and (c) it doesn't cause labor trouble within the plant.

NOTES

Simplified contract forms for Government purchasing may be months in the making. Government experts (names in our June 22 letter) are now sifting suggested changes. Industry recommendations are wanted. National Wage Stabilization Board is considering dismissal of pending 6,300 wage violations, practically all in the construction industry. On the other hand, OPA will push prosecution of black marketeers and price violators, particularly cases instituted before July 1.

SMALL-BUSINESS PRIORITY FOR SURPLUSES

RFC's new policy for helping small business get surpluses (see June 29 letter—copies on request) is not a hunting-license proposition. You tell RFC what you want, they get it for you or help you find it, you pay cash or arrange credit, then your small-business priority is used. RFC aid covers these types of surplus purchases:

Real property: Only difference from purchase of surplus equipment is that the deal must be O.K.'d by Washington.

Maritime surplus: Covers items in the Maritime Commission catalog (at all RFC agency and branch offices). If you find what you want, item will be held 10 days for your inspection.

Agriculture Department goods: Surplus goods are listed in United States Department of Agriculture Food Sales Listings (at RFC offices). RFC will put a "hold" on what you want. When price is announced you can accept or reject the reserved goods.

Site sales: Your small-business priority is good for cash purchases or RFC credits (made in advance). You must get from your RFC branch advance authorization for a particular sale. The RFC field official at the sale handles your order.

Comment: The program looks good on paper. The men who developed it are sincere, but it will work only if:

1. RFC agency managers do their jobs—appoint special loan examiners to interview small-business applicants and name liaison officials in War Assets Administration offices to screen and hold goods, so small concerns can exercise their priorities.

2. More surplus is made available—with accurate definition of the character, condition, and prices of the merchandise.

EXPORTS: A NEW MARKET FOR SMALL BUSINESS

United States exports have reached boom-time proportions; are currently running over $9,000,000,000 a year. There is a global hunger for American-made goods. Government policy is to encourage small business in this postwar bonanza as a way to long-range profit and trade stability.

Where can you sell? Most neutral countries plus South American Republics have dollars. We have made big loans to France, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Finland, Poland, and Greece. The $3,750,000,000 British loan has a 50-50 chance.

What's wanted? An official list includes: Machinery and vehicles, metals and manufactures, nonmetallic minerals, vegetable food products, edible animal products, chemicals and related products, inedible vegetable food products, inedible animal products.

How to go about it. George L. Bell, head of Commerce's new Trade Promotion Division, suggests: (1) Use a reputable, experienced export agent; (2) decide what you want to sell, and where; (3) try to establish permanent customers abroad; (4) don't oversell, even though present demand is inexhaustible. If you need help, or a list of export agents write: George L. Bell, Trade Promotion Division, Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

A lively Government publication, Channels for Trading Abroad, is a simple, easy-to-read digest of foreign trade know-how. Write us for a copy.

OFFICE OF SMALL BUSINESS, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Your representative in Government was set back on its heels when Congress cut its appropriation to $500,000 and instead of ticketing the funds exclusively for OSB, specified they were to be used for aids and services to small business. This means that other branches of Commerce will try to take bites for any project which can remotely be interpreted as an aid to small business.

But the Department was given $4,500,000 for field operations—the present 56-office set-up can be enlarged to 75 and well staffed.

Planning, research, and expediting here will be held down, but spot assistance at your plant, office, and store door will be expanded.

A deal is pending to make RFC's field engineering staff available to any small businessman referred to RFC by a Commerce field office.

We Must Fight Juvenile Delinquency and Crime—Address of Judge Henry Ellenbogen, Chairman of the Social Protection Board of Allegheny County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the Social Protection Board was organized in Allegheny County at the suggestion of the Federal Security Agency. The members of the board were appointed by the Honorable David L. Lawrence, mayor of the city of Pittsburgh, and the board was later enlarged by appointments made by the Honorable John J. Kane, chairman of the board of commissioners, acting on behalf of the county commissioners of Allegheny County.

The Social Protection Board was organized to fight juvenile delinquency and crime. The organization of the board and its purposes were outlined in a speech by its chairman, Judge Henry Ellenbogen of the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny County, formerly a Member of Congress, delivered at a county-wide meeting on Thursday, July 11, 1946, in the assignment room of the criminal courts at Pittsburgh. The meeting was attended by leaders from every community in Allegheny County.

The speech of Judge Henry Ellenbogen is as follows:

"We are living in a difficult period of history. The transition from war to peace has always presented great economic, emotional, and social problems. This is especially true of World War II, which was total war. The organization of America for the purpose of winning the war involved not only the mines, mills, and factories; it also involved the family, the home, the school, and college, and practically every public and civic agency.

DELINQUENCY AND CRIME THE AFTERMATH OF THE WAR

As one aftermath of the war and due to an ever-increasing neglect of children on the part of their parents, to the greatly increased number of broken homes, and to a general loosening of moral concepts, we are now facing a sizable increase in crime and delinquency which may reach alarming proportions unless determined efforts are made to combat it and remove its causes.

Complacency and indifference must give way to action. An "I don't care" attitude only helps swell the waves of delinquency. The problem of juvenile delinquency and of crime is a complicated one. There is no one single factor which is solely responsible for crime and delinquency. The most important factor is the delinquency of parents. Other factors are broken homes, improper housing, poverty, the hazards of city streets, taverns wilfully selling liquor to youngsters, and lack of attractive recreational facilities. Rarely does the fault, at least initially, lie with the children.

The well-known Father Flanagan of Boys' Town has said, "There are no bad boys—there are only bad parents." This may be an oversimplification, because there are bad children who come from good homes. But only too often it is the delinquency of the mother and father who stay out late at night and leave children without supervision, or otherwise set them a bad example. Often also the schools fail to instill in the children a respect for their parents and a desire for wholesome leisure-time activities.

The homes, the schools, the churches, and the local communities must all bear their share of the blame, but wherever the blame may fall, the problem of juvenile delinquency is with us in ever-growing proportions. It may eventually nullify all the fine accomplishments of our civilization.

A POTENTIAL ARMY OF 6,000,000 CRIMINALS

J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the FBI, said in a statement issued on July 6, that, "We are facing a potential army of 6,000,000 criminals and an ever-increasing wave of lawlessness which is feeding the criminal ranks with a never-ending supply of recruits. * * * Law enforcement today is facing one of its most gigantic tasks. The crime increase so far this year is even greater than the 12.4 percent increase recorded for 1945."

DELINQUENCY OF CHILDREN HAS INCREASED 32 PERCENT SINCE 1940

Here in Allegheny County the number of neglected and dependent children has increased from 1,963 in 1940 to 2,600 in 1945, according to the report of the Juvenile Court of Allegheny County just issued—an increase of 32 percent. The same report shows that the number of children detained by the Juvenile Court and kept there overnight or longer increased from 3,277 in 1940 to 4,456 in 1945.

DELINQUENCY AND CRIME ARE A BURDEN TO THE TAXPAYER

The ever-increasing bill for crime and delinquency is a great burden on the taxpayers of Allegheny County. The county commissioners of Allegheny County are obliged to pay out huge sums of money on account of crime and delinquency, all of which comes out of the pocketbook of the taxpayers of Allegheny County. For instance in 1945 the county spent for the maintenance of delinquent boys and girls from Allegheny County at Morganza, $212,210; for the maintenance of the Gumbert School for delinquent girls, $48,000; for the maintenance of the Allegheny County Institution at Thorn Hill for delinquent boys, $141,000; for the operation of Allegheny County juvenile court and its institutions, $885,190.67.

Allegheny County pays not only the entire bill for the Allegheny County workhouse and Allegheny County jail, but must pay for the maintenance of each prisoner committed from Allegheny County to the State Penitentiary, the reformatory, or to some other State institution.

These items total $718,977. This still does not include $327,171.49 expended by the county commissioners for the district attorney's office and the bureau of county detectives, nor the huge amount expended by them for the maintenance of the criminal courts, the probation office, the behavior clinic, and other crime departments.

It does not include the $3,102,439 spent by the city of Pittsburgh for its police department, nor the millions of dollars similarly spent by the 122 boroughs and townships in Allegheny County. Also it does not include the billions of dollars of loot and of loss suffered by individual citizens and business houses due to criminal activities in Allegheny County.

SEVEN THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND SIXTY-NINE CRIMINAL INDICTMENTS IN 1945

Exactly 7,869 criminal indictments were returned by the grand jury in Allegheny County in 1945, and the number this year will be much higher. Two-thirds of these concerned felony charges.

As you can see from these few figures, which are by no means complete, crime and delinquency are "big business" in Allegheny County.

THE SOCIAL PROTECTION BOARD IS ESTABLISHED

These conditions induced Mayor David L. Lawrence, of Pittsburgh, to appoint the Social Protection Board, and Chairman John J. Kane of the Board of County Commissioners, acting for the Board, to appoint additional members, thus enabling it to become a county-wide board.

The Social Protection Board is entirely nonpolitical, embracing in its membership members of all political parties.

THE PURPOSE OF THE SOCIAL PROTECTION BOARD

The purpose of the Social Protection Board is to gather, coordinate, and increase the activities of all agencies, public and private, dealing with crime and delinquency. At a recent meeting, the Social Protection Board decided to set up a local coordinating committee or branch in every community in Allegheny County.

That is the purpose of this meeting tonight. We have called together the leading citizens of every community in Allegheny County; we have called you together to urge you to give us your help in this gigantic undertaking by launching in your own communities a branch of the Social Protection Board.

CRIME PREVENTION WILL SAVE LIVES AND MONEY

We are not dealing here tonight with the arrest and punishment of criminals. At this meeting we are dealing solely with crime prevention—not with law enforcement. An ounce of prevention here is in every sense worth a pound of cure. A dollar spent for prevention of crime will save a hundred dollars spent in prosecuting the criminal and incarcerating him in a penal institution. It will also directly and not merely incidentally save broken homes and broken lives.

The volunteer fire fighters who are here assembled in large numbers have long recognized that it is not sufficient to control fires by merely putting out the flames after the fire occurs and then to sit back and await another fire. No. They also engage in extensive fire-prevention and educational campaigns.

There should be a parallel in the handling of crime. Strict law enforcement is necessary but crime prevention will pay far richer dividends. Once a person has become a habitual criminal, he is lost to society. He is not only a threat to society but a great expense. It is better to seek out and remove the causes of juvenile delinquency and crime before the juvenile or the adolescent becomes confirmed in his antisocial or criminal habits. That is only common sense.

THE JUVENILE DELINQUENT OF TODAY IS THE CRIMINAL OF TOMORROW

Let there be no mistake about it—the juvenile delinquent of today is the criminal of tomorrow. In my 20 years of experience as a judge and a lawyer I have never known of a serious offender against our criminal laws whose case history did not show that he was a juvenile offender in his teens. To whatever degree we can reduce juvenile delinquency and juvenile crime, to that extent will we decrease the number of crimes tomorrow.

THE HAPPINESS OF OUR CHILDREN IS PRICELESS

The welfare and happiness of our children cannot be adequately measured in terms of money. It is priceless. It would be a great tragedy, and this generation would be singularly lacking in its duty, if it would fail to take notice of this problem and marshal all of its resources to fight juvenile delinquency and to create the facilities and agencies that are necessary to make good citizens of our youth. We must not forget that the youth of today must provide the leadership of tomorrow.

Wherever necessary we must fight the delinquency of the parents in all of its forms, but at the same time we must save the children regardless of the shortcomings of their parents.

LOCAL BRANCHES OF THE SOCIAL PROTECTION BOARD SHOULD BE ESTABLISHED

Crime and delinquency are local problems and must be dealt with on a local basis and so I am asking you to work with us and to assume the leadership in your own community by setting up in your community a local coordinating committee as a branch of the Social Protection Board.

I have placed before you a great challenge—worthy of your great leadership in your home communities. I am confident that you will work with us and I pledge you in return that we of the Social Protection Board of Allegheny County will give you every help and support.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS J. MYERS
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 19 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD two editorials on the subject of price control, one from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of July 15, 1946, and the other from the Philadelphia Inquirer of July 18, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia (Pa.) Evening Bulletin of July 15, 1946]

IGNORING THE FACTS

As the Senate's version of price control goes into a conference with the House it is a sorry piece of muddled legislation. Nothing in it reflects cognizance of what has happened to food prices in the 2 weeks since OPA died. The majority of the Senate which voted for the bill seems unaware of the fundamental facts of living costs.

True, the bill does reinstate rent control, but it omits such vital foodstuffs as meat, dairy products, and poultry, and such necessities as grain and cotton. The finished product represents about as much horse-trading as is ever seen in a first-class pork-barrel bill.

What will happen in the conference is anybody's guess. Administration leaders hope to rewrite the bill from beginning to end, and while that is being done the price confusion of the last 2 weeks seems destined to continue.

No effort has been made to meet most of the objections so clearly stated by the President when he vetoed the preceding OPA bill. The Senate did scale down the mark-up provisions affecting manufacturers, but it wrote so many exemptions from control into the measure that its workability remains questionable.

Meantime, the pressure on prices continues to pile up. Speculative buying—where it is possible—in anticipation of price boosts is beginning, but shortages make it more competitive bidding than actual buying. Numerous manufacturers and retailers have pledged to hold the price line, at least on supplies now in stock or being processed, and many landlords have refrained from raising rents until they know the fate of control.

Realism instead of sectionalism, and revival of the democratic theory of "the greatest good for the greatest number," would result in a better control law. Unfortunately, the Senate majority doesn't think that way.

[From the Philadelphia (Pa.) Inquirer of July 18, 1946]

WORK TOGETHER TO CURB FOOD PRICES

Action of the House in rejecting the Senate's monstrous travesty of a price-control bill has imposed a tremendous responsibility on the congressional conference committee.

It is to rise to this national emergency with an exhibition of real statesmanship in which politics shall play no part.

Here is the chance for those members of both Houses who have professed such solicitude for the wage earner, the salaried worker, the worried housewife at her wits' end in trying to feed her family while prices are soaring beyond all reason, to do something to protect the helpless consumer.

Regardless of where the original blame may lie for the present chaotic situation, it must be cleared up before confusion becomes worse confounded.

With dollar-a-pound steaks and dollar-a-pound butter, with milk priced as if it were some rare and precious beverage, instead of an absolute essential for most adults and for all children, the consumer isn't interested in high-sounding economic theories about prices finding their own level in due time through the workings of the inevitable law of supply and demand.

For it is the prices of the very things we depend on for existence, the items that enter into every family's food budget, that have gone soaring.

Surveys showing that refrigerators and electric toasters or other household articles can still be bought without going into bankruptcy are small comfort to the housewife who has to empty her slender purse to fill her market basket.

Not all the dire happenings predicted by Mr. Bowles if OPA were allowed to lapse have come to pass, but the consumer is thinking of the prices that hit him where he lives. He knows that with all its faults, with all its ill-conceived policies that made for scarcities, OPA did help to keep these particular prices in leash. Now they are running away with his pocketbook.

The price-control administration did call for reforms. Some much-needed changes, designed to encourage production and discourage inflation caused by scarcities, were inserted in the original Senate bill.

This bill also recognized for controls of OPA bureaucracy as well as of prices. It was admitted by administration leaders to be the best that could be obtained in the circumstances. Its veto by President Truman was a serious blunder.

But the Senate's second try at a price-control bill was a colossal blunder. The House did well to reject it with a bang. Its precipitate action has now confronted the conferees with the imperative duty of working out a compromise without delay.

Putting first things first, the Senate should consent to restoring price controls of meat, butter, eggs, and other foods. The rent controls it voted should be retained.

The House should yield in the matter of new regulations of OPA's authority that would give Congress some check on its activities in the form of a decontrol board. The bill should provide a formula for reasonable profits to relieve the hardships of certain businesses and stimulate production.

There will still remain the question of President Truman's attitude toward such compromise legislation. If it should be necessary for him also to compromise, it would be in the interest of all the people, who have had to endure such a bitter taste of a situation that must not be allowed to continue. With the immediate emergency met, we can look forward to the time when every price control can be removed and OPA will remain only as a sad memory in our Nation's annals.

Market Prices of Food Products

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Mr. A. C. McCune, president of

Potter-McCune Co., wholesale grocers of McKeesport, Pa.:

POTTER-MCCUNE CO.,
McKeesport, Pa., July 16, 1946.

Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BUCHANAN: I am giving you herewith some additional information to acquaint you with what the the market is doing on food products since the elimination of OPA:

Frozen red sour pitted cherries (these are quite an item in food distribution) in No. 2 tins, we bought in 1945 at $2 per dozen. We are asked today $3.60 per dozen.

No. 2 cans of tomatoes, which are cost-of-living item, we paid from 99 cents to $1.07 per dozen from the pack of 1945. We are asked today $2 per dozen.

Canned luncheon meat, 6-pound tins: Our price in June was 34.95 cents per pound. Price today is 44.45 cents per pound.

We are quoted 18 cents per pound on new-crop rice today and the highest price we paid on the same quality in 1945 was 8¼ cents per pound

Fifty-pound bales of corn meal: Price June 30, $1.95 per bale; present price, $3.23 per bale.

Loaf cheese (American): June 30 price, 39.45 cents; present price, 46.30 cents per pound.

I note by statements in the press that a wide list of food items, including dairy products, meats, poultry, eggs, soybeans, tobacco, grains, and petroleum in the new bill are excluded from price control. I am inclined to believe this is a mistake, as these items comprise more than 50 percent of the housewife's food bill.

You and I both realize that a certain percentage of the advances in food commodities are brought about by the elimination of subsidies. Would it not be well, if and when OPA is renewed, that half the subsidy be left on and the other half taken off when OPA is discontinued, which we hope may be within a year?

There is one thing that I feel Congress has not fully realized particularly as it relates to food. Agricultural products, excepting dairy products and meat, are harvested but once per year. No law can be enacted or regulation proposed that will increase the production of any one food item after the crop has been made. In other words, when canned fruits, canned vegetables, grains, etc., are harvested, there can be no increased production for another 12-month period regardless of any artificial steps that might be taken.

I think I can safely state that there is not one single item in the food line-up that the supply is equal to the demand. This means a shortage of all food items of the 1945–46 crop, and unless OPA controls are put back on, sky-rocketing prices are bound to result. While it is true that the better element in food production and food distribution, particularly food distributors, are anxious to hold prices as close to those in effect before July 1, 1946, there is a certain element both among producers and distributors who are going to exact the last penny where they can get it. This element is going to disrupt and prevent those who will try to hold the line and those who want to hold the line are going to have to meet the situation brought by profiteers. In other words, they will have to pay the price or be without the merchandise.

My reason for suggesting that half the subsidy be reinstated is the fact that prices are going to get out of bounds with the full subsidies removed even though OPA is reinstated.

My belief is that OPA should be reinstated based on a theory of fair prices to the producer to encourage production as only by increased production may we expect supply to reach demand and thus lower prices result.

Generally speaking, the public does not understand what subsidy means—that the Government has been paying a part of the food bill, and I am confident that each one is willing to pay his own way, but to eliminate all of the subsidy now would cause too much of a shock to the consumer. I think very few citizens desire that future generations pay for what we eat now.

I have another suggestion to make. I note that our President objected principally to the Taft-Wherry price formulas which assured cost-plus ceiling to manufacturers and producers. My thought is this, that if there were written into the bill a restriction whereby OPA would be compelled to allow the manufacturer or producer a profit which would be not less than say 80 percent of his 1941 mark-up, it would assure OPA that the producer would not receive an unreasonable profit.

I believe that the principal complaint that industry has had to make in the past against OPA is brought about by the delays and squabbling over pennies when production was at stake and that production has been held back through delays on the part of the OPA in not giving necessary relief where it was justified. If we are going to get prices down, we must get production up.

I am simply making these suggestions as they sound reasonable to me. You can use them for what they are worth.

Very truly yours,
POTTER-MCCUNE, CO.,
A. C. MCCUNE, President.

Without a Song

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, July 19 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial by Oscar Rappaport entitled "Without a Song," appearing in the July 3 edition of the Summer Gator, a newspaper published by the summer-school students at the University of Florida, Gainesville, Fla.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WITHOUT A SONG
(By Oscar Rappaport)

Communist, Fascist, Socialist, imperialist, and similar alien usages have been popular words of denunciation in our parliamentary bodies and press. Our statesmen whose aims are not as divergent as many outwardly seem are shoving each other to more extreme beliefs and stranger stands.

When one favors unionism, price control, excess-profits tax, and increased social security, he becomes a pink, a Socialist, or a Communist. On the other hand when a Senator asked for governmental subsidy to industry, or curbing union excesses or abuses he was nicely branded an imperialist or Fascist seeking to enslave the working class. Both of these stands are extreme we believe.

Recently Senator PEPPER has taken a fierce shellacking, in the Republican press in particular, from numerous groups who objected to (1) his alliance to the Administration's policies favoring OPA, a liberal policy toward unions, emphasis on a stronger international cooperation and interdependence, (2) his so-called messing with international politics and globe-hopping and not sufficiently paying attention to his home State's needs, and (3) his contrary attitude toward Britain and his positive attitude to Russia has brought the maledictions of "anglophobe," and Communist, "Red," "pink," etc., on his head.

I look to the 8 or 10 years past. I remember when Mr. PEPPER was a warmonger because he advocated preparedness. When he became a "limey lover" because he favored lend-lease to besieged Britain. How PEPPER key-noted party action time and again while the abuse fell on his head.

Later it was all revealed as administration policy and received popular approval. PEPPER favored the draft, broad expenditure for defense, and aid for the Fascist-ridden countries. We recall how he was then "shellacked" by the isolationist Hearst, McCormick, Patterson papers, the Wheelers, Nyes, and the others whose ignorance and special interests amounted, in this writer's opinion, to national sabotage.

The Wheelers and the Nyes have fallen to ill repute and time has shown Senator PEPPER was sitting on the right side of the fence and was pointing in the right direction.

Mr. PEPPER has visited Russia and Europe and in his speech before Congress asked that Russia be treated as fairly as England or the other allies.

That "everybody get out of everybody else's country" was his desire; for Russia to evacuate the Balkans and those territories not designated for occupation by the Allies, for England to get out of Greece, Italy, the Dutch East Indies, and independent countries of the Middle East, and that the United States leave Brazil, China, and Italy.

Furtherance of international understanding so as to assure the peace we owe our fallen dead and create a sane policy equal among nations lest we succumb to "operations crossroads" is Senator PEPPER's plea. This, we assert, is no shirking of duty to his State or country.

OPA and the Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that in these hurried last days of the session only the most cursory attention will be given to the continuingly important subject of control of inflationary prices of consumer goods.

Lest there be any future doubt as to where the real fault for this condition lies, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Stamford Advocate on July 1, the basic premise of which is still accurate as nearly every housewife in America knows only too well:

A CONGRESSIONAL DILEMMA

While in one last effort to permit the drafting of an acceptable bill, price control may be extended for a few weeks by a joint resolution of the Congress, for the moment at all events it is at an end, and the administration has suffered a defeat which it has itself invited. In his address to the Nation on Saturday night, Mr. Truman was at great pains to fasten upon Congress the responsibility for this most recent debacle.

In our view he was less than fair. Recognizing "how strong the temptation is to remove too quickly the safeguards which we have built up for ourselves and our children," he seemed to have forgotten how readily he himself yielded to this temptation. Never were restrictions more impetuously removed than by Mr. Truman in the first flush of Allied victory. The War Labor Board was abolished, the wage-stabilization program was modified, and almost before we knew it the administration had thrown the full weight of its influence behind labor's demand for a material increase in wages.

Thus the first nail was driven in the coffin of effective price control. The inflationary spiral was given a powerful upward twist. The race between rising wages and rising prices, to which Mr. Truman now refers with such evident misgivings, was on. The only question in doubt was how long it would last, at what point it would stop.

Chester Bowles promptly provided the second nail. Armed with the convenient economic theory that wages could be materially increased without forcing a corresponding upward revision in prices, he resisted energetically every attempt of industry partially to reimburse itself for the burden of added costs. There followed of necessity a considerable degree of industrial unrest and a material slowing up of production. Reconversion had been fairly well completed, but in far too many instances profit margins prevented the normal resumption of manufacturing activities. The demand for the products of farm and factory was greater than ever in history, while shelves remained distressingly bare.

In the end the economic laws which govern a free economy asserted themselves. Price ceilings were for a time maintained, but less and less merchandise was available at the levels fixed. The black market flourished in a manner unknown in the annals of our country. And then, grudgingly and far too late, Mr. Bowles, though continuing to defend his theories, embarked in practice upon a broad program of arbitrary price increases.

A material rise in the cost of living has long been inevitable. The war could only be paid for in part out of current taxation. Deficit financing created a vast reservoir of stored-up purchasing power. Drafts on this reservoir were sure to result in an abnormal demand for goods. At some point an equilibrium would be established between demand and supply, between prices and wages. The best to be hoped from the most wisely conceived price-control legislation was that it would counteract exaggerated and speculative price increases while facilitating the early return of full production. This required good law and sound administration. The country has had the benefit of neither.

The Stamford Advocate has consistently opposed the complete abandonment of price control. It has been our belief that, during a period of transition, price increases should have been held in check insofar as possible in the field of necessities such as rent, food, and clothing vitally affecting the lives of every family. But equally we have opposed the stubborn insistence of Mr. Bowles on the unamended extension of his existing powers. We have felt that the law as administered by him threatened to prolong the transition period to an intolerable extent.

Now that Mr. Truman has vetoed a measure admittedly faulty, but one which his congressional advisers told him was the best that he could get, Congress faces a dilemma. It must either extend price control by resolution or let nature take its course. We are inclined to believe that it will find it difficult to revive anything but the most limited kind of price control. Should this prove to be the case, it will be incumbent upon the members of the National Association of Manufacturers, and upon industry generally, to conduct their affairs with the utmost restraint. If we are to reach the safe haven of equilibrium without intermediate disaster it is imperative that nothing be done by business leaders to furnish a pretext for a new wave of strikes. The inflationary spiral has not been started by Congress, but months ago by the administration itself. It could easily get out of hand with infinite damage to the whole community. And business leadership now has the opportunity to show that vision and understanding of the Nation's problems which the White House has so notably failed to display.

Do Something About the Weather

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERKELEY L. BUNKER
OF NEVADA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. BUNKER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am submitting for the RECORD an article on mining by a prominent western consulting mining engineer, Mr. Addison N. Clark:

ADDISON N. CLARK URGES THAT WE DO SOMETHING ABOUT THE WEATHER

A geological eon or so ago the late Charles Dudley Warner, famous writer-editor, broke out a classic which somehow got itself draped 'round the neck of his old crony Sam Clemens, and ever since then the bon mot has been wrongly accredited to Mark Twain. I know, because I took the trouble to check up on it. With that bulkhead built 'round it, I quote:

"Everybody is always talking about the weather, but nobody ever does anything about it."

If that doesn't fit the SEC picture, as it affects the mining industry, like a prewar nylon stocking, I'll try commercial cactus farming. It fits as perfectly, too, for our industry's first cousin, the oil industry.

For years we've all (we-ell, almost all) been talking about it, writing about it, griping about it, shrieking at times to high heaven about it. Yeah—I know: I've been one of the too many timorous souls (ever met Caspar Milquetoast?) who have taken it lying down, or with tongues in our cheeks (silent tongues).

But—and I'll quote another famous author-humorist, dear Lewis Carroll, whose original manuscript of Alice in Wonderland is at this writing about to be auctioned again: "The time has come," the Walrus said, "to talk of many things—of ships and shoes and sealing wax, of cabbages and kings." And for "talk of" substitute the words "act on."

If you read my April 15 column you know that that young congressional fighting cock from Nevada, Representative BERKELEY BUNKER, told me of his impending House bill designed to trim down the SEC to a rational and decent basis and "disinfect it of the illusory obsession that a mining security issue is prima facie evidence that a crime is about to be committed."

In his new book Radio's Second Chance, Charles A. Siepmann, naturalized Britisher, inveighing against the leaping power of the big United States radio chains and the supine attitude of the FCC, which obligingly lets them hog the people's air—your air, my air—quotes Lord Acton's famous warning: "Power corrupts; absolute power corrupts absolutely." Oh, no—I'm not even intimating that there's so much as a hint of corruption anywhere in the SEC structure. It's t'other way 'round—the holy ones at Philadelphia lean so far over backward that they've worn themselves occipitally bald. However, that attitude is painfully reminiscent of the brand of virtue of ascetic Elder Cotton Mather, of the Salem witchcraft era—also of the old snooper with the stovepipe hat and umbrella who, born of the cartoonists' pens in the Volstead era, bade us behave every time we got a thirst on. And—power built it.

Perhaps it's the fair thing to inject, about here, the fact that those lean-over-backward boys are largely concentrated in the City of Brotherly Love, whither war congestion forced SEC's general headquarters to migrate from Washington; and that Howard Judy, who holds down the job of regional director of San Francisco, with certain jurisdiction over corporate financing in our western mining States, is a rather reasonable cuss in his attitude and thoughts toward legitimate mining (and oil) financing issues. But, as is quite natural, he has to jump to the jerks of strings held in Philadelphia hands. When in doubt as to what the Philadelphia brass hats might say or think as to whether this or that proposed issue is on the up-and-up, or ought to be run through the mangle or a crusher and a ball-mill for a few months or a year or so, or just slapped down, Judy has to "ask Papa." And from then on, ad infinitum, filers of registration statements may as well settle down for a long and costly wait, for a heel-cooling eon or so, because the mills of the Philadelphia gods grind damn slowly—likewise pulverize.

Three things detonated me out of my years of taking it lying down.

One was the terse sentence tailing Charles Willis' 3-inch comment (March 30, p. 1) on the way Canada is cooperating with and boasting legitimate mine and mineral development in her Yellowknife-Beaulieu area on the Arctic Circle. Said C. F. W., contrasting that with United States anesthetizing of her own new-wealth development: "We have all of the requirements—mines, men, ingenuity, and capital—to duplicate Yellowknife. But we also have the SEC."

Another (already intimated) was Representative BUNKER's electric reaction to my own March 15 column comment on the SEC, and his frank telling me of his impending bill—which isn't the bunk, if I know BUNKER.

And the third was and is John Powers' gruesome picture of the SEC boa constrictor strangling the small mine operator—which I shall clip, frame, and hang on my office wall. You do the same, brother. And if you haven't an office, hang it in the mine bunkhouse—or the mess hall. If you're running a small mine, trying to grow up into a big mine, frame it and nail it up on your head frame. Johnny Powers is a hard-rock miner with a high genius for saying it pictorially, and he said a million dollars' worth, in that cartoon, for the mining industry—especially for the little fellers.

There will be no reader of this frank article who will not agree that Sinbad the Sailor's old man of the sea was a piker, and that it is squarely up to every forward-looking individual in or affiliated with the mining industry to hop in, right now—today, with a letter to his (or her) Senators and Representatives to impress the gravity of this thing upon them Write, also, letters of encouragement and approval to those legislators at Washington (I name some herein) who are already in there pitching. And may I ask, too, that mining industry organizations pass strong resolutions and send transcripts to Washington?

Loan to Italy Imperative

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, on February 14, 1946, the Italian Embassy requested a loan of $1,000,000,000 from the Export-Import Bank, the loan to be spread over a period of 5 years, starting with an initial sum of $273,000,000 for the first year and beginning to be self-liquidating after the fifth year. The plan called for an expenditure for servicing of $40,000,000 per year which would easily be met by the proceeds of Italian exports, if a loan were made enabling Italian exports to start functioning once more.

No reply has been received to this request.

It is imperative that Italy be given a loan immediately for the following reasons:

First. We have loaned money to the British and the French on extremely favorable terms. There is no important British vote or French vote in the United States. The Italian vote is very important; it is about one-fifth of the vote in New York State for example, and is extremely heavy in California, Massachusetts, and Louisiana. The approaching congressional elections are such that the administration could use the support of this group.

Second. An American loan would help tremendously in swinging support away from the Communist to the other groups.

Third. A loan would help our prestige in the Mediterranean area. Through OWI we promised everything to the people we were liberating. We have given them nothing. The Russians promised nothing but have exaggerated, by timely publicity, a few things they have done for these people.

Fourth. The Italian people are the worst fed in Europe. A loan now could make them self-supporting; a loan later would merely help bury them.

Fifth. Italian industry in the north is unimpaired. There is an excellent supply of extremely able craftsmen and general labor. A loan now would enable these industries to start producing and aid rehabilitation not only for the Italian economy, but also lighten the demands for export of finished goods from America's overburdened industrial capacity.

Rent Controls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, three times since the President's veto killed all price control, I have tried to bring before the House for its consideration the Wolcott resolution (H. J. Res. 372) for rent control.

This would not only have put a ceiling over rent, but it would have kept many a roof over people's heads who now will either be homeless or be gouged by landlords.

My attempts to bring this bill before the House for swift action were defeated by the decisions of the Chair.

In connection with my efforts in this matter the following editorial is interesting and pertinent:

[From the New York Times of July 3, 1946]

TO END UNCERTAINTY

The most important need of the American economy is an end to the present price control uncertainty without delay. Perhaps the quickest way to settle the greatest point of concern is to break the problem into two parts. Congress is almost unanimously in favor of a continuation of rent control for another year. A simple resolution to that effect could be passed immediately by both Houses. To reassure those who wish to see the Federal Government withdraw from this field as promptly as possible, the resolution could provide also that any State government that wished to do so could take over rent control from OPA at any time before the end of the year extension. With the greatest single control problem thus out of the way, Congress could proceed with the effort to find a new compromise on the much more complicated issues raised by a continuance either of comprehensive or selected price controls in other fields.

The greatest opposition to such a program would be likely to come, ironically enough, from many of those who wish an all-out continuation of price control without specific limitations of any kind, They may fear that if they vote for rent control in a separate resolution they will not get all the other price controls they wish. But if they refuse to support a separate rent control resolution now, in the hope of forcing the congressional majority to restore over-all price control without restrictions, they will be taking the same sort of long-shot gamble that the President took when he vetoed the extension that Congress sent to him. Mr. Truman's all-or-nothing gamble has resulted, for the time being, in nothing. A persistence in this gamble now runs the risk of making that result permanent.

Let Congress pass immediately a resolution continuing rent control, upon which the overwhelming majority of Congress already agrees. Then let it take up the much more difficult and complicated problem of trying to find a new compromise with the administration on the precise kind and conditions of price control it wishes to continue.

New Foreign Trade Zone at New Orleans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statements by Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Commerce; Representative Emanuel Celler, of New York; Thomas Lyons, executive secretary of Foreign Trade Zones Board; and E. O. Jewell, general manager, port of New Orleans on issuance of a grant to operate foreign-trade zone at New Orleans, La., July 18, 1946, Washington, D. C.:

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY WALLACE

Mr. Jewell, as chairman of the Foreign-Trade Zones Board, I take pleasure in presenting to you this grant to establish and operate a foreign-trade zone in the port of New Orleans. The three Federal Departments—Treasury, War, and Commerce—concerned with the administration of the Foreign-Trade Zones Act, have given careful study to your application and are convinced that this facility when opened will contribute substantially to the further development of the port of New Orleans and to the Nation. While at times we may have appeared exacting in our requirements, it was because we believe that these zones must meet a high standard if they are to serve the needs of our future commerce.

Our ports have always performed an important function in developing trade and intercourse with other nations. The needs of the future will be even more essential.

American business and the public generally have become more foreign-trade-minded than at any time in the last century. We all recognize that our future export trade must substantially increase over prewar periods. We have also learned that foreign trade, like a pendulum must swing evenly, and that ultimately imports and exports must balance if a healthy international trade is to continue and our prosperity kept at high levels.

Sponsors of the foreign-trade zone legislation felt that these zones would aid in developing transshipment and reexport trade. The record of the New York foreign-trade zone indicates that these zones can help to expand our all important import trade.

We have here with us Congressman EMANUEL CELLER of New York, the sponsor of the Foreign-Trade Zones Act in the Seventy-third Congress. I am sure that Congressman CELLER will be as much interested in the success of the New Orleans foreign-trade zone as he has been in the New York zone.

In presenting this grant to you and to the people of New Orleans, I do so with a promise that the Department of Commerce will maintain its interest in the zone's future success and extend our counsel and aid in every proper way to see that the facility is given an opportunity to increase trade with Latin America and other world areas.

STATEMENT BY MR. JEWELL

Thank you very much, Secretary Wallace. In accepting this grant in behalf of the Board of Commissioners of the Port of New Orleans, I do so in the name of the people of Louisiana. As you know, our board is an agency of the State.

Mr. Secretary, we recognize the fact that it is absolutely essential that the United States take its place as a leader in world trade along the ideas you have so ably set out in your many talks throughout the Nation. We also recognize the fact that in order to accomplish this, our ports must be prepared to offer services that will facilitate this objective. With the establishment of a foreign-trade zone at New Orleans, the opening of International House, the International Trade Mart, the Moisant International Airport, and the many other facilities, we feel that we are contributing to some extent in the development of your program.

It is befitting that New Orleans should be awarded foreign-trade zone No. 2 as it is the Nation's second port and the gateway to the great inland empire of our country and the world. We are confident that, along with zone No. 1 at New York, the New Orleans zone will take its place in offering the shipping public a service which will be all important in developing our future international trade.

I wish to express my appreciation to the Federal and alternates boards for their consideration and approval of our application, especially to you, Mr. Secretary, as well as Commissioner Johnson, Mr. Robert Chambers of the Bureau of Customs, A. Miles Pratt, collector of customs at New Orleans, and our good friend Mr. Tom Lyons, secretary of the Foreign Trade Zones Board, for your interest and assistance.

STATEMENT BY MR. LYONS

Mr. Jewell, I am sure that you are well aware of my keen satisfaction in witnessing this, the first step toward establishing foreign-trade zone No. 2 in the Port of New Orleans. My association with you, the members of your board, the various New Orleans civic groups, public officials, and businessmen, assures me that New Orleans is going to make a success of this zone.

However, I would like to point out to you and the people of New Orleans that this is but the beginning; the most difficult work lies ahead.

Although its counterpart, the free port, is well known and developed in Europe, little is known or understood of the functions of the foreign-trade zone in this country. If this venture is to succeed, your board of harbor commissioners must be prepared to develop an organization to explore and sell the services of the zone at home and abroad.

I have recently returned from a tour of South and Central America and I can assure you that businessmen—Latin-American exporters—in the great republics to the south, are anxious and willing to make use of the unique facilities which this New Orleans Foreign-Trade Zone will offer to international traders for the storage and distribution of their products.

As Secretary Wallace has so aptly stated, you may rest assured that we will lend you every encouragement.

STATEMENT BY GEORGE L. BELL, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF WORLD TRADE PROMOTION, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

There is little that I can add to the statements made by the Secretary. Needless to say, all of us engaged in trade promotion in the Department are great believers in foreign trade zones. We believe the experience in New York has demonstrated that such zones stimulate the flow of trade and add directly, as well as indirectly, to business and employment in the United States. I can assure you that we intend to carry out faithfully the pledge which the Secretary has made namely, that our Office stands ready to cooperate in every possible way with the new foreign trade zone officials in New Orleans. We believe that they can do much to expand overseas trade, particularly with the other American Republics, although the possibilities are not limited to the Western Hemisphere. New Orleans is to be congratulated on this constructive and forward-looking step they have taken.

STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMAN CELLER

It is a source of great pleasure to me that the second United States foreign-trade zone is about to be established at the port of New Orleans. The good people of Louisiana are to be congratulated upon their foresight and common sense in recognizing the great good that a free port at New Orleans will do for the commerce and trade of the Southern States like Louisiana, Texas, Alabama, Mississippi and surrounding areas.

When the late lamented President Roosevelt signed the basic Foreign Trade Zone Act as sponsored by me, he told me he was most anxious to have established in the United States four zones, one on the Pacific, two on the Atlantic, and, one on the Gulf. His hopes are now half fulfilled.

The question is frequently asked, "What is a free port or foreign-trade zone?" Well, here is a practical working definition. A foreign-trade zone is a segregated, fenced-off area within a port where vessels or planes discharge cargoes from the world over without customs intervention. Foreign goods may be stored there indefinitely without customs bond. They may be subjected to certain manipulations with domestic merchandise and then reexported. If foreign merchandise is brought from the zone into the United States, it must comply with all customs requirements.

In greater detail, a free port or zone is a sort of hospitable vestibule in or adjoining a port where products from abroad may be stored indefinitely, rehandled, refurbished, assorted, relabelled, reclassified, processed, repackaged, manipulated, and transshipped to foreign climes without passing through the customs gates or barriers. While the goods remain in the port or zone, they are for all intents and purposes in foreign territory.

Free ports are not new. They predate the Hanseatic League which was a combination of free ports in Germany, in the Scandinavian, and in the Low Countries.

United States had been Johnny-comelately in the field, but now the entire country realizes the efficacy of the idea of the foreign-trade zone.

Well-nigh a hundred million dollars' worth of cargo passed in and out of the foreign-trade zone in New York in 1941. It is hoped that the port to be established at New Orleans will soon vie with the New York port in reaching these goals and in the volume of retransshipment trade.

The Foreign Trade Zones Board which has jurisdiction over all foreign-trade zones is to be congratulated upon conferring this valuable right upon the State of Louisiana in the city of New Orleans, and, in particular, I want to congratulate the distinguished Chairman of the Foreign Trade Zones Board, Secretary Wallace, who just signed the grant to Louisiana is a loyal and effective friend of foreign-trade zones.

I am happy to pay my tribute of respect to Thomas E. Lyons, secretary of the Foreign Trade Zones Board and an indefatigable worker for the spread of our foreign trade through the media of free ports.

A Great American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, another great American who rendered distinguished service to his country at great personal sacrifice has been defeated by the merchants of hate.

It is doubtful that in the memory of the present generation any man in either House of Congress has served the people with so great ability, with such singleness of purpose and steadfast adherence to what he believed to be the best interests of the Nation as a whole, as has Senator WHEELER.

More than any other man he was responsible for the exposure of the disgraceful graft carried on during the Harding administration.

As much as any other man he was responsible for the defeat of President Roosevelt's plan to pack the Supreme Court.

In neither branch of the Congress did organized labor have a more steadfast and able friend.

In neither House of the Congress was there a Member who more clearly and effectively pointed out the folly of surrendering our independence; of following wasteful, extravagant and unsound domestic policies, than did Senator WHEELER.

But like many another man of ability and courage, he met defeat when a majority of voters in his own State, apparently deceived by false and vicious propaganda—and there was no lack of either—refused to support him in his primary contest.

The right of the people of a district or a State to select their own representative in the Congress cannot be challenged.

Neither can the right of others to regret the passing of a great American from the legislative halls of Congress be denied.

Senator WHEELER's record as an able, patriotic American, speaking for the interests of America, for her future welfare, for constitutional government, which has made us the envied of all nations, is known to all.

His record as the friend of organized labor is well known. From the July 20 issue of Labor, representing 15 recognized standard railroad labor organizations, I quote the following:

WHEELER IS BEATEN IN MONTANA FIGHT—VETERAN CHAMPION OF LABOR'S RIGHTS VICTIM OF SMEARS—WHITNEY OF TRAINMEN COOPERATES WITH CIO IN A DESPICABLE CAMPAIGN—19 RAIL UNIONS ARE LOYAL—SENATE COMMITTEE REVEALS AMAZING STORIES OF TACTICS OF SENATOR'S FOES

(By Raymond Lonergan)

Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, one of the most consistent and intelligent friends the American workers have ever had in either House of Congress, went down to defeat in the Democratic primary in Montana on Tuesday.

He was a veteran of the political wars, not only in Montana, but throughout the Nation; he had lots of devoted friends; the American Federation of Labor gave him the strongest endorsement President Green could write; and all the standard railroad labor oranizations, with two exceptions, did everything in their power to save him from defeat. But, that wasn't enough.

The opposition's tactics were despicable beyond the comprehension of decent people. With the full knowledge and approval of WHEELER's opponent, Leif Erickson, former justice of the State supreme court, all kinds of smear stories—not one of them containing a scintilla of proof—were circulated about the Senator.

OLD-TIME PALS

One book, written by a man who was rejected by the Army for emotional instability, was so vile that ordinarily it would not be permitted to pass through the mails.

A congressional investigation revealed that Sam Roth, an ex-convict, assisted David G. Kin, real name Plotkin, in preparing this "masterpiece."

It wasn't their first venture together. In the early days of the war Kin wrote a book entitled "Rage in Singapore," supposed to be the story of a man and wife who miraculously escaped the Japs. There wasn't a word of truth in the entire narrative, but it created a sensation and Roth, the ex-convict, collected $18,000.

"PUBLISHER" KENNEDY EMBARRASSED

J. E. Kennedy, a small-time Montana politician and newspaperman, posed as publisher of Kin's anti-Wheeler book, and J. W. Gehring, of Missoula, Mont., confessed he borrowed the money to pay for the book.

During the hearing in Washington, counsel for the Senate investigating committee asked Kennedy what he thought of this passage in the anti-WHEELER book:

"WHEELER and Truman see eye-to-eye, both being true, thorough-going liberals, and they are leading the American retreat from reason to the safe, ventilated hell of Nazi fascism.

"Hitler's corpse has been resurrected and is sleeping in a White House bed."

"Publisher" Kennedy plaintively insisted he did not know that passage was in the book.

He revealed that a Los Angeles printing concern would not allow its name to be used on the book, required Kennedy to assume all responsibility, and wouldn't move a finger until advance payment had been made in cash.

MR. PLOTKIN'S PHILOSOPHY

Plotkin was recalled. He said he is a member of the bar of New York City, the son of a rabbi, and the brother of a rabbi. The Army rejected him for emotional instability, he admitted.

Then he launched into a dissertation on his political and economic ideas. He said Americans must rally around Russia to preserve democracy which the Fascists in Washington are about to choke to death.

He maintained Kennedy furnished him the material which went into the book.

"I got the impression from Kennedy that WHEELER was the devil himself and that if they could get rid of him Montana would be a paradise," said Plotkin.

On further cross-examination, he freely admitted that his book, Rage in Singapore, didn't contain a scrap of truth, but was written from newspaper stories which he read while sitting in the public library in New York City.

AROUSED RELIGIOUS PREJUDICES

Kennedy wasn't very generous with Plotkin, if the latter can be believed. He insisted that Kennedy paid him only $15 a week for writing the diatribe against the Senator. Clearly, Kennedy had played on Plotkin's religious prejudices and made him believe WHEELER was anti-Semitic.

It was shown that PAC, the CIO's political auxiliary, collected much of the money for Erickson, some of the checks being credited to fake organizations. For example, the Committee on Public Affairs of New York City and the Committee on Public Affairs of Chicago. Both are "paper" organizations; both contributed to Erickson's "kitty."

PM, Marshall Field's "left wing" daily, printed a scurrilous attack on WHEELER and 140,000 copies were scattered over the State by the CIO. Erickson participated in this move, putting up $1,800 to start the scheme going.

PART PLAYED BY WHITNEY

Whitney, president of the Trainmen, was the only rail labor chief to actively oppose WHEELER. He put up money for the Erickson campaign fund and appealed to his members in Montana to defeat the man who "fathered" every piece of railroad legislation requested by the railroad unions in the last 15 or 16 years.

Whitney has evidently thrown in his lot with the CIO. It is said he will carry the Trainmen into that organization at the next convention.

One of the unfortunate features of WHEELER's campaign was that the exposé of the tactics of his opponents was not made public until the closing days of the campaign. Even then, many of the newspapers deliberately distorted the stories.

TRUMAN STOOD BY WHEELER

President Truman became so incensed over the way WHEELER was being treated that he publicly denounced the attacks by Boedecker, a railroad man who became enraged because WHEELER would not appoint him United States marshal in Montana and, therefore, joined Erickson's campaign committee and issued lengthy statements declaring that WHEELER was not the friend of the railroad workers.

Having served on the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce with WHEELER, the President was in a position to definitely nail these falsehoods. Subsequently, he vigorously reiterated his stand at a press conference.

On the Saturday night before the primary, the CIO brought in "Jimmy" Roosevelt, son of the late President. "Jimmy" is on the CIO pay roll, drawing a salary of $25,000 or $30,000 a year. He declared that Senator WHEELER had forfeited the confidence of the late President. WHEELER made a very temperate reply.

"'Jimmy' is a problem chid," he said. "If his statements were true, Mr. Roosevelt would not have asked me, in 1940, to be his running-mate on the Democratic ticket."

FULL PROBE NOT LIKELY

Of course, in addition to the money advanced by the CIO and Whitney and mysterious characters in the big eastern cities, there can be no question that the great corporations contributed even larger sums. That was the money that was spent to send men and women all over the State, whispering lies about WHEELER.

Unfortunately, there is little reason to believe there will be anything like a thorough-going Congressional probe of the whole affair.

The Communists, the PAC, the CIO, the left-wingers, the New Dealers, all those who believe in special privilege, who would make us a part of a one-world organization; who would lower the living and the educational standards of our people, bringing the people of all the world to one dead level average, will rejoice in the defeat of Senator WHEELER, as they have in the defeat of other patriotic Americans.

Those who believe in the old Constitution, in the future of America, should awaken to the danger and not let organizations which have no faith in our form of government, no confidence in our country or its institutions as they now exist, decide the future of America. They, too, should become active—aggressively active—and meet this new threat to our Republic by education, by exposure of the facts and by going to the polls on every election day.

Death of Mihailovich

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following article by Edgar Ansel Mowrer:

DEATH OF MIHAILOVICH

They shot Mihailovich.

Communist justice—sentence first, verdict afterward!

It was a foregone conclusion. As far back as May 1945 the former Ban of Croatia, Ivan Subasitch, then Tito's Foreign Minister, announced that Mihailovich would be shot.

A note to the State Department from the Tito Government explained that Mihailovich's crime "are too great and terrible for any discussions to take place in connection with his innocence or guilt."

What the world witnessed in Belgrade was not a trial. It was a political killing written and rehearsed in advance.

No wonder that the 23 Yugoslavs accused by Tito of various degrees of treason were allowed to call just six witnesses. Why be surprised that the so-called court refused to accept the testimony of American and British officers who could have cleared Mihailovich?

To justify Tito's revolution and reign of terror, Mihailovich had to die.

But wasn't Mihailovich guilty?

Sure he was—but not of treason.

Mihailovich was guilty on at least three counts.

From Tito's standpoint he was guilty of opposing the group of Soviet-directed conspirators who utilized the Nazi attack on Yugoslavia to put through a Communist revolution they could never have dreamed of accomplishing under other circumstances. (In this process, some Chetnik leaders seem to have accepted Axis' help. No proof has been offered that Mihailovich participated in such collaboration.) If Tito's movement was a people's uprising, then Mihailovich was an enemy of the people. The trouble is, many of us are unconvinced that Tito's regime represents the Yugoslav people—or peoples.

Which brings me to the second count. Mihailovich was guilty of being more a Serb than a Yugoslav. After the cold-blooded murder of 600,000 Serbs during this war by German-led Croatian Ustashi (the figure now admitted by the Tito government), Mihailovich, like Ambassador Fotitch in Washington, felt that the time had come for Serbs and Croats to go apart.

This, in my humble judgment, was an error. It was certainly not treason. And if criminal, it was a crime instigated by no less a person than Franklin D. Roosevelt. For it was the American President—and I can prove this—who deliberately, as early as 1941, urged the Serbs to strengthen themselves by divorcing the incompatible Croats and Slovenes.

Finally, Mihailovich was guilty of following the advice of Franklin Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, and the Anglo-Saxon chiefs of staff. He was guilty of refusing to take orders from Stalin.

And so, once Roosevelt and Churchill decided to throw Yugoslavia into the gentle claws of Moscow, Mihailovich was doomed.

Oh, he could have saved himself. Even after washing their hands of their Serbian ally, the American and British Governments still had enough conscience to offer to get him out of Yugoslavia.

Mihailovich refused. He was not that kind of leader.

In a moving letter written shortly before his capture, on February 2, 1946, the bearded general explained:

"Under no circumstances whatever will I leave this country and this people. * * * For I am not Josef Broz Tito, who has nothing in common with this land and with this people so that I can run away at the first sign of danger and seek refuge on some isolated island." (The reference is to Tito's flight from the Germans in 1944, leaving the British officers behind, and seeking safety on Vis Island in the Adriatic.)

Mihailovich stayed behind because he hoped, at the earliest opportunity, to lead a rising that would overthrow Tito.

He failed. The Communists caught him. His shooting was not an act of justice but a political murder.

Historians may one day conclude that in killing Mihailovich, Tito made his first great political error. When Bonaparte had the Duke of Enghien murdered, his famous chief of police, Fouche, called it "worse than a crime—a mistake." Shooting Mihailovich may turn out to be a mistake of the same sort.

Mihailovich in a Yugoslav prison could have made trouble for nobody.

As a banished exile abroad, he could have been at most a thorn in Tito's thumb.

But in his martyr's grave, his spirit may well become the force that will ultimately overthrow his killer. He may become a legend about which the Serbian mountaineers will rally for the final fight.

Therefore, in one sense, his execution will hurt Yugoslavia less than it will the United States and Britain.

For while Serbia has gained a hero, these two countries have allowed a faithful ally to become a victim.

When the radio announced the death of Draja Mihailovich I felt the blood of shame rising hot in my cheeks.

They Could Be Wrong

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM C. COLE
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of July 19, 1946

THEY COULD BE WRONG

Back in the intimate recesses of Washington's cocktail lounges the small-fry President-makers speak of long-term strategy. It goes something like this:

Forget about OPA. Let prices skyrocket. Let the consumers get a bellyfull. They will then be in a mood for some real planned economy. That will be the clear-cut issue to elect a President in 1948.

This newspaper will do its best to avoid crystal gazing, but there are signs, however, inconclusive, that these serious-minded and self-appointed architects of a new day may have their blueprints balled up.

Such signs as, for instance, strong resistance to rising prices dating from the end of OPA, including Wednesday's break in poultry quotations, Thursday's drop in Chicago livestock prices, reductions in butter prices when mama refused to pay 90 cents to a dollar a pound, a note in the Wall Street Journal that big retailers are beginning to worry about getting stuck with high-cost inventories, ads offering much-wanted goods at less than OPA prices, and so on.

It is basic in the philosophy of one type of liberal that the American consumer is a poor, forlorn lug with no spunk and less sense. If you don't hold his hand on the way to the grocery, he'll blow the roll on a pack of gum, with nothing left for such necessities as rent, gin, hamburger, nylon hose, and thin little books about the wonderful world of tomorrow.

It could be that these liberals are right. If so, they may have something in this argument for a totalitarian-planned economy as a desperate measure to save this American fool from his folly.

But even assuming the necessity, there is reason to fear that their cure may be at least as bad as the disease.

For planned economy requires planners—and planners, as well as consumers, may sometimes be mistaken.

Recall, for instance, the assumption that depression would follow the war's end. Unemployment would be eight million up. Disastrous deflation was on the way. So the plan called for wages to be forced up abruptly to provide purchasing power in this new 1933. The idea that wages had anything to do with retail prices was brushed aside as a mere detail. Get away, boy, you're bothering me.

Instead of deflation we got inflation. Instead of unemployment we actually have labor shortage in many spots—men's clothing, for instance.

The tendency toward run-away prices, which started well before the end of OPA, may be attributed, at least in major part, to this just slightly cockeyed plan.

We do not share this liberal low opinion of the American consumer.

We dislike to view this consumer as a digit in a Government book of statistics. We prefer to personify her in the form of mama—pay check in one hand and market basket in the other.

It is risky, we think, to assume that mama is fool enough to pay whatever is asked. In the first place, she is limited by papa's pay check. In the second place, even if she had the money, her pride would prevent her from playing sucker.

Mama is the person the Washington storekeeper had in mind when he explained to a reporter why he still didn't have any meat.

"Meat at that price?" said the storekeeper. "I won't fool with it. My customers wouldn't stand for it."

Multiply mama by a few million and you have what an economist might term "a strong anti-inflationary influence." Your merchant, your manufacturer, your farmer, are a lot more scared of mama than they ever were of Chester Bowles or Paul Porter.

And if mama and her tribe, who constitute the American people, are such fatheads as these liberals think, how did we ever do so well in the days before planned economy got into the language?

How did we ever cut down the trees, build the homes, farms, and factories which made us big and strong enough to lick Hitler, arm and feed the world?

If the country has lost the spunk and common sense which made it, may the Lord help us. We doubt if these long-term planners can.

We are not, as we said, going into the predicting business, but we think there is some slight justification for the belief, and hope, that these cocktail-room strategists may be wrong—again.

The Need for Reeducating the American Public Upon the Subject of Leprosy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I am including a statement by Col. G. H. Rarey on, The Need for Reeducating the American Public Upon the Subject of Leprosy:

The last world conference on leprosy, held in Cairo, Egypt, reported that: "Any scheme for the control of leprosy will depend for its success upon an educated public opinion."

In his splendid article, Leprosy Today, Dr. E. R. Kellersberger, M. D., general secretary, American Mission to Lepers, stated that: "The time seems now at hand not only to educate the laity as to the real status of the disease, but to remove the mystery surrounding it, as we have done for tuberculosis and syphilis and for other public-health problems."

This need has been recognized by all leprologists and it has been impressed upon the mind of every victim of the disease. It is essential that the public be informed of the facts concerning leprosy in order that it may free itself from the lepraphobia, or fear of the disease, which has done harm to its innocent victims. Due to misinformation handed down by ignorant, fear-inspired writers of ancient times, an unreasoning and unjustified apprehension in the public mind has been built, and maintained an almost impenetrable wall of silence around this disease. It was one of those subjects which was seldom discussed. At long last, however, this silence, imposed by ignorance which sprang from superstitious fear, is beginning to give ground before the advance of science and common sense. However, progress in this educational effort requires the combined help of all who will lend a helping hand to a group of our citizens who cannot help themselves. A vast amount of work remains to be done.

The price of public acquiescence in the false notions of the past, which have influenced the treatment accorded leprosy victims for 3,435 years, has been paid by these innocent people. They are still paying the unmerited penalties meted out to persons whose only crime is the accidental contraction of this disease. These penalties include ostracism, which started with the infamous cry of "unclean"; unreasonable segregation and the morale-breaking thought that he has been deserted, when the patient realizes that the American public, through ignorance and indifference, assents to and concurs in these unjust practices.

Back of our seeming indifference to the plight of these sick people is the fear of contamination and this fear is based upon ignorance. The facts are that leprosy is not nearly as communicable as are several other well-known diseases whose victims retain their rights to liberty. The medical world classes leprosy as being "feebly communicable." Many of our people will be surprised to learn that throughout the entire existence of the Leprosarium at Carville, La., a matter of 51 years, not a single member of the medical or nursing staffs has contracted leprosy. The precautions taken by this personnel are not comparable with those required in dealing with diphtheria, typhoid, and other communicable diseases.

Opportunity for service: The human need briefly discussed under the hearing "reeducating the American public" presents another excellent opportunity for service to mankind. It should be apparent to all that, under the present conditions and policies, our victims of Hansen's disease are at the mercy of an uneducated public opinion.

Take up the burden of educating the public upon this matter, a burden which has been carried by these sick people for unknown centuries. And, by publicity approved by any one of the organizations listed below, assist these agencies by helping to spread the truth about leprosy and its many problems:

(a) The Leonard Wood Memorial, 1 Madison Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

(b) The Medical Officer in Charge, United States Marine Hospital, Carville, La.

(c) The Editor, the Star, a small magazine published at Carville, La. (A subscription to this enlightening magazine is recommended.)

(d) The American Mission to Lepers, 159 Fifth Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

Valuable information pertaining to the present status of Hansen's disease may be obtained by contacting the above organization. By seeking the truth and learning the facts you can help correct this most glaring instance of man's inhumanity to man.

3. The need for reconsidering and changing our segregation policy: In this country, excepting in the State of New York, where leprosy patients are not quarantined or subjected to restrictions, when people are reported to be suffering from leprosy, they are segregated and detained in the United States Marine Hospital at Carville, La. While this policy appears to provide the best opportunity for advanced cases to receive continuous treatment by experts in this field of medicine, and while it appears that, until more positive and faster-acting remedies are found, segregation may be necessary in far advanced cases, it is becoming more and more apparent that segregation is not the best solution for a large majority of these patients.

(a) Of the several factors in our segregation policy which make it undesirable the two main reasons why they remain in seclusion; preferring to forego the opportunity to receive treatment rather than give up their freedom, leave their families and cause the latter to be subjected to the ostracism that uninformed society dispenses to families of reported leprosy victims. This cruel practice has caused many of the patients to take new names when they enter Carville and thus break all contact with their former life.

(b) The natural objection of human beings, and especially Americans, to the loss of their freedom and the attending loss of dignity due to being "fenced in" and set apart as a class marked for special restrictive measures similar to those designated for law breakers.

The small percentage of the estimated number of victims in the United States who have reported to Carville for treatment proves that our present segregation policy is too all-inclusive in its application, and that it is defeating its purpose.

Chester North Frazier, M. D., professor of dermatology, University of Texas, School of Medicine, in a statement published in the Galveston Daily News of October 14, 1945, and reprinted in the November 1945 issue of the Star, commented as follows upon this subject: "Leprosy has been completely dominated by the emotions. Leprosy has been so feared that its victims are unnecessarily punished, frequently by thoughtless segregation. In fact, they are banished from society and committed to asylums rather than placed in hospitals for treatment with a view to their return to lives of usefulness."

Opportunity for service: Ascertain the facts concerning the United States segregation policy by contacting the organizations previously mentioned. Inquiries addressed to these organizations will obtain the consensus among persons who have every right to speak as experts upon this and other problems connected with Hansen's disease.

Having determined the facts, obey that impulse to aid in obtaining a prompt modification of our segregation policy and the adoption of enlightened, scientific, humane measures for handling this public-health problem. The laws upon this subject can only be changed by the adoption of other laws, so advise your representatives in the Congress of the imperative need for prompt action upon their part in working out a just solution of this problem.

4. The need for rehabilitation of patients at the National Leprosarium: Rehabilitation programs established for the benefit of tuberculosis patients, infantile paralysis patients, and the crippled children of the Nation, as well as such programs provided for the injured soldiers and sailors of our armed forces, have served to advertise and firmly establish this humanitarian practice as an essential tenet or principle of our American way of life. By this benevolent policy we pool the "do unto others" spirit of the Nation, and are enabled to extend a helping hand to unfortunate members of society suffering from grievous illness or injury, whose needs exceed their resources, or who are so situated that they cannot, unaided, regain their abilities and skills which make for economic security and happiness.

While we fully approve and commend the rehabilitation programs designed for all groups mentioned above, our feeling of satisfaction and pride in these accomplishments is lessened by the knowledge that no adequate provision has been made for the rehabilitation of a group of our people whose need for such assistance, all things considered, is as great as that of any group. In this instance we, the American people, are in fact, "our brother's keeper", and therefore, we cannot escape our full responsibility for their well-being. It is not suggested that we are trying to elude our responsibility in this matter, but it is nevertheless true that, due to a general lack of knowledge concerning the problems faced by leprosy victims, we have failed to carry out some of our responsibilities. One reason for our lack of knowledge of, and seeming indifference to, the special needs of this group of our people is that patients undergoing treatment in the National Leprosarium have been segregated to the point where they are not only out of public sight, but almost out of the public mind as well.

The need for vocational activities which a business-like program would provide becomes more apparent when we remember that the victims of Hansen's disease, in most instances, enter Carville for an extended period. In many cases all business, social, and even family ties are broken, since it is frequently impracticable or, in the mind of the patient, undesirable to maintain connections with the outside world. Thus, from a life of normal social and livelihood-gaining activities, our unhappy neighbor, who has in some unknown way contracted leprosy, steps into a life of comparative inactivity for a period varying from a few years to life.

McMahon Bill, S. 1717—Control of Atomic Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the numerous amendments that have been adopted to the McMahon bill, S. 1717, on the control of atomic energy have so changed the character, purpose, and intent of the bill that it is evident that further study and consideration of it is most certainly necessary before it is in proper shape for final adoption.

The original purpose of the bill was to place the control, research, and development of atomic energy for military and industrial purposes under a commission of civilians in order to remove the danger of making atomic energy an exclusive element for destructive purposes.

The original bill carefully avoided the possibility of a member of the armed forces being a member of the commission. The bill has been amended to prevent a member of the armed forces on the commission and also a member of the armed forces as general manager of the commission.

The many other amendments adopted here radically changed the bill to such an extent that it is an entirely different bill than was first submitted for consideration.

The proper and only action to take under the circumstances is to recommit the bill back to the Military Affairs Committee for further consideration.

The subject of legislating on such an important and vital thing as atomic energy with its vast and unbelievable potentialities requires much more study than has been given to it. The question of national security will not be jeopardized by recommitting this bill. The secret of atomic bombs is now under the secure protection of the Army and should remain there until carefully thought out and thoroughly considered legislation has been written which can be agreed upon by the Congress. Hasty and poorly conceived action may be dangerous to the best interests of the Nation.

Indians Petition for Action

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANCIS CASE
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have received a remarkable petition signed by approximately 175 members of the Oglala Sioux Tribe on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, respectfully petitioning Congress that legislation now pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs be supported for early passage during this session of Congress.

The great majority of the signers of this petition are either veterans of World War II or members of families from which boys served in our armed forces.

In view of the loyalty and patriotic efforts of these people in the Nation's hour of need, I urge that consideration be given to their request.

I am filing the original of the petition with the signatures with the Committee on Indian Affairs in the House of Representatives as part of the hearings which that Committee has been conducting on legislation which I have introduced that seeks to establish effective rehabilitation of the Indian veterans.

The petition and resolution of these people follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas the Indians of the United States have been inducted into the armed forces since the Revolutionary times, or insurrections, within the United States and upon foreign soil throughout all parts of the earth and upon the seven seas.

Every war the Indian races have been mustered out to fight the battles alongside of the armies and citizens of all countries.

That great promises have been assured, which have not materialized.

Whereas during the recent World War II thousands of Indian youths both female and male in their prime of life have been forced into the armed forces, have been killed and others crippled for the remainder of their days upon this earth.

Whereas the G. I. bill is not effective legislation to rehabilitate the Indian veterans,

That the Indian veterans are still restricted under Federal laws and that there is immediate need for speedy legislation to relieve the present distress to our Indian veterans;

That governments of nations are constituted on behalf of all the people, and since wars begin in the minds of the people, that defenses of peace must be considered;

That ignorance of each other's ways and lives has been common cause throughout the history of mankind;

That suspicion and mistrust between the peoples of the world through which their differences have all too often broken into war;

That the great and terrible war which has now ended so far as arms is concerned, but the war against economic distress, and great denial of the democratic principles of the dignity, equality, and mutual respect for the Indians is prevalent, through ignorance and prejudice of the doctrine of the inequality of men and races;

That wide diffusion of culture and the education of humanity for justice, liberty, and peace are indispensable and constiute a sacred duty which all people must fulfill in a spirit of mutual assistance and concern;

That after the World War I patent in fees were forced upon Indians, and immediately their lands were dissipated, that for many years Indians were subject of shysters, and crooks;

That during John Collier's administration as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the policy was to have the Indian utilize his land holdings instead of leasing same for 5 cents an acre;

That they would furnish the money to carry on this project. In a very small measure some people have made good. But on account of lack of funds, majority of Indians are in dire need the past 3 years. Gratuitous gifts and relief work did help and promises of rehabilitation of all the people is impossible under the slow process as set up.

We, therefore, respectfully submit this resolution for your approval to be submitted with the signed petitions from the Indian voters and returned Indian veterans to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs.

The foregoing resolution by F. G. Wilson, Martin, S. Dak.

PETITION

We, the Indian voters and Indian veterans, respectfully petition both Houses of Congress to press all Indian legislation now pending or hereafter introduced and to concur and support such legislation to early passage during this session of Congress.

Huge Atomic Research Center Is Planned for New York Area

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The following editorial proves my point of yesterday, and that is that the Army units cooperate with colleges and other institutions and industry in the development of science:

---

[1] Indicates families of some member in the armed forces.
[2] Indicates veteran.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 19, 1946]

HUGE ATOMIC RESEARCH CENTER IS PLANNED FOR NEW YORK AREA—WAR DEPARTMENT IS COOPERATING WITH NINE MAJOR UNIVERSITIES TO SET UP PROJECT TO SPECIALIZE IN DEVELOPMENT OF NUCLEAR PHYSICS

A giant laboratory for research in nuclear physics, far beyond the capacity of any one university to finance, will be established soon as a cooperative Army-university project in New York State, probably in the New York area.

This became known yesterday when the board of regents in Albany granted an absolute charter to Associated Universities, Inc., the name by which the joint project will be known. Offices of the corporation will be at Columbia University.

Nine major universities are participating initially in the federally financed project, which will be open to other institutions in the Northeast. Such details as site and date of opening are incomplete and are dependent in part on decision of the War Department and on action of Congress on the Army appropriations bill now before it.

Universities now participating are Columbia, Cornell, Harvard, Johns Hopkins, Princeton, Yale, Rochester, Pennsylvania, and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The site considered most likely is Camp Upton, Long Island, 2 hours from New York by rail and one of the largest Army camps adjacent to the New York area during the war. The camp has hundreds of shuttered buildings and could house a vast scientific project with a minimum of rebuilding.

Other possible sites are Camp Shanks, in Rockland County, near Orangeburg; Fort Slocum, near New Rochelle, N. Y., and Fort Hancock, off Sandy Hook, N. J. The regents' charter specified only that the property would be located in New York State on property of the United States Government.

Trustees have been named, but the director is still to be chosen. The trustees are Dr. Henry De Wolf Smyth, chairman of the Princeton physics department and author of the Smyth report on atomic energy; Prof. William W. Watson, of the Yale physics department; Dr. George A. Brakeley, vice president and treasurer of Princeton; Dr. George B. Pegram, dean of the Columbia Graduate Faculties and chairman of the University Committee on War Research, and Prof. I. I. Rabi, chairman of the Columbia physics department.

Dr. Rabi, who received the Nobel prize in 1944 for work in the general application of the resonance method to magnetic properties of atomic nuclei, said last night at his home, 450 Riverside Drive, that the corporation might be able to describe its plans more definitely in 3 or 4 weeks. Originally, he said, the universities involved had planned to withhold publicity until details were more settled.

The scope of the laboratory's projected size was seen in the regents' statement that the expenditures are "estimated to exceed $5,000,000 a year." The War Department will supply the money through its Manhattan Projects Division, which handled all phases of the development and production of the atomic bomb.

At the laboratory will be concentrated the research facilities and trained personnel of all the participating institutions. This regional atomic research center, if successful, may be followed by development of similar centers in the Chicago area and on the Pacific coast, where nuclei for such centers already exist, Dr. Rabi said last night.

General plans for a regional atomic research center were first outlined before a House committee on June 20 by Maj. Gen. Leslie R. Groves, chief of the Army's atomic bomb project, but at that time it was not decided that the project would be definitely within New York State. General Groves explained how the center would work:

"We will permit advanced students to carry on research under the direction of the faculty members on work that we consider essential to the over-all program. It will train scientists in this field, but it will primarily advance basic knowledge in the field, and will keep us where we belong, which is in advance of all other nations of the world."

OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by C. P. Turley, representative from Carter County in the Missouri State Legislature. This article appears in the July 11, 1946, issue of the Current Local, Van Buren, Mo. Mr. Turley gives a very sane, fair, and clear statement of the issues involved in the very controversial problem of what to do with OPA. I recommend the article to all, and especially to those who would like to really understand the issues involved free from prejudice or purely personal considerations:

VIEWS AND NEWS
(By C. P. Turley)

What is this much discussed and much more cussed thing called OPA? Is it a sound, sensible, necessary wartime measure, or is it a sinister device designed to regiment the American people and lead us into Government control of all business? In all the heated remarks on it, I do not recall hearing much logic or reasoning applied to the consideration of this issue. Let us try to view the matter objectively, and consider with judicial poise and restraint the basic purpose of it and the major conditions and factors involved.

Before our entrance into World War II we were the greatest producing nation in all the world; and of the comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of life we had a much greater share than the citizens of any other nation. As a people we demanded and had the best of the products of the earth, and ours was the highest standard of living of any people.

With our entrance into the war we entered into a period of sacrifice and suspension of selfishness (excepting public enemies, profiteers, hoarders, and black marketeers), and our energy and our resources were primarily directed to the war effort and to the production in unlimited measure of the munitions and implements of war. Our tremendous production amazed the world, and ultimately brought the Axis Powers to defeat and death. With this all-out war effort and production of war material, the manufacture of ordinary consumer's goods was necessarily reduced to the lowest possible level, and in some instances stopped entirely, while at the same time we had the greatest income and buying power in all our history. With this sharp curtailment in the production of civilian goods (accompanied as it was with the unprecedented buying power of the people), the question arose whether an effort should be made to apportion this limited supply of goods equitably—which meant equally in this instance—among all of the citizens at a price all could afford to pay. The supply of goods did not commence to match the demand, and if no controls had been invoked prices would have skyrocketed, those of great incomes would have had a superabundance of the commodities, while the low-income groups would have had a miserable existence, and inflation would have wrecked our economy and defeated our war effort.

There could be but one action. We were of necessity forced to adopt rationing and the regulation of prices. And so the Office of Price Administration was created. Its duty was fundamentally simple and twofold: 1. By rationing insure an equitable disposition and consumption of goods; 2, keep down inflation. It seems plain that on both points OPA was eminently successful during the war.

Of course OPA made many mistakes. Also, any time a regulation or policy is laid down which affects the entire area of this huge country and the habits and business of 135,000,000 people it is sure to be absurd in its application in some instances and is apt to work a grievous injustice to certain groups. This unfortunate result is increased by faults in administration or by groups applying pressure or supersalesmanship and thus getting an unfair advantage. For example, the farmer apparently did not get a fair break under OPA (neither did he get a fair break in the boom days prior to the crash in 1929). No one who has observed the situation with an open, unbiased mind will undertake to defend the many mistakes OPA made. However, it is but human to judge things as they touch and affect us personally; but if we would secure an overall picture of the problems before the Nation, of the difficult decisions that had to be made in the days when Hitler and Tojo were carrying everything before them, we would be more restrained in our judgment and more chary in our condemnation. Modern war is an exacting, ruthless thing, and it cannot be waged or won on feather beds, rocking chairs, and roses. OPA was a necessity during the war. It made a colossal contribution to national stability and well-being in a critical time. In a program of which it was a vital part, our national economy was so ordered and arranged that we were able to feed and equip 11,000,000 men in service; to engage in full war production in a volume great enough to meet our needs and largely the needs of our allies; to maintain a high standard of living and health on the home front; and at the same time to keep our financial and economic system on a sound and secure basis.

Of course, as a permanent policy OPA is unthinkable. It is un-American, repugnant to our tradition of free enterprise, and in conflict with the age-old law of supply and demand. It should not be retained a minute longer than necessary.

The opponents of OPA say that the war is over; that competition will insure reasonable prices; that business will hold the price line; that the only law needed is the law of supply and demand; and, finally, that OPA is hindering production.

The war is over in the sense that fighting has ceased. But the terrible injuries to the world (and we are in it and a part of it) caused by human and material losses, by the devastation of entire nations, by the break-down of governments and economic orders, by dislocation of industries and excessive governmental spending and mountainous debt have not been cured. The nations have not recovered from the 6 years of suffering, waste, and destruction. With things so far from normal it is difficult to understand how competition can keep prices down, because so far all the competition is among the buyers. And the claim that business can and will hold the line seems like wishful thinking. To invoke and rely only on the old law of supply and demand is dangerous for a while, because in so many things the supply is not within sight of demand. If the disparity between the two is too great, then, because of our great income and accumulated buying power, the result is some degree of inflation.

It may be that the cost level in some lines is so high that the presence of a price ceiling retards production since no one is going to produce without an expectation of profit. That seems like a good argument against OPA. On the other hand it may be cited as an evidence of what would happen all along the line if there were no ceilings. There is an honest difference of opinion there; and to me it looks like a good opportunity to become confused between cause and effect. The surge of goods released for sale upon the lifting of price controls will be cited as proof that OPA was a hinderance. However, we must bear in mind that these items have been ready for some time but have been held back in the hope or expectation that controls would be abolished and the seller would thus reap an additional profit. This holding by the producer in the hope that controls might be lifted (and it has contributed considerably to the current shortage) was encouraged by the failure of a vacillating Congress to adopt some kind of a price control or decontrol policy 6 or 8 months ago, and no doubt it has done much harm to the country.

The true cure for inflation is production. And production has been delayed by reconversion, by a succession of strikes in key industries, and to some extent by the balkish, sit-down-and-wait-'em-out attitude of certain elements of business and industry. The more delay we have in arriving at full production the greater the danger of inflation becomes. We must bear in mind all the while that production must meet not only our normal needs but also the shortage that has accumulated for the past 5 years, so that even if annual production gets back to prewar levels the relation between supply and demand will not be normal.

The record of inflation shows us that inflation means misery to the masses, increased and widespread poverty, foreclosed homes and farms, ruined businesses, and bankruptcies. Yet people are unafraid of it. Fact is it rather appeals to the gambling instinct in folks. A bit of inflation now and then is relished by the best of men. For inflation is like sin: Enticing to behold, easy to enter into, and hard to break away from. It looks like we are tired of regulations, fed up on restraints, impatient with the ugly ducklings which war hatched out for us, ready for a joy ride, and confident we can fly faster and higher than the black-market man. So pull down your hat, hitch up your pants, and holler, "Let 'er go."

You will come down all right; your war problems will be waiting for you plus a beautiful case of flyer's colic. Your dad tried it nearly a generation ago, and it was wonderful—while it lasted—and he came down in due course on a rock patch confronted by a huge sign entitled "WPA." Must history repeat itself?

The British Loan and the United States Veteran

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, during the debate on the British loan I stated "that we should put our own house in order" before we assume any new responsibilities. One of our most urgent and pressing problems is the proper and adequate housing of veterans of World War II, which has "bogged down," and which is causing great hardships in many parts of the Nation, especially in my congressional district. The passing of the British loan of three billion seven hundred fifty million, which I opposed, is in my opinion giving prior and preferential consideration to Great Britain over our own veterans because much of the needed building materials already short in supply for building veteran houses will go to Great Britain, thus postponing the building program at home, leaving our veterans without proper shelter. We need 2,700,000 homes according to Mr. Wyatt by 1947. The $3,750,000,000 loan to Britain would build 750,000 $5,000 houses. Should we give Great Britain preference over our own veterans?

Another serious effect of the British loan is the recent proposal that terminal leave pay of enlisted personnel recently passed by the Congress will now have to be paid part in cash and part in bonds when our veterans need the cash now and not in deferred payments by bonds. These men fought for the freedom Great Britain is now enjoying as well as the freedom we enjoy. Why should they be penalized because of a loan to Great Britain whose public debt is much less than ours and whose financial assets in this country today exceeds the three billion seven hundred fifty million we have loaned to them without interest for 5 years and payable, if, as, and when she can pay over a period of 50 years.

I think we should have "put our own house in order" before we made a loan on such easy terms to Great Britain.

These Are the Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELLIS E. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, the American people are confused. During this year of reconversion, problems of peace and war arose which have been left hanging in mid-air. Partisan politics has played an influential role in delaying the solution of many of these problems. The Congress recesses and yet there are a dozen questions concerning the people's welfare that should have been solved. I signed a petition urging that the Congress be held in session until the question of price control was adequately settled. A similar petition regarding the other issues would be only fair to the people of this country who look to us for some solution and effective guidance in these troubled times.

WHAT ARE THE BIG NATIONAL ISSUES?

Price control is of first importance. The value of our dollar is going down as prices go up. Until we give supply a chance to meet the great demand being put on our productive facilities, the value of our dollar will keep going down and prices will keep going up. "Fair prices and fair rents" is the plea of the people and no legislator should turn a deaf ear to that cry.

With prices high already, we must guarantee a fair income to the working people of America. This makes the minimum wage bill another "must" on our agenda, along with the national housing bill to provide more decent homes for more people. And we cannot overlook the health insurance bill which will make it possible for people to consider their health first instead of their pocketbooks, when they need to see a doctor. A price should not be put on health.

Millions of individual voices are calling for these bills. Millions of voters are demanding fair prices, fair rents, decent incomes, decent homes, and a means of raising health standards. I have given active support to these bills, to be taken up without delay. With legislation like this, time wasted is democracy weakened.

WHAT ARE THE INTERNATIONAL ISSUES?

The headlines these days do not sound like peace. They sound fearful, distrustful, belligerent. They give no assurance that the world is going in a direction away from power politics and wars. There are basic questions of cooperation that must be settled quickly, so that faith in the functioning of the United Nations can be reaffirmed by all nations.

We in America hold one of the keys to the door of cooperation, opening out to peace. That key is the atomic bomb. We must agree to put this symbol of power into the hands of the United Nations, so that under a UN system of supervision and policing, all nations can cooperate in safeguarding each other from the use of so destructive a weapon. In America, we must see to it that atomic energy is developed under civilian control, so we can use it for medical and technological advancement for all mankind, instead of giving the military the opportunity to divert this great new discovery only into destructive channels.

We can make the United Nations function, by honest cooperation with the Big Three, by understanding that we cannot expect trust from others if we keep to ourselves the weapon that could blow the world to bits. So long as we hold this symbol of power, other nations will not be deterred from protecting themselves in any way that they can, by a race for armaments, or by economic and geographic barriers. We must have peace, not war. That is the issue and we must work for it.

IS OUR DEMOCRACY BEING POISONED?

The ideals of democracy are being threatened today, both by hate-mongers outside the Government and witch-hunters within the Government. Freedom of thought and freedom of speech are at stake. They are the first guaranties of freedom in our Constitution. If we do not uphold these guaranties, our assertion that we are a democracy is a mockery.

There are too many individuals and groups in the United States today looking for somebody to pick on, somebody to act as the whipping boy for all the ills of the reconversion period. These groups and individuals smear and intimidate racial minorities, religious minorities, and progressives; they smear with the same purpose Hitler had in mind—to dull the people's questioning minds by filling them with hate and lies.

I have introduced a discharge petition which would abolish witch-hunting on the part of the Congress and I have introduced a bill which would outlaw libelous, untruthful hate propaganda directed against racial and religious minorities. Remember! Hate can be directed against you too. It must not be allowed to poison our democracy. We must not forget that the ultimate rulers of our democracy are the voters of this country and if they want democracy, they must vote for it. If they do not want fascism, they must fight these seeds of fascism.

The War Amputee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by a war amputee of World War I, also newspaper articles and an editorial:

THE WAR AMPUTEE

(By Sande Hook)

"Oh look, mother, that man has only one leg." Mother retrieves the youngster and—"sshhh—shut up." And a little later tells him that he must not stare at crippled people and say things about them where they can hear it. The youngster is puzzled, but never misses an opportunity to stare, and most generally comments, too. "Look, there go five amputees. Gosh, they are so young, all of them just boys. Isn't that pitiful? That's war for you. But the Government takes good care of them." This last by any group on the street, railway station, hotel lobby, or dining room.

Those occurrences and utterances are common on the streets and in public places in every city and town in this country now. The amputees don't mind these remarks and especially the staring and comments by the youngsters. So mother, don't be concerned and embarrassed about Jimmie staring at us and commenting in the usual manner. However, very few of us amputees ever rid ourselves of that ever present consciousness of the absence of our leg or legs, and the presence of the artificial one or ones. There is a positive complex that is difficult to explain.

Yes, the Government does take quite able and noble care of us. (These inflated prices are rather tough on our fixed pension dollars and the stretching process is symbolic of Mabel's girdle—it just won't stretch anymore, but we would make ourselves look silly to strike—huh?) For which I am most grateful and I am sure that expresses the feelings and attitude of all amputees and disabled veterans. I have never felt that the people of this country begrudged what is given disabled war veterans. But I am sure that all of us disabled veterans recognize that there is a limit to what this country, or any country, can pay for war and its casualties.

The Disabled American Veterans do not want to be unreasonable. We honestly believe we have not been. I have been closely associated with many of them sufficiently long to know that and feel free to say so. We make no claims that the world should bow down at our feet, foot, crutch, or chair and that we should be allowed to wax fat in luxury. It was our duty to fight for our country and we knew it. The physical sacrifices we made and will continue to make until death consummates an armistice for us, is a part of the debt every able-bodied man owes to liberty if it falls his lot to pay it. No man has ever paid his debt to liberty, even though he gave his life.

There are a few salient and pertinent facts about war amputees that the general public knows nothing about and which I believe it would be interested in knowing and should know. You know, we are your wards for the rest of our lives, and you are entitled to know a "right smart" about us. I make no claim of being an authority on the subject of prosthetics and amputee psychology. I do feel I know considerable of what I speak, gained through personal experience—residuals World War I.

War amputations happen to young boys and men, who did not have the opportunity of completing that natural, carefree, gorgeous, exhilerating life of dancing, skating, skiing, baseball, football, picnicking, and hiking. I know those things are not absolutely essential to living, but the boy and girl who do not experience them, or some of them, have lost one of the essential balancing wheels of life—the choice goodies—and suffers for it in numerous ways. In our modern complex society, too many of that society can't suffer complexities without the whole being affected.

The amputee comes home from war and the first few weeks, or months maybe, are not so noticeable in the matter of these "goodies" that he used to like to do so much and did so well. There is the usual family and friend sympathies and attentions, to where the real issue confronting him is camouflaged for a time. But, after all, the family and friends have their lives to live—jobs, chores, social obligations to perform, and pleasures to enjoy. None of us want sympathy, but the fact remains that most of us accept it and sorta relish it. That applies to all people in some form or other. Let's be honest about it.

Yes, the gang will take you along on the ski trip, the picnic, golfing, and dancing, and someone will always be tactful and gracious and willing to sit the dance out with you; refrain from going out on the ski run, the golf course and the bridle path, but regardless of how you try to be brave and how hard they try to help you to succeed, there is something gone that no human being can put back. The sooner you recognize it and get through that terrible battle of readjustment the better for all concerned.

Something happens to the average war amputee that places him, violently and viciously so, in an entirely different category. He skips that period of life that is so full of the "choice goodies," which only the normal young can fully experience, and he becomes an older man very suddenly. Therefore, it is very essential for his happiness and those around him to fit himself into different groups than the "gang." He has to develop other means of recreation to compensate for those he was forced to give up. It is a terrific battle—the toughest one he ever fought—but it can be done and must be done.

Yes; there are many below-knee amputees who dance, skate, golf, ride horseback, and even ski, and it is difficult to detect their handicap. There are very few above-knee amputees who can do these things. There are those few—very few—who aspire to acrobatics and athletics and I certainly admire them and marvel at their achievements, stunts, and antics. A great many of us amputees are not acrobats and athletes, and do not aspire to those things as a hobby. Honestly and very sincerely and with a deep appreciation of the Government's sincerity and the men who are engaged in that service, I firmly believe these amputees whom the Government sponsors to go around over the country, demonstrating their acrobatic stunts are doing more harm than good.

The average amputee watches these "stunters" go through their stuff of running upstairs, jumping off tables, jitterbugging, turning flip-flops, running the 440, and they get big ideas. But when they can't do it, there is a terrific let-down. This thing of wearing artificial legs is not a jitterbug contest, a field meet, or a tumbling act. It goes much deeper than that. Let's not forget that amputation set our age up quite a bit and our quickest and easiest escape from that hell of readjustment is to attach ourselves to groups who do the things that are not too strenuous and adaptable, and are in keeping with our physical status.

No; I am not one to give up just because I'm minus a leg and resign myself to my bed and wheelchair. I wholeheartedly like action—and get it—even at my age. And I am now looking forward to having an artificial leg that will permit me and serve me to dance again and play 18 holes of golf. I do not propose to do any "jitterbugging," neither will I object to a twosome or foursome "going through." I will rest awhile in the shade while they do so, and be in keeping with my rather obsolete pumper.

As sad and tragic as it is, it is because of you, World War II amputees, that I will have a decent leg and be able to do these things. Please believe me—oh God, yes—I would gladly stay in my chair and bed and be more than willing to die than to have you in our ranks, if that could have saved you from being one of us and from the hell. There is some good in all things, so, because of your pitiful and tragic and terrible sacrifice and your numbers we may all get a decent leg and the service that should go with it, and which the people want us to have. There is absolutely no excuse, excusable, why we should not have them.

There were not enough of us World War I amputees to justify sufficient capital to invest in the industry of prosthetics to develop a decent leg. My first one weighed 14 pounds, complete with all the harness and shoe on. To get the thing on was equal to harnessing a pair of Missouri mules to mow timothy hay. The blisters, galls, and calluses were more numerous than both mules had. The one I wear now weighs 4¾ pounds, complete with shoe. It was made to my order and I paid for it. It is far from perfect, or as good as the industry should produce and would produce if the Government would pay the price.

The Government's policy is to place their orders with the lowest bidder. What kind of store teeth would you get if you let the job out for bids and accepted the lowest, regardless of quality? There is no such thing as assembly-line mass production of properly made and fit artificial legs. No more so than teeth. We don't look alike, stand alike, sit alike, walk alike, think alike, act alike, and desire alike, so, our legs just can't be alike, and all these things are involved in the proper fitting of artificial legs.

That is not intended as a critical complaint. Those in Government service who are entrusted with the problem of supplying prosthetics for disabled war veterans, believe they are being fair with all concerned by purchasing these things as cheaply as possible. It is public money and they recognize the trust involved. (Too damn bad that all Government servants are not as thoughtful.) The facts are—they are being very extravagant with public funds. A cheap, improperly fit leg is the poorest investment one could possibly make in the matter of war amputees.

It is extremely uncomfortable; the patient cannot wear it successfully; it very often will cause disorder to his stump, which many times necessitates additional surgery; the mental processes are disrupted, which can cause multiple troubles; the patient goes back for endless adjustments and is eventually a fit subject for any hospital and terribly discouraged.

A good leg, properly fit, and proper instructions as to its use by someone who understands the amputee's problems and knows how to handle them, and he will be a "satisfied customer"; thrilled with his new discovery; encouraged and eager to face the world, with faith and hope in the future, and will become a useful citizen instead of a hospital case.

The finest thing that could happen to us amputees would be to have every adult person in this country see the legs we wear; how they fit, and the method and "gear" to keep them in place; some of the blisters, sores, calluses and bunions on our stumps, hips, bellies, and shoulders. And visit the places where they are made and fit. I know you would be shocked. I know I was upon my first visit, and I never escape it each time I go back.

I go in a shoe store, which is most generally on the best business street in town. The shop is clean, modern, air cooled or conditioned; carpeted floors, comfortable seats and a well-dressed, well-trained man to fit me and sell me.

The average artificial limb store is most generally off on some relegated street, alongside the second-hand stores; the first thing that greets your eye and the only means of finding the place is two or three legs, a hand or two, some rupture trusses, pelvic belts, and crutches—all covered with dust—in a window that has not been washed for months. You push a door that the paint has about all peeled off and a bell rings to let the management know he has a customer. You go back through a hallway and the floor is bare and worn and creaks from your light weight—there is a lone 40-watt light on a drop cord from a very high ceiling.

Now you have reached the shop and fitting room. The fitting room is equipped with a bench, one small table, with a few magazines on it, generally two long pieces of pipe—second-hand—erected about waist high and 30 inches apart, used to hold on to when trying out a new leg. You undress with no place to hang your clothes, and take your place on the bench alongside five or six other nude amputees. You are stuck there, because your leg is being worked on and you can't gallop around much for 2 or 3 hours. There are piles of old discarded legs off in a corner; rows of new legs hanging on hooks for the paint to dry; a pot of glue on a gas heater to keep it hot so all the workers can smear their particular job; work benches, drills, saws, chisels, hammers, pliers, screwdrivers, shears; cords of willow blocks being seasoned for more legs; bolts of webbing, lacing, straps, and felt; boxes of nails, rivets, screws, buckles, and brads; whole hides of leather. The scene and odor are not very uplifting.

In case you should visit one of these places please don't blame the owner and keeper. The price he gets for his merchandise and service—which the Government dictates—does not allow him to be uptown on the good business street, with a decent shop and good service, which he would be pleased to give. There are very few men in this country who know the business of making and fitting artificial legs. It is a tremendous important profession now. They should be extremely well paid for their knowledge.

The United States Government is the only agency with sufficient orders and capital to make the industry and profession what it should be. If for nothing else, it would be a good sound investment of taxpayers' money. And I know the American people want the war amputees to have the best prosthetics available; they want us to be as comfortable and happy as is possible under the circumstances.

Mrs. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS' (Republican of Massachusetts) bill, H. R. 6304, designed to furnish transportation for amputees and paralegics, is a marvelous gesture and, if enacted into law, would be a tremendous help and boost to war amputees. The next 2 years will be the toughest ones for this new crop of war amputees. Anything that can be done to help them over this exceedingly rough spot, will pay wonderful and noble dividends in the end. An automobile is almost indispensable to us Americans, to an amputee it would be a gift from heaven and an unexcelled aid to assist him across these two devilish rough years. The boost in morale would be tremendous and the effects would be reflected in his physical status and which would keep him out of a hospital, and that is what the Congress and the people want, most assuredly the amputee wants to stay out.

We are extremely proud of the country we fought for and we are equally proud of our Congress and the people who have made it great, and we love you for it and for your interest and concern about us. We will always rest assured that you will be gracious, kind, and helpful to those who are handicapped because of their willingness to fight for you and keep you free. Thank you.

CARS FOR AMPUTEES

There are many proposals being made these days in behalf of additional aid to war veterans, but few, if any, have the appeal of Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS' bill to provide amputees with automobiles at Government expense. That this is not just another bonus proposition in disguise is plain from a reading of the testimony which proponents of the measure gave before the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. The Rogers bill is described by its sponsor and by many of its supporters among the ranks of disabled veterans as a proposal to extend the existing prosthetic program so as to supply legless or paralyzed combat veterans not only with artificial limbs and wheelchairs, but with means of automotive locomotion as well.

The amputees who testified in favor of the bill made out a most persuasive case. They pointed out that their rehabilitation would be greatly accelerated if they were provided with cars to offset their impaired mobility. They are severely handicapped when it comes to using streetcars, buses, and other public transportation facilities.

Under the bill, the Government would allow each veteran afflicted with such war-incurred disabilities the sum of $1,500 for the specific purpose of buying a specially equipped motor vehicle. It is estimated that from 16,000 to 20,000 crippled veterans are involved. These battle-scarred men deserve the special consideration which the Rogers bill would afford them. This bill would avoid having any semblance of a bonus flavor if use of the allowance were restricted, by specific wording of the legislation, to purchase of automobiles by the limited group of amputees and paraplegics who can actually make use of the cars. Thus narrowed, the measure would be strictly a prosthetics liberalization plan. As such, it deserves early and favorable consideration by Congress.

AMPUTEE'S "LEG" BUCKLES IN CAPITOL; GIVES FORCE TO REPRESENTATIVE ROGERS' PLEA—VET LOBBYING FOR AUTO BILL FALLS ON FLOOR IN HALLWAY—LOCAL SOLON CONTINUES FIGHT

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 17.—A kid in khaki crumpled in the Capitol corridor. His "leg" buckle broke and dumped him in the marble hallway of Congress, where he had come with 50 other veterans from New England, New York, the South, and the West.

They came here to lobby Members of Congress for automobiles at $1,500 each. They left this country for military service a few years ago. They are back. Before they left they were promised adequate reward for service to their country, Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, Republican, of Lowell, said.

Today, as one of them said outside the House of Representatives, "These Congressmen say they are 'all for us,' so why don't they do something about our bill."

They want a measure sponsored by Representative ROGERS enacted to give them and 20,000 other amputees and men who have lost the use of arms or legs a chance to resume normal life—as near normal as a man who has lost an arm or leg, or two of them, can get. They need specially equipped autos.

Representative ROGERS repeatedly has demanded on the floor that the House Veterans' Committee of which she is a member take action to get the bill out. But it is still bottled up. The chairman is Representative RANKIN, Democrat of Mississippi.

Republican leader JOSEPH W. MARTIN, Republican, North Attleboro, promised the crippled veterans he will press Republican Members of the committee to get the proposed legislation before Congress immediately.

That buckle that broke on the "leg" of the young veteran and plopped him on the floor is the key to his walking ability now. "Gee," he muttered, "I've heard of some guys having this happen to them on streetcars and in subways. It must be awful."

Representative ROGERS tells all Congressmen the expense of a car for so few men can be economically accounted for. "Two such falls alone for one man cost the Government $3,718 in hospitalization fees as compared with $1,500 to give a chance to get around without the danger of crippling him further and having a lasting effect on his mental outlook for the rest of his life."

One of the veterans spent 16 months at Lovell General Hospital, Ayer, Mass., and has been in Walter Reed Hospital here for 6 months. He is Staff Sergeant Andrew J. Martin who says he was the first "amputee case" at the hospital. He is full of praise for the medical men there.

ARM POWERED BY AN ELECTRIC MOTOR REVEALED AS BOON TO WAR AMPUTEES—ARTIFICIAL LIMB BUILT AT I. B. M. LABORATORY ENABLES THE WEARER TO PERFORM MOST FUNCTIONS OF NORMAL DAILY ROUTINE

(By Meyer Berger)

An artificial arm worked by a tiny high-efficiency motor to give the wearer controlled use of the wrist, the forearm, the elbow and the fingers, including strong finger grip for most normal functions, was announced last night by Samuel Alderson, research physicist, of 45 Charles Street.

Mr. Alderson developed the powered arm in the International Business Machines research laboratory at Endicott, N. Y., at the instigation of Thomas J. Watson, I. B. M. head. He got the assignment last October from Mr. Watson, who explained he was anxious to do something for the war wounded.

The physicist's first subject was a man now about 30 years old, whose left arm was cut off—all but one inch of it—20 years ago. Demonstrated by this subject at a closed meeting of engineers and surgeons in San Francisco recently, it caused excited comment. Nothing like it had ever been seen before.

POWER DEVICE INVISIBLE

The subject with the 1-inch stump lifted the arm at the shoulder, bent his elbow, rotated the arm at the shoulder, rotated the forearm, bent the wrist, demonstrated finger grip. The power device, hidden in the arm, was invisible.

The power source—a number of tiny portable storage batteries, each about the size of a match box—is hidden inside a hollow strap device that holds the arm in place. The total weight is negligible.

The model demonstrated before the committee on prosthetic devices at the National Research Council meeting in San Francisco weighed close to 4 pounds. Mr. Alderson is confident the weight can be materially reduced.

The motor employed in the powered arm, Mr. Alderson explained, was developed for the Army during the war. Its efficiency for its size and extremely low weight surpassed anything previously produced.

Mr. Alderson did not alter this motor for the model demonstrated at San Francisco, but has certain changes in mind for further experiments which will reduce the weight.

MADE OF DURALUMIN

The arm demonstrated at San Francisco was made of duralumin. The ultimate model may be made, Mr. Alderson thinks, of magnesium and plastic, for further weight reduction.

It does away entirely with the hook now used by amputees to grasp objects. A close copy of the human hand, a cosmetic skin glove good for a moderate amount of wear, will probably be available in the final model about a year from now. Such gloves have been made and give the appearance of a normal hand and fingers except on closest scrutiny. Plastic may eventually give a hand and fingers equally undetectable, Mr. Alderson said, and will last longer.

Mr. Alderson had worked on the project during the war with the knowledge and hearty approval of Surgeon General Kirk. When Mr. Watson heard about the project he invited the physicist to continue his experiments at Endicott and set aside funds for it, not with the idea of manufacture, but as a public service.

Mr. Alderson, who had worked in the University of California's radiation laboratory, devoted himself exclusively to the powered arm project.

CAN CARRY ON DAILY ROUTINE

"In its present form—and it is far from perfection—," he said, "it should enable a man who has lost one or both arms to carry on by himself in the daily routine of dressing, eating, handling objects of reasonable size and shape.

"The fingers of the present model are strong enough to permit the wearer to lift up to 40 pounds dead weight—say, a piece of luggage filled with contents of that weight.

"They permit a man to work fairly freely with anything weighing up to five pounds. A man could handle some tools and could probably do light bench work. He could not go in for heavy labor with the device."

Broadly speaking, the physicist said, the arm is equipped with cables, hidden inside the arm, which act pretty much as human muscles do. The different functions—elbow bend, wrist motion, finger grip—are controlled by gears. The gears are thrown into position by shoulder movements.

Mr. Alderson said that his first subject seemed to get the hang of gear control within the first 2 hours, and that he rapidly became more adept each day.

"A man," he said, "could probably have complete control of the device in a matter of weeks. It should then come to him as automatically, say, as running an automobile comes to the average driver. He could do it without thinking of each movement."

Mr. Alderson thinks that a man should be able to drive a car with the new device, but that he will probably never be able to use it efficiently for heavy farm duty or for any form of manual labor.

IMPORTANT IN REHABILITATION

"It should be easy for a man, once he learns the use of it, the" physicist said, "to do light bench work, or for any variety of light jobs. It should be an important factor in veteran rehabilitation. That was our goal from the start."

He said the arm would never give the wearer the sensitivity of human fingers, but the longer he uses it the more adept he will become.

"We shall have to do a lot more work," Mr. Alderson said, "before we determine its limits and its ultimate use range. I have not considered its possible application to amputated legs, but it has possibilities there, particularly in paralysis cases."

Mr. Alderson had not intended to make the development of the powered arm generally public until he had done much more work on it, but word of it leaked out during a debate in the House in Washington yesterday.

Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS told about the arm during a debate on atomic energy. She disclosed, and Mr. Alderson agreed, that the appliance may be in general production in about 1 year. Meanwhile, Mr. Alderson will develop it in experiments at various Army hospitals.

He said, "It will be, in the end, a wedding of medicine and engineering. Its greatest benefit will be in vocational rehabilitation."

HON. PETE JARMAN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, immediately upon the expiration of rent control under the Office of Price Administration, Mr. Arthur W. Binns, president of the National Home and Property Owners' Foundation, indulged in a national appeal for the establishment of local fair-rent committees in cities throughout the United States, the purpose of which would be to seek fair and equitable adjustments of the rent situation following the lifting of rent control. His appeal has met with an especially favorable reaction in my State of Alabama, on which I am sure Mr. Roy R. Cox, the Alabama State director of this organization, is to be particularly congratulated. In doing so, however, I wish to also congratulate Mr. Binns.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a list of the cities and towns which have established these fair-rent committees. I call attention to the fact that 67 of the total number of 105 are in Alabama:

Meat Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. ROCKWELL
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much said about the high-priced meat for sale in the markets that I desire to quote from an advertisement appearing in the Rocky Mountain News of Denver, Colo., July 16, 1946, 2 weeks after controls and ceilings were taken off meat. The fact is that meat in most of our cities is being sold today for less than it did during OPA, chiefly because it does not have to be purchased through the black market and the supply is greatly increased:

Meat, the yardstick of protein foods, is back at Save-a-Nickel.

Meat has the necessary proteins required in your daily diet.

The treat of the week is the meat you eat, and at Save-a-Nickel you'll find the choicest cuts at prices quoted below—for quality and price go hand in hand at Save-a-Nickel.

High Counsel by Mr. Green, President, American Federation of Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in contrast to the strange economic philosophy of CIO Reuther, Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, puts his finger on a basic principle which, if followed by labor, is bound to reduce the threat of inflation. I am including herewith comments on Mr. Green's article which appeared in Labor's Monthly Survey as set forth in the Chicago Journal of Commerce:

In the current issue of Labor's Monthly Survey, national organ of the American Federation of Labor, William Green makes a noteworthy front-page statement.

The AFL president is concerned with the death of OPA, which he would like to see brought back to quick vigor. In the absence of OPA, however, Green urges the 7,000,000 and more members of AFL unions to stabilize their wage dollars by helping to increase volume of production which can wipe out scarcities and the danger of run-away inflation

Accompanying Green's message is a cartoon bearing the caption, "Bring prices down by producing the goods." On one side of the picture is a store with bare shelves and a sign announcing higher prices for the nonexistent goods; on the other side is the same store with its shelves overflowing with merchandise and a sign announcing lower prices.

This column has taken many exceptions to Green's views on wages, labor legislation, taxes, and other matters of broad national import; but on this occasion the AFL president has done himself proud. His message is one by which the leaders and the rank and file of member unions can reap profit for themselves and their families.

Every worker in manufacturing industry should be interested in the best possible real wage. The final basis of every wage scale is production per man per hour. Everything we have accomplished in this country by way of raising the individual's living standard has been done through increased productivity per man-hour. All our economic and social advances have come about either as a result of increased effort per individual, technological advances or both.

The rayon industry provides a handy and easily understandable example of where higher wages for the modern industrial worker come from. Between 1929 and 1941, rayon output per man-hour was increased about four times by steady technological advances. This increased production enabled manufacturers to reduce their prices by about two-thirds in that period. The result was a sixfold gain in consumer use of the product, which in turn permitted the industry to raise wages by approximately the amount of the price reduction—or about two-thirds.

The system which produces such results is the same system which enables us to compete with the totalitarian and socialistic economies now blossoming anew in all parts of the world. Experience teaches us that inflation comes from a combination of two forces—an increase in money and not enough goods to supply the demand created by the new money. We have produced money at such a rate in the last 12 years that even all-out production will not prevent some price increases. But it is nevertheless certain that Mr. Green's advice to AFL unionists is 100-percent sound. The method he advocates is the only politically practical one which will insure that sellers can compete with each other on a price and quality basis.

Green's advice is in sharp contrast to the economic philosophy of the CIO, whose leaders still contend that rigid price control is the only road which affords any protection at all for the worker's rent, clothing, and grocery dollars.

The British Loan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM T. GRANAHAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement with regard to the loan to Great Britain.

During the many months of deliberation on the so-called British loan, I sought to investigate into every phase of the arguments advanced by those who opposed the credit as well as by its proponents. I voted for its passage in the firm conviction that, in the broad sense, it will be to the ultimate benefit of the Nation and the world.

The British loan never was a political issue. The nonpartisan character of the vote attest to that point. Sixty-one Republicans joined 157 Democrats in approving the $3,750,000,000 credit to our wartime ally and long-time friend against the 32 Democrats who opposed it along with 122 Republicans.

Despite the vigorous objections voiced by factions which sought to obstruct its passage, I remain convinced that the British loan as approved by Congress and signed by the President is a sound investment in national prosperity and international good will. Century-old antagonisms between the Irish and the English and the more recent criticisms of the gross injustices of British policy in Palestine reflected itself in the attitude of many Americans toward the loan, and I think that it should be made perfectly clear that its passage must not be construed as approbation of Great Britain's policies.

Americans, freedom-loving people throughout the world, condemn restrictions on human rights and liberties. By the same token we support that which will inevitably expand freedom and promote understanding among all peoples for the common good of mankind. The British loan, or more properly line of credit, is just such a gesture.

I would like to call your attention to a provocative editorial on the subject which appeared in the July 12 issue of the New York Times. The editorial, which answers those who ask what is there in it for us, summarizes the case for the loan as follows:

The first thing in it for us is the liberation of world trade, which will stimulate all our exports and bring in the imports which also mean jobs for wage earners and comforts for consumers. A commercial struggle with Britain would surely follow rejection of the proposed credit. Britain would have no choice. She is practically stripped of gold and dollars. She would have to fight us in the world's markets in order to survive. But if we extend this credit she will be able, and has promised, to drop all discriminations against American trade, including the sterling-dollar pool which is now a veritable Atlantic barrier between the two countries. Her prosperity and ours will be linked. In that union lies the reasonable expectation that interest and principle on the loan can be paid during the 50-year period following 1951.

We cannot afford the luxury of selfishness about a matter of such vital importance to our postwar economy. Failure to pass the loan would have been a major catastrophe to the cause of international cooperation so necessary to the preservation of global peace and economic security.

It is, indeed, a remarkable tribute to principles of democracy in action that many of the Americans who, with good cause, might have opposed the granting of the credit, saw fit to urge its passage. Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of New York, the Zionist leader, with characteristic humanity declared his support of the loan despite the fact that the British Government recently denied him a visa to Palestine. In a letter to Representative Bloom, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Rabbi Wise declared:

Whatever be the wrongdoing of the British Government in Palestine cannot alter my conviction that the British loan is imperatively needed. I shall not permit my abundantly justified indignation against the Palestine Government and its lawless practices to change the fact of my support, as an American, of the British loan. The issue should be decided solely on its merits.

To defeat the loan would be to adopt a punitive attitude toward all the peoples of the British Commonwealth and be deeply hurtful to the American people as well as damaging to, if not destructive of financial stability the world over.

I condemn the conduct of the Palestine Government and the Colonial Office of Britain. Nonetheless, I urge the granting of the British loan.

We are at a crossroads in the destiny of the world. The credit we have extended to the British is an expression of goodwill and a sound investment in international cooperation which will not only help provide economic security for many of the world's people but might well help to determine a durable peace during the crucial years ahead.

Rescreening of Displaced Persons Under Care of UNRRA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

POLISH AMERICAN CONGRESS, INC.,
Chicago, Ill., July 11, 1946.

Hon. DANIEL J. FLOOD,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Because 6,000,000 Americans of Polish descent are deeply concerned about a newly created Polish problem in the American and British zones of occupation as a result of rescreening of displaced persons under care of UNRRA, I have addressed a letter to Hon. Fiorello LaGuardia, a copy of which is herewith attached.

Please give your kind consideration to the contents of the letter and grant the support the cause may merit in your opinion.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES ROZMAREK,
President.

JULY 9, 1946.

Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA,
Executive Director of UNRRA,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: From a dispatch to the New York Times we learn with deep apprehension that Lt. Gen. Sir Frederick Morgan has issued instruction regarding the rescreening of 714,187 displaced persons now under the care of UNRRA.

It is reported that nationals of the United Nations, except persecuted persons, who refuse to be repatriated will lose the support offered them at present by UNRRA.

The report printed in the New York Times, July 1, states: "This final category would appear to cover more than 200,000 Poles, a majority of whom are Catholics." Selected delegations are being sent to Poland, where they are being properly indoctrinated and intimidated. After their return from Poland, they are set to exert another kind of propaganda on the displaced persons.

The new regulation violates not only previous policies set forth by UNRRA but also violates every principle of morality and justice.

It is not necessary to repeat at this time that Poland was the first to fight, nor to enumerate the contributions made by the Poles in our common war against the enemies of democracy.

It is evident that the Polish problem in the American and British zones of occupation is being treated with surprising indifference. It seems to us that it is high time that a group of Americans of Polish descent be appointed for a thorough investigation and asked to report to UNRRA, to our Government, and to our people on the situation in which 250,000 Poles find themselves at present in Germany, exclusive of the Russian zone.

A committee composed of American social workers, sociologists and experts, together with a group of Americans of Polish descent who command the Polish language and who are familiar with the psychological background of the Poles and know the political ramifications now so acute in disturbing the picture, should be assisted by the authorities of UNRRA and by our Government through the military administration there, in gathering all available facts. A thorough unbiased report with an analysis of all factors involved, with eventual recommendations, would be of great importance and of assistance to you.

The Polish American Congress will be pleased to submit further suggestions together with a list of names of Americans of Polish descent who are best qualified to serve in such capacity.

The fate of 250,000 destitute people constitutes a major problem.

The Polish group merits special attention and understanding. Their fate must be completely detached from present political currents both Polish and international. It is a human interest problem that admits only one bias, namely, humanity and friendship, understanding and a feeling of moral responsibility for their unhappy lot and their future.

With this letter I simply desire to interest you in this matter hoping that you will give it further thought and consideration.

I shall be at your service, at your call, to discuss with you this problem in detail, should you be inclined to act on our request.

Respectfully yours,

CHARLES ROZMAREK,
President, Polish American Congress, Inc.

Reuther, the Economist

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 18, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Wilbur J. Brons, writing in the Chicago Journal of Commerce, has an interesting article regarding the economic philosophy of Walter P. Reuther, leader of the United Automobile Workers of America. In a recent speech at Cicero, Ill., Reuther announced some queer economic principles, which, if followed, are bound to create inflation.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including herewith the article by Mr. Brons:

The build-up Walter P. Reuther has received in recent years at the hands of liberal commentators and essayists has produced the desired result. The president of the United Automobile Workers is now selling himself in real earnest as the country's one and only militant champion of the common man.

Reuther's latest campaign was inaugurated by a Sunday speech to a mass meeting of CIO workers in Cicero, Ill. "Unless inflation is beaten," said the speaker, "there will come a collapse and depression such as the world has never known, and it, in turn, will be followed by another war."

In sharp contrast to AFL's William Green, who urges all workers to stabilize their wage dollars by increased production, Reuther's prescription to beat inflation is compounded of an organized boycott and new strikes for still higher wages. To make matters worse, he tosses in a little rabble rousing about "billions in the pockets of speculators," "high-priced Washington lobbyists," and "revolution."

If we do have anything approximating a buyer's strike, it will not be because Reuther organized it. His Cicero speech may enable him to claim some of the credit, but it will be an empty claim. In ordinary times it is possible to predict consumer reaction to prices with reasonable accuracy. But no such prediction is possible now. For a matter of 4 years the consumer has had nothing to say about prices in controlled markets. If prices get out of line, it may well be that he will restrict his buying to some extent.

Reuther cannot afford to call the attention of his followers in the UAW to the fact that the appearance of supplies since OPA went out of the window has forced prices in many instances considerably below the level of the so-called black market, which was in fact the real market for more than 10 months. Nor can Reuther afford to tell UAW workmen that they will kill any chance of keeping prices in line if they strike for higher wages in a vain attempt to outstrip short-term mark-ups in consumer goods and commodities.

The truth is that when prices are fixed by a Federal agency, the Government must also control production and consumption. In short, the Government is compelled to undertake all the functions formerly performed by free prices. Prices normally ration consumption, control output, and regulate the movement of goods in trade. How well the system works when permitted to do so is illustrated by the fact that since OPA's demise, there has been no concerted rush of consumers to accumulate goods, such as there would have been had the public been afraid of exorbitant prices.

It is indeed unfortunate for organized labor that a man in Reuther's position doesn't use his influence to better advantage. There are two ways to beat inflation. One is for the Federal Government to cease deficit financing immediately, the other is for responsible union leaders to urge their members to produce at the highest individual level consistent with health and conscience. If both methods could be employed simultaneously, victory would come more quickly.

In his Cicero speech, Reuther did not mention either method. He is still the crackpot economist he proved himself to be when he sold a befuddled administration the idea that wages could rise without any effect whatsoever upon either production or prices.

Take Care of Everything by Lifting Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, I am proud of the people in my district, whom I have the honor to represent, chiefly because of their rugged honesty, good sense, and unquestioned Americanism.

Under leave heretofore granted, I include the following sensible article written by Mrs. Ethel Thompson, who lives in my little home town of Galena, Mo., and which appeared in the Springfield, Mo., News-Leader on Sunday, July 14, 1946:

TAKE CARE OF EVERYTHING BY LIFTING PRICE CONTROL

To the EDITOR:

While our lawmakers are trying to decide what is what regarding OPA, perhaps I may blow off a little steam by writing to your page for readers.

The big question on every side seems to be the one propounded a few nights ago by a certain radio network, "Are we headed for inflation?" It seems to me that question is so bound up in another question, "Are we going to retain OPA?" That one cannot be answered until the other is settled.

If we, the American people, are once more allowed to enjoy the freedom which has been our proud heritage in the past, I do not believe we are headed for any serious inflation. But if, on the other hand, we are again returned to the ironclad rule of the OPA, then I believe inflation will be permitted in some cases, while in other instances OPA will so hold down prices as to make it impossible for some industries to continue to operate, therefore spelling disaster to the whole country if not the world.

With the OPA in power, prices are fixed arbitrarily and this method cannot take everything into account so as to allow equitable prices to all. I am neither a dairyman nor a farmer, but I cannot fail to see that a man cannot raise and maintain dairy cows on feed at present high prices (I refer to the prices in effect while we were still under OPA control) and sell his milk, cream, or other dairy products at the prices allowed without taking a loss. The same is also true of the man producing pork, beef, or other livestock for the market.

Now, no one has the power to compel a man to continue operating at a loss so the only result, if price balances remain as they were when OPA went out, will be that less and less dairy products will be available and less and less meat animals will be produced and brought to market. As this is written there is talk of exempting meat and dairy products from price controls. So far, so good, but what is true of the dairyman and the farmer is true of almost every line of endeavor. There is an inequality of prices that discourages all industry.

I am a housewife and my husband owns and operates a modern shoe repair shop. Under OPA his ceiling prices are set; he abides by them. But there are very few weeks go by without an increase in the price of supplies he has to buy, thereby reducing his profits. At the same time, while we were still under OPA, food prices were steadily rising. I mention food for that has been about the only thing available and not too much of that.

Under the pricing system as it has been the past few years, plus allocation of materials plus the bottlenecks caused by strikes (which are brought about, I believe, largely by dissatisfaction of workers because of unsound balance of supply and buying power), manufacture has been so discouraged that many really necessary items are impossible to obtain in this section and no doubt this is true of the entire country.

I will give just two examples to prove my point, as these two affect us personally: My husband has for years worn one-piece lightweight knit underwear. He likes no other kind but now it is impossible for him to find anything as simple and as much of a necessity as that. The only other thing I shall mention is women's stockings. I have a prominent scar on one leg and it is very embarrassing for me to go without stockings. But I believe it has been at least a year since I have been able to buy anything here in my home town except coarse, heavy, cotton stockings which are too hot for this weather, to say nothing of the fact they are very unbeautiful.

Now I do not ask for nylons but surely it should be possible to get some rayons by this time.

Now, I firmly believe that if controls are lifted, or not reinstated (with the exception of rent where I believe there is real need of regulation until the housing situation becomes better), free enterprise, which is our rightful heritage except in times of war when regimentation may be necessary, will take care of everything. I think prices will rise somewhat when subsidies are removed permanently but what difference does it make whether we, the general public, pay these higher prices directly or whether we pay for them eventually in these same subsidies?

With freedom to be once more masters of their fate, production will go up and as soon as supplies are again ample, the old law of supply and demand will again begin to work and there will once more be an equality. No industry and no individual will do the best work or reach maximum production while hamstrung with so many regulations and restrictions.

Again restore the freedom of the people in this land of the free and soon we will be on an even keel once more.

ETHEL THOMPSON.

Cars for Amputees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein an editorial which appeared in the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., Thursday, July 18, 1946.

CARS FOR AMPUTEES

There are many proposals being made these days in behalf of additional aid to war veterans, but few, if any, have the appeal of Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS' bill to provide amputees with automobiles at Government expense. That this is not just another bonus proposition in disguise is plain from a reading of the testimony which proponents of the measure gave before the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. The Rogers bill is described by its sponsor and by many of its supporters among the ranks of disabled veterans as a proposal to extend the existing prosthetic program so as to supply legless or paralyzed combat veterans not only with artificial limbs and wheelchairs, but with means of automotive locomotion as well.

The amputees who testified in favor of the bill made out a most persuasive case. They pointed out that their rehabilitation would be greatly accelerated if they were provided with cars to offset their impaired mobility. They are severely handicapped when it comes to using streetcars, busses, and other public transportation facilities.

Under the bill, the Government would allow each veteran afflicted with such war-incurred disabilities the sum of $1,500 for the specific purpose of buying a specially equipped motor vehicle. It is estimated that from 16,000 to 20,000 crippled veterans are involved. These battle-scarred men deserve the special consideration which the Rogers bill would afford them. This bill would avoid having any semblance of a bonus flavor if use of the allowance were restricted, by specific wording of the legislation, to purchase of automobiles by the limited group of amputees and paraplegics who can actually make use of the cars. Thus narrowed, the measure would be strictly a prosthetics liberalization plan. As such, it deserves early and favorable consideration by Congress.

Veterans Hard Hit by Scuttling of the OPA

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, the veterans in my district are being squeezed by the rapid rise in the cost of living. Student veterans attending our colleges and universities under the GI bill of rights are feeling the pinch brought about by the abolition of ceilings on the price of consumer goods. This is true not only of the veterans but also of those receiving a low fixed income.

A real crisis confronts the veterans trying to continue in college and live on the income he receives from the Government. A concise statement of the veteran's position in this regard was recently contained in an article appearing in the University of Washington Daily of July 3. For the benefit of my colleagues in Congress and of the country generally, in order to present clearly the position of the student and honorably discharged war veteran, I am inserting the article hereinbelow. It is as follows:

BEHIND THE HEADLINES

(By Jack Ryan)

There are few groups in the United States that have a bigger stake in the outcome of the present OPA squabble than the veterans attending school under the GI bill of rights.

If the life of price control is not extended, the ceiling on the cost of goods will be removed, but the ceiling on the subsistence payments to vets in school will stand at $65 and $90 a month. The vet hasn't the slightest chance of getting a raise in pay to meet the increased living costs and, with each hike in prices, the ex-GI's standard of living will drop proportionately.

ECONOMISTS OPTIMISTIC

Economists who favor the elimination of the OPA cheerfully predict that such a move will be followed by a brief period of abnormally high prices, and then a gradual decline in the cost of living until it reaches a normal level. However, it seems inconceivable that this period of inflation could be of shorter duration than 6 months, and that is ample time for a veteran to lose just about everything he possesses.

The laborer can go on strike for more money, the office worker can go to the boss and point out the increased living costs and get a raise and the merchant can raise his prices, but Mr. Vet is going to have to struggle along on his regular subsistence allowance. If the prices rise 25 percent as has been predicted, the ex-GI is going to have to dip into his slender savings to live.

VETS SQUEEZED OUT

The position in which the average veteran finds himself at present is far from enviable. He has invested from 3 to 5 years of his life in the defense of his country, but the public is showing an increasing tendency to minimize his sacrifices and pay scant attention to his problems.

The serviceman returned from the war to find the good jobs, living accommodations, automobiles, and other desired commodities in the firm possession of people who stayed behind. The vet has to tramp the streets for weeks to find even an excuse for a place to live. If he wants a car he has to deal with merchants who think nothing of accepting a sum of money that represents about a year's savings for a GI in exchange for an old hack that will hardly stagger off the lot.

If he goes to work he must accept a junior position at the bottom of the ladder despite his age, and take orders from men and women who worked up to executive positions by taking advantage of opportunities that existed while servicemen were away.

About all the average veteran has is the few war bonds he managed to put away while overseas, and a short period of inflation will wipe them out. A great increase in the cost of living will work hardships on everyone, but it will be the vet, whose income is frozen at $65 or $90 a month, and whose total assets are a few dollars in the bank, who will be left with a firm grip on the proverbial bag.

An ex-GI doesn't have to be particularly observant to sense the change that is taking place in the attitude of the general public toward the veteran. The civilians seem to regard the vet as some sort of a vengeful piper who has finished his tune and is now seeking exorbitant retribution.

The prevalent feeling is that the GI bill and $300 mustering-out pay provide the ex-serviceman with more than enough aid to get himself reoriented in civilian life. They forget that lack of educational and training facilities, the shortage of building materials and homes, and the greatly increased prices have rendered the provisions of the GI bill almost worthless.

The people who stayed home during the war have won an advantage over the veteran that cannot be measured in terms of dollars and cents. The vet has his battle ribbons and discharge certificate, but the man who stayed behind has the things that count right now.

He has won seniority and rapid advancement on his job. He is established in his community, has a family, a home, and a fairly predictable future. The average veteran has none of these things, and under present conditions, they are completely beyond his reach.

It is becoming evident that the public is rapidly foregtting the sacrifices of the men who served in the armed forces, and the ex-GI has only his own veterans' organizations to depend on in the battle to overcome the great disadvantage brought about by his long absence from civilian life.

Our Armies of Occupation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, nothing is more unfair or reprehensible than for a commentator, a columnist, or a reporter to lift a paragraph or a few sentences out of the body of any person's speech, and to quote only enough to leave a wrong impression with listeners or readers far removed, who have not had a chance to read the speech in its entirety.

On June 25, 1946, on the floor of this House, I made a speech against the drafting of 18- and 19-year-old boys.

Most of the press and radio carried what was printed in the Stars and Stripes:

The present Army is made up of three groups—18-year-old youngsters who are undisciplined, inexperienced, and susceptible; rascals and riffraff, who have reenlisted to rape, plunder, and loot; and brass hats who are living the life of Riley.

Were I a soldier anywhere and read this statement I certainly would bitterly resent it and would forever feel unkindly toward the man who uttered it—if that were all he said.

I only wish that every person who read or heard that statement would read my entire speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 25, 1946.

In order to keep the record straight I wish to quote a few paragraphs of exactly what I did say on that occasion:

To be sure teen-age boys are bold and daring in combat but even in battle their casualties are terrific and certainly they are not well fitted for occupational purposes. I am glad in conference we eliminated 18-year-old boys—but even 19-year-old boys do not make good policemen and are not capable of self-control under the conditions they must cope with in foreign countries. They are susceptible to every temptation in a foreign land when removed from the influences of home, church, and school in their native land. It is bad enough when older men with mature judgment are segregated and removed from the refining influences in a normal society.

The amount of venereal diseases among our troops abroad is appalling and one naturally wonders what the future generation in our country will be.

Any one of us who has visited foreign countries and who has talked to our friends, recently returned, read the letters from our men abroad, and the articles of editors recently returned, knows that today our army of occupation, especially in Europe, is a near joke.

It is composed of three classes:

First. Eighteen- and nineteen-year-old boys—young, untrained, undisciplined, and inexperienced.

Second. Rascals and riffraff who have reenlisted to rape, plunder, and loot.

Third. Brass hats who want to retain their rank and pay and who are living the life of Riley on the misery of conquered peoples.

Mr. Speaker, all this I said, and I do not retract one single word, but I said more.

Continuing my speech, I said:

This is rather plain and unpleasant speech, but is too true. I will qualify the statement by the fact that there are some fine, clean, patriotic boys and officers abroad—and it is through them that I receive much of my information.

Incidentally I might say that I had a brother and five nephews in this war who fought in Europe, Asia, and the South Atlantic, and certainly I would hate to class them in any one of the three groups I have mentioned. I had many other relatives in this conflict as I had in World War I when I was in the Infantry.

On different occasions I have paid the highest compliments to our Army and Navy that fought and won the two greatest wars in history. I think it was the best Army and Navy on earth, but I repeat, sir—that not all GI's—but "that today our army of occupation, especially in Europe, is a near joke." I have been greatly disturbed by the low morale among our troops abroad since VE- and VJ-day. It is only because of my interest in the welfare of our troops that I reluctantly uttered such plain and unvarnished criticism.

To corroborate what I said on June 25 I wish to quote this Associated Press dispatch of July 13 from Frankfurt, Germany, which appeared in the Washington Evening Star.

[From the Washington Evening Star of July 18, 1946]

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT SUGGESTED TO CUT HIGH ARMY DISEASE RATE

FRANKFURT, July 13.—American Army officers expressed the belief today that corporal punishment was the only way to stem a sharp rise in venereal disease among American troops in Europe, which the office of the theater's chief surgeon said was "probably the highest in American military history."

The officers revealed unofficially that recommendations for severe punishment of soldiers who contract such disease had been sent to Washington, including confinement in stockades.

"But," they said, "it probably would take an act of Congress to impose corporal punishment, which now appears to be the only way to stop the increase."

The chief surgeon's report said that the trend still was upward despite a disciplinary crack-down ordered 3 months ago by Gen. Joseph T. McNarney, theater commander.

On June 16 the average rate of infection in Europe was 21.6 percent over a year's time. This was an increase of 5.3 over the figure announced April 25, when General McNarney ordered a strict return to garrison life.

"But in some areas the figure is more than twice the average," a medical officer said. He added that more than half the troops in some areas were infected in the course of a year.

The Army attributes the rising rate to the decreasing number of troops in relation to the number of promiscuous women; the youth and relative irresponsibility of troop replacements; the high disease rate among German civilians because of state-sponsored promiscuity under the Nazi regime, food shortages causing girls to trade themselves for chocolate bars, and the faulty but widespread faith of soldiers in penicillin as a cure for venereal diseases.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of the stern measures taken by General McNarney, who succeeded General Eisenhower as supreme commander in chief of our American zone in Germany, the rapid increase in the number of men infected with venereal diseases has not been halted. Imagine—"more than half the troops in some areas were infected in the course of a year." One of the chief causes for this staggering amount of disease is "the youth and relative irresponsibility of troop replacements."

Mr. Speaker, on the same date, last Saturday, July 13, another AP dispatch from Yokohama carries the headline:

EICHELBERGER CRACKS DOWN ON ARMY CRIMES IN JAPAN

YOKOHAMA, July 13 (AP)—Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, Eighth Army commander, cracked down on American soldiers who mistreat Japanese civilians today and threatened severe measures to halt serious crimes.

In a strong letter circulated last month and made public only today, Gen. Eichelberger said he meant to stop serious breaches of discipline. He pointed out that there were isolated "but very serious crimes to be reckoned with, and added "bullying" action of soldiers toward the Japanese would not be tolerated.

One American soldier already has been condemned to the gallows for crimes against the Japanese and several others face trial. Some others have received lighter sentences for minor crimes.

The general said that "our courts are empowered to mete out stiff penalties," if the order circulated in his June 22 letter fails to curb crime in the Japanese islands.

It would seem that the situation has become so bad that the following editorial appeared in last night's Washington Evening Star, July 18:

OUR TROOPS ABROAD

Recent reports concerning the disgraceful behavior that seems to be all too prevalent among our occupational troops in Japan and Germany make it plain that the problem is not merely a matter of restoring traditional American military discipline and prestige; it is a question of averting a serious disruption of our effort to restore peace and good order in a war-torn world.

Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, commander of Allied ground forces in Japan, is authority for the assertion that hoodlumism and outright criminality among our troops are "endangering the mission of the occupation." Almost simultaneously with the publication of his month-old statement came news of a startling increase in the venereal disease rate among American soldiers in Europe. Previously Gen. Joseph T. McNarney, theater commander, had warned his men against a trend toward public misconduct and lawlessness.

It is significant that both Generals Eichelberger and McNarney have attributed the disciplinary deterioration and its train of evils to the fact that the bulk of our occupational forces is composed of youthful, green recruits. Too-rapid demobilization led to too-rapid processing of replacements. The men sent abroad to relieve combat veterans have, for the most part, lacked the long, arduous—and profitable—training of the well-disciplined troops who fought and won the war. Moreover, they lack the esprit de corps of men fighting a common enemy. Too often, for reasons yet to be explained, the only enemy they have to fight is deadly idleness in a foreign land. Nothing is to be gained by temporizing further with these conditions, nor by attempting to cover them up. The public at home is entitled to know the whole sordid story, including some official explanation of the venereal disease increase in Germany which has brought it to the highest figure in our rcorded military history. An informed public will give wholehearted support to whatever stern measures may be deemed necessary to preserve the good name and good health of our soldiers abroad and to carry out with dignity and forcefulness our international commitments.

Mr. Speaker, if what I said back on June 25, has contributed anything to the revelation of these unpleasant, sordid, and regrettable conditions, I feel that I have served not only my country but the Army, as well.

It is only fair that the people who read the excerpts from the Army Times and the Stars and Stripes should know that I also said in the same speech on June 25:

Remember that each one of our soldiers abroad is not only a representative of our Army but also an ambassador of our country. Naturally, the people in Europe have only contempt for these young, and too many irresponsible lads, who do not possess the mature judgment to take care of themselves or represent us abroad. We need older and more professionally trained men at decent salaries to do a good job.

I also said in the same speech:

There are brigands still loose in this world who can understand only the language of force. Last autumn I declared that we were demobilizing too many too fast. It was not popular then.

But time I think has proved me right.

Mr. Speaker, I was one who urged that we pass the increase pay bill before extending the draft. It has been my conviction all along that by increasing pay, improving living and working conditions, providing for promotion within the ranks, by eliminating unnecessary caste distinctions, and by insisting upon rigid discipline and instilling principles of patriotism we could raise a volunteer army—the largest, most efficient, and best trained which the world has ever known—certainly one large enough to meet our needs and to provide an adequate national defense.

A few days ago I asked General Eisenhower how the volunteer system was progressing since we voted the members of our armed forces an increase in pay and benefits. The general had his chief liaison officer between the War Department and the Capitol to compile the figures, and below is a letter which I received from Maj. Gen. Wilton B. Persons:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, D. C., July 15, 1946.

Hon. DEWEY SHORT,
House of Representatives.
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR SHORT: While General Eisenhower was before the House Committee on Military Affairs in connection with hearings on H. R. 6817, you asked him how the Army was coming along with its recruiting program.

There was a marked upturn during the final week of June. The week-by-week figures for June were as follows:

June 1-7, inclusive	11,745
June 8-14, inclusive	12,319
June 15-21, inclusive	13,094
June 22-30, inclusive	25,336

Although no figures are available for July, it is anticipated that there will be a falling off for the first week because of the holiday week end.

With personal regard, believe me,
Sincerely,

WILTON B. PERSONS,
Major General, GSC Chief, Legislative and Liaison Division.

More than 62,000 men volunteered last month, which exceeded our highest expectations and goes to prove that we still have patriots left in this country.

May I remind the people who have written me letters that I do not have the time to answer each one personally but I hope these remarks of mine will explain my position as far as my feelings toward the men in our armed services, both officers and enlisted men, are concerned.

If the commentators and editors who lifted a few sentences out of the middle of my speech of June 25, had quoted me fully, you would know that I stated in that speech:

No person in or out of this Chamber has higher admiration or deeper gratitude for the leaders of our armed forces who did such a marvelous job in winning the two wars from which we have triumphantly emerged than I. This goes for the Secretaries of War and Navy and their assistants.

It is needless for me to remind you that on different occasions I have defended and praised the generals and admirals, but I know they are human, not at all infallible, and do not hesitate to differ with them. I want to maintain their respect as they have mine. They fight wars; we determine policy.

If for one moment the fathers and mothers at home think I exaggerated conditions abroad since total victory, they should read the article in the Saturday Evening Post of June 22, 1946, or the front-page article by Robert W. Reed, who recently returned from an extensive tour of Europe, which appeared in the Kansas City Star of Sunday, June 9, 1946.

I firmly believe that the Army and Navy are now doing their best to clean up a bad situation and I certainly hope that I will not have to read any more articles like the following one which appeared in Time magazine of July 22, 1946:

SPARE THE ROD

The Army's "cream puff," progressive school system of discipline, forced upon it by the more articulate of its citizen-soldiers of World War II, began to backfire in places where the world could hear.

In Germany the Army sadly announced that the venereal-disease rate among occupation GI's had gone up to 261 cases per 1,000 men per year. A few old-fashioned soldiers wished aloud that something could be done by way of punishment to make the soldiers behave.

In Japan, Lt. Gen. Robert L. Eichelberger, a tough soldier when required, appealed to his men to end drunkenness, malicious beating of Japanese, housebreaking, rape, and organized thievery. "Such goings on," said Uncle Bob, "were endangering the mission of the occupation."

(Private Leo Christensen was under sentence of death for killing a Japanese boy with a motorcycle, assaulting a married woman in her home, attacking another Japanese.)

And I further hope that in the future when some editors write and some commentators talk they will fully, or at least fairly, quote a Member of Congress.

When the policies and the practices of the Army are right, I shall praise them; when wrong I shall condemn them. Certainly no Member of Congress has any more right to condemn all members of our armed forces, than a member of our armed forces has the right to condemn all Members of Congress.

Keep Dairy Products Decontrolled

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE B. SCHWABE
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. SCHWABE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the people who are most familiar with the facts and circumstances connected with the production, sale, and distribution of dairy products almost unanimously oppose reimposing price controls on dairy products. Those best informed and in a position to know the correct answer, certainly are opposed to reimposing restrictions, and resulting regimentation, if price controls affecting dairy products are reestablished. Let us continue to pay as we go and not fool the people any longer by paying subsidies out of borrowed money, which simply means that we are asking future generations to help pay our grocery bills. That is cowardly and deceptive. We should be willing to pay for our dairy products approximately what the OPA said was a reasonable ceiling price on these products plus the subsidies that were being paid by the Federal Government out of money Uncle Sam is borrowing, and which will have to be repaid, with interest, by our children and our children's children. Let us not mooch on posterity.

Among those who are in a position to know, and have had experience to qualify them to speak authoritatively on the subject, I am pleased to quote the following letter which I just received from a constituent of mine, clearly exposing the folly of the bureaucrats and the fallacy of their insistance upon a resurrection of the dead OPA and the reimposition of price controls, involving the payments of subsidies out of money that must be borrowed, and keep dairy products decontrolled:

GOOD HUMOR ICE CREAM CO.,
Tulsa, Okla., July 15, 1946.

The Honorable GEORGE B. SCHWABE,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SCHWABE: OPA has been eliminated from the national scene, ceilings removed now for 15 days, and free and open market prices have been established which are diametrically opposed to OPA predictions.

The Senate has voted to keep dairy products exempt from OPA, if and when they reinstate OPA. We seriously and most sincerely ask that you, as Representative from the State of Oklahoma vote to back up the Senate with regard to dairy products for the following sound and proven reasons:

1. Milk, butter, cheese, evaporated milk, and other dairy products are selling at about June 30 OPA ceiling, plus subsidy, in some cases less.

2. In more than 10 States the increase in milk prices to offset subsidies that producers were losing after July 1 were ordered or sanctioned by State authorities.

3. Opinion in dairy circles is that markets will not go substantially higher than present market; in fact, the best opinion is that over the next year market prices will average lower than ceilings plus subsidies.

4. Cash prices have now taken the place of subsidy money because the farmer could not be expected to take lower income since the executive department of the Government, by veto, interfered with necessary returns to producers. The elimination of subsidies is now an accomplished fact; to reinstate subsidy payments now instead of cash and to roll back the cash prices would be extremely unsettling and discouraging to producers.

5. Seven hundred and thirty million dollars a year dairy subsidy money is being saved taxpayers and production is being stimulated by the confidence created by payment of cash prices instead of "courthouse" money.

6. Black markets have been eliminated. Dairy products are getting back into legitimate channels where they will be available to all the people and the average cost to the consumer on manufactured dairy products is substantially less than it was under the black markets prevailing before June 30.

7. Under the Constitution, Congress, not the executive department, should determine the wise course and surely should insist, veto or no veto, that black markets and the bureaucratic direction of what and how consumers may purchase are not the American way of life.

Sincerely yours,

GOOD HUMOR ICE CREAM CO.
HARRY B. BURT, President.

Mr. Speaker, I am also in receipt of the following letter from Producers Dairy, Inc., of Muskogee, Okla., not a constituent of mine, but which clearly shows that we should keep dairy products decontrolled:

PRODUCERS DAIRY, INC.,
Muskogee, Okla., July 16, 1946.

Representative GEORGE B. SCHWABE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Some of the reasons why we have urged you to continue to support the decontrol of dairy products are as follows:

In the Muskogee market, the price of milk was increased to the producer and consumer to cover the loss of subsidy and everything is going along nicely.

We do not anticipate any further increases.

Should dairy products be returned to control, the farmer-producer would be discouraged in his production of milk, and the production would surely take a drop.

We cannot too strongly urge you to continue support of decontrol.

Respectfully,

C. R. COLLINS,
Manager, Producers Dairy.

Many others engaged in the production, marketing, and distribution of dairy products have written me to the same effect. I do not believe that their arguments can be successfully refuted. It is apparent to me that if price controls are reimposed upon dairy products, it will be merely the result of arbitrary and capricious action on the part of the administration leaders, and will result in untold confusion, dissatisfaction, and hardship upon all who deal with dairy products. It is likely to react unfavorably, and is sure to have a tendency to destroy the confidence of the people in our Government and its administration.

"Where're You Going To Get The Money?"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem by Horace C. Carlisle:

There's a statesman in the Congress
That is worth his weight in gold,
One who stands for sacred honor,
And who can't be bought or sold—
Governments, he claims, like people,
Must take in more than they spend—
"Where're you going to get the money?"
Must be answered, in the end.

On appropriation measures,
Which to him appear unwise,
He speaks out his opposition,
As, repeatedly, he cries,
"Where're you going to get the money?"
This he knows will have to be Borrowed, and will, if continued,
Bankrupt this Land of the Free.

With the Government indebted
To the people more than they
And their children and grandchildren
Can pay taxes to repay,
As she keeps on plunging deeper
Down in debt, we hear him shout,
"Where're you going to get the money?"
But they cannot drown him out.

An Interpretation of China's Conflict

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 17 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "An Interpretation of China's Conflict," written by Gunther Stein and published in the summer 1946 issue of the Yale Review.

Mr. President, I find, according to an estimate from the Government Printing Office, that the article will take a little more space in the RECORD than the two printed pages allowed under the rule, and will cost $180. In spite of this, I ask that the article be printed in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN INTERPRETATION OF CHINA'S CONFLICT
(By Gunther Stein)

"Don't try to judge the course of events in China by the acts of a few men in the foreground of the political scene or by the squabbles, deals, and fights between our factions," a wise, liberal banker and scholar warned me when I first went to China a good many years ago. "Those figureheads are not China; nor are we bankers, businessmen, and intellectuals. All of us have less influence on developments than we make ourselves believe; and the plain people, in spite of their illiteracy, backwardness, and prejudice, have more than they may think.

"If you want to know what is really happening and to find out that things are neither as complicated nor as contradictory and mysterious in China as they may seem, study the slowly changing lives and views of the people in the country, of peasants and landlords, merchants, soldiers, and officials.

"And take the long view," he added. "Don't get confused by day-to-day events that are played up in the press. Look for the underlying long-term logic of developments. For we are on our tortuous way from age-old semifeudalism to a new form of society. You cannot measure the pace of this march by weeks and months, but you will see that we are moving on, even at times when we seem to be hopelessly stalled."

The warnings of the old Chinese banker, whom the Japanese killed a few years later in an attack on a passenger plane, are as valid now as they proved to be to me during my years in China. In 1932, I found the people of Manchuria helplessly yielding to the Japanese and the people of north and central China stunned by the continuation of the 5-year-old civil war between the Kuomintang and Communist camps, which seemed to frustrate all hope of stopping Japanese aggression and of pushing the fight for democratic reforms against feudalism in village and town. Yet even then I found a surprisingly strong and widespread popular will to resist the enemy and to overcome all handicaps to social reform and national unity. On each of my four journeys to Peiping, Shanghai, Nanking, and Canton during the following 5 years I found a steady growth of that will, in spite of the seeming deterioration of an over-all picture that appeared to be dominated by the country's civil war and the continued failure of the National Government to resist further and further Japanese aggression. During 5 years of war I spent in beleaguered Chungking and various parts of Free China, on visits to the front lines and finally on a 5-month journey to the Communist-controlled areas, with the first party of correspondents the National Government permitted to go there after years of strict blockade, I witnessed the dramatic growth of that popular will to free and unify and democratize the country, its steady rise against the persistence of the blind, stubborn forces of feudalism which were crippling them in their threefold effort.

The confusing changes the newspapers report do not really tell the whole story of what is going on in China during this crucial period. They speak hopefully one day of progress toward interparty agreements on national unity and democratic reform as though a final solution had been found to problems much deeper than the current partisan conflict, and gloomily the next day about broken promises, renewed fighting, and fresh dangers of open civil war, as though all hope for Chinese progress had been lost.

Yet underneath that vexing surface of the Chinese struggle are issues to which the newspapers can refer only in passing: issues as simple as they are formidable, and possible for anyone to comprehend who understands the historical experiences—different as these were from China's in many ways—which western nations went through in their struggles to free themselves from the fetters of feudalism and lay the foundations for modern democracy.

News about the present act in the Chinese renaissance drama and current comments deal mainly with the foreground of the vast stage. It is crowded with figures, groups, and institutions whose actions must seem anachronistic since they are presented with ill-fitting modern western labels like "President" and "opposition leader," "Nationalist" and "Communist" Parties, "National Assembly" and "Constitution."

Behind that bewildering foreground are the real actors of whom we hear little, the people of China, awakened to new political consciousness and activity: the masses of peasants who are neither so lethargic nor so powerless as might be thought; millions of small landlords, merchants, and old-fashioned gentry, of local officials and army officers who have long been the real ruling class of China and react in various ways to the impending surrender of their birthrights to social progress; millions of common soldiers of different political armies whose opinions have come to influence events a good deal; and a thin upper stream of generals, politicians, intellectuals, and businessmen who have become pawns rather than principals of the accelerating struggle that makes them loom too large in the eyes of the outside world.

A broad analysis of present events in China must deal primarily with these main social groups rather than with the controversial figures in the foreground, in terms of realities rather than in terms of right and wrong, if it is to clarify the basic trends that determine developments in China. It is certainly impossible for anyone to observe all the shades of social circumstance and behavior of 450,000,000 people whose individualism is one of their main characteristics and who have had no opportunity to express their views by ballot. Yet decades of ferment and revolution, followed by 8 years of war with Japan which made the people of all strata go through extraordinary political experiences and impressed them more deeply than anything in the recent past, have forced more and more Chinese to take their stand on basic issues and to conform to either of the main types of attitude that have emerged.

In one-half of the country, temporary Japanese rule put before them the choice between a new, invigorating nationalism and degrading collaboration with the enemy. In those same vast territories, behind and between the Japanese lines, between eighty and a hundred million Chinese, according to my information, went through an equally new experience with their own typically Chinese Communists, who mobilized them in the name of a patriotic, progressive popular front for the liberation of their homes from the enemy and for the introduction in the liberated areas of a new economic and political system that hinges on cooperation as the quickest and most effective departure from feudal stagnation and hopelessness. To their experience with Japanese rule and not infrequent Chinese collaborationism and with their dynamic, Communist-sponsored antithesis was added that of armed civil strife under the enemy's eyes, that grim, twofold struggle between Chinese factions in which the new popular-front movement clashed, on the one hand, with conservative forces under the Kuomintang Government in Chungking and, on the other, with large collaborationist forces under Japanese-appointed puppets.

In the other half of the country, in most of the Free China of the war period, the people came for the first time into close contact with the central government and its ruling Kuomintang (Nationalist Party) when the authorities under Chiang Kai-shek, fleeing from the Yangtze regions invaded vast provinces which they had previously been unable to wrest from the grip of local warlord and gentry cliques. And the people in the rear, at first full of hope for a new deal, witnessed under the bombs of the enemy and in the grip of a steadily growing economic crisis the sad spectacle of constant haggling, compromise, and struggle between their new and old rulers and of increasing conflict between the progressive and reactionary forces within the central government camp itself.

The peasants have to be ranked first among the various social groups that were deeply affected by those varied and intense experiences. Almost everywhere in China, it appeared to me that the majority of the peasants, who constitute more than four-fifths of the total population, were better prepared for quick and intelligent reaction to the new circumstances than had been expected. Wherever I went in China during the war years, this was borne out by observations I gathered from resident foreign missionaries and physicians and from Chinese officials; but even more by the actions of the peasants. For, in spite of their age-old state of feudal bondage, backwardness, and illiteracy, they had long been making steady progress in their social consciousness, remembering their latent political strength which during every period of change in China's long history had made them the real fountainhead of power.

As always in historical situations that offered a positive challenge to them, a majority of the peasants in the north reacted favorably and with a spontaneous creative force that surprised many "Old China hands" to the stimulus of the Communist-sponsored popular-front movement. On this impression I came to agree with other foreign correspondents such as those of the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune; with such American pilots shot down over Communist-controlled areas who got acquainted with conditions on their long marches to the Kuomintang rear, as Lt. Curtis Bush; with Raymond P. Ludden and John S. Service, observers of the State Department, and with Col. David D. Barrett and Major Casberg, military members of the United States Army Observer Section. The people in that area seemed to identify themselves completely with the guerrilla war against the Japanese and to make the fight their own. They participated enthusiastically in its effort at a thorough reform of the social order which equally became in substance their own achievement.

On the other hand, as always in historical situations that challenged them in a negative way, the ire of large masses of peasants in the rear of Free China was aroused by the fumblings of the central government, its failure to curb the local forces of feudal suppression and the inefficiency and corruption of many of its recruiting and taxation agents that marked the first contact of the people of those sections with the Nationalist regime and its ruling party, the Kuomintang. A majority of the peasants, as was admitted to me by the liberal Dr. Sun Fo, expressed their growing dissatisfaction with the local vested interests and the new contenders for power in the traditional way, by passive resistance and stubborn failure to respond to Chiang Kai-shek's moral exhortations for more obedience. But, as so often during past periods of especially hard-felt misrule, a good number of individual villages and counties reacted in a more aggressive manner, refusing the payment of rents to their landlords (usually 60 or 70 percent of the tenants' harvests); evading and even openly refusing the payment of unjust taxes; sabotaging the recruiting efforts of a frequently corrupt local gentry on behalf of the National army; and in several cases even rising in armed riots against the injustices which their loud complaints and the frequent promises of Chiang Kai-shek did nothing to remedy.

In both political camps, postwar developments strengthened the reactions of the peasants to their wartime experiences. Those in the Communist-controlled regions began to reap the first fruits of their new "cooperative" enterprise in agriculture and small-scale manufacture and of primitive yet effective administrative reform under their so-called "New Democracy," at a time when the rising tides of inflation and administrative disintegration wrought havoc in what had been Free China and the areas the central government took over from the Japanese after their defeat.

The peasants in the Kuomintang-dominated areas—and in Manchuria which had been sealed off from China for 14 years—began to hear more than they had before about the agricultural and administrative reforms that had taken place to the north. The newly legalized Democratic League, a group of middle-of-the-road parties of intellectuals with old sympathies for the peasants, made use of what freedom of speech the National Government had to grant the people under General Marshall's pressure for democratic reforms and, together with non-party opposition groups, helped the peasants express their reform demands on Chiang Kai-shek's regime, explained to them the half way promises he was induced to make, and finally aided the peasants in expressing popular protests against the incessant delays in their fulfillment.

The political stand of the peasantry can therefore be summarized as follows. In the Communist-controlled regions, the large majority of the peasants seemed to me and other foreign observers somewhat better off than elsewhere, satisfied with the fundamentals of the reforms that have been started, and hopeful of achieving their final goals of greater agricultural and handicraft productivity in a system that gives full scope to private property, and of further progress toward self-government. In the Kuomintang-controlled areas none of the peasants appeared to be satisfied with the existing systems of land tenure and administration. A large part of them, continuing their sullen noncooperation with the government, may still not be ready for political action, but the numbers of those who are getting politically articulate and active are continuously increasing and have in fact contributed largely to the increasing pressure for thorough-going reforms which are being brought to bear on Chiang Kai-shek.

Second in importance in the social picture of China are the powerful old-style village and small-town gentry, numbering more than a million families. Many of them are at the same time the unchallengeable landlords and money lenders of their villages and towns, their only merchants who sell the farmers' products and provide their needs of city-made commodities at prices largely determined by themselves, their magistrates and their dispensers of law and of Confucianist or Kuomintang-neo-Confucianist ideology.

The same wartime experiences that affected the peasantry have had strong influence on the attitudes of the lower gentry class in which sleepy, indifferent traditionalists used to predominate while reckless usurers and oppressors were probably not much more prevalent than comparatively well-meaning men who realized both the inequity and the inefficiency of a stagnant feudal system but who have been too uneducated in modern ways and too much dependent upon reactionaries in the leadership of their guilds and cliques and secret societies to formulate and advocate their vague reform ideas.

It is probably one of the most important achievements of the Communist-sponsored New Democracy to have won over what seems to be a large percentage of the better as well as the indifferent types of gentry in the areas under their control. Their land-confiscation policies of the civil-war decade prior to the war with Japan were replaced by a general reduction of land rents to a flat 40 percent of the tenants' crops. The resultant losses to the landlords were lessened and eventually overcompensated by considerable tax reductions in consequence of administrative reforms, by the increase of agricultural productivity, and by the encouragement of new profit-making enterprise of landlords in small-scale manufacture. The previous discrimination against any members of the gentry was ended by law and the new mutual confidence between the gentry, the peasants, and the Communists that arose during the war from their respective fighting records in a common guerrilla war against the Japanese led naturally to their collaboration in economic and political matters. In this way, many small landlords, merchants, and money lenders, who had always been fretting under the comparative poverty of their "privileged" existence in a stagnant feudal society, came to realize that the reforms sponsored by the Communists were to their own advantage and gave them new scope both for greater prosperity and for active participation in the self-government of their communities, and in their general progress.

In Kuomintang-controlled China, by contrast, the central government suffered one of its most noteworthy failures when its policies drove a good part of corresponding gentry groups into the arms of the growing political opposition. Doubly bled by the old local interests and the new, national contenders for power who were both taking for granted the inn te conservatism and loyalty of the small gentry, landlords, merchants, and money lenders suffered almost as much as the peasants from corruption and inefficiency on the upper levels of the administration. They were refused a voice in the affairs of political units above the village, town, or county and their political attitude came to conform more and more to that of the dejected and often hostile peasantry. They, too, began to realize the hopelessness of their situation and began to demand democratic reform from the bottom up, as in the North, reform which would break the feudal stalemate of village and small-town society, stimulate new individual and cooperative enterprise and thus raise the productivity of farms and small-scale manfacture. The recent activities of the Democratic League and its numerous nonparty sympathizers have done much to consolidate and articulate the opposition reform movement among the small gentry and gradually to spread it among the more enlightened and the most consciously anti-Kuomintang-inclined in the middle and upper gentry of various provinces.

In Manchuria, where old semiautonomous, anti-Kuomintang tendencies and a good deal of wartime collaboration with the Japanese gave the gentry a somewhat different political complexion, the national government can rely even less on the gentry than elsewhere. The Communists, on the other hand, would seem to have a fair chance of drawing part of the Manchurian gentry into the popular-front movement they are now promoting in those provinces.

The millions of soldiers that are still swarming all over China have also become a greater factor on China's political scene than they have ever been; this time not mainly as fighting forces but as citizens who have had an unusual measure of political education and of experience during the war.

The Communist-led troops and the majority of officers up to major are peasants who volunteered in the regular armies in the process of helping them liberate their villages from the Japanese. They are deeply indoctrinated with the reform ideas of the new democracy, have taken an active part in putting them into effect, and regard themselves as the pioneers of a new China in which the cooperative rather than an orthodox Communist system seems to them both possible and desirable.

It was evidently that missionary zeal of the Communist-controlled rank and file (praised by some United States Army officers during their wartime observation work behind the Japanese lines) which promoted their unusual military efficiency during recent battles and skirmishes with Kuomintang soldiers.

The Nationalist troops, however, seem, according to information I gathered, to be in a constant conflict between the obedience to their officers in which they have been trained and a marked aversion to fighting for a cause that means little if anything to most of them. They, too, are peasants, but they got into the army by way of a system of conscription so cruel, corrupt, and wasteful of human lives that Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell, Chiang Kai-shek's Allied chief of staff, insisted for years on a drastic change. They are almost exclusively the sons of the poorest peasant families, while the sons of the gentry, of Government officials, and the well-to-do and influential in general, remained virtually exempt from conscription.

From the time when the fresh recruits were marched to distant training camps, losing a large percentage of their comrades from starvation and disease at the roadside, to the time when they languished for months or years in maladministered camps near the front lines, or when they were thrown into battle unprepared, undernourished, and uncared for, the Kuomintang rank and file watched the cynical attitudes toward their fate on the part of superiors, who sold part of the soldiers' meager rations in the black markets, and often traded openly with the enemy—facts mentioned by Chiang Kai-shek in several speeches. They criticized bitterly among themselves the Government which failed to tax the well-to-do and to confiscate vast hoardings of food and cloth and medicines that might have provided them with their most elementary needs. The peasants they spoke to around their garrisons, on their marches, and along the front lines told the same stories of one-sided taxation of the helpless poor and of the helplessness and corruption of a fumbling administration.

It was on account of all this that the propaganda of the Communists against civil war and for nation-wide social reform fell on fertile soil wherever Nationalist soldiers, before and after the defeat of Japan, met Communist-led units in combat. Many of them went over, following the poignant slogan, "Chinese must not fight Chinese." Those among the younger officers who, after bitter experiences, were in sympathy with their troops or who found it impossible to resist their demands, often led them in surrender. There was even a case, a few months ago, admitted by Chungking, in which two entire armies in North China, led by some of Chiang Kai-shek's best and most trusted generals who favored a popular front for national unity and democratic progress, joined the Communists in full force, reformed their troops along the "neo-democratic" line of their former adversaries, and became active on the Communist side in spreading its propaganda among Nationalist units against the prolongation of civil strife.

The morale of Chiang Kai-shek's armies, which always suffered from lack of effective political education, has thus been deteriorating further since the defeat of Japan. According to information I have received from returning observers, there have been recent instances in Manchuria and elsewhere in which even crack Nationalist units, American-trained and American-equipped and especially well fed, could not be used against the Communists because large parts of the rank and file and some of the younger officers were unwilling to fight their compatriots whose reformist efforts for the peasantry they have come to envy.

This factor, even more than the growing civilian opposition to the right-wing regime of the Kuomintang, contributed largely to the promises Chiang Kai-shek has recently made for freedom of speech, democratic reform and cooperation with the Communist Party, the Democratic League and the nonparty opposition in the interparty negotiations in which General Marshall acted as mediator.

Considerable changes of political attitude have also taken place in the upper strata of Chinese society. Here, too, experiences during and after the war have caused a gradual shrinkage of that drifting, indifferent majority which had long been as characteristic of them as it used to be of the lower strata. But the activation of political attitudes on the upper levels of the social scale seems to be to a smaller extent in the direction of liberalism and reform. In the main, it takes the contrary course of preparing for a desperate defense of threatened vested interests against the rising tide of radical reform demands and of sabotaging the halfway concessions Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek has been forced to make to the opposition.

It is a heterogeneous camp which the right-wing elements of Chiang Kai-shek's party, government, and army are trying to bring together in a supreme effort at staving off the imminent changes in China's social and political structure and to promote the armed fight against the Communists, without whose armed forces and territorial holdings the vast opposition camp all over the country would lose much of its aggressive power.

The nation-wide organizations that are trying to mobilize and consolidate the various groups of resistance against reform and interparty cooperation are in themselves a strange alliance. One of these groups is the trinity of separate but recently more closely cooperating secret police organizations of the Kuomintang government, army, and party headquarters reinforced by the Fascist Blue Shirts and The Three People's Principles Youth Corps. They are more or less built up along the lines of twentieth-century totalitarianism, having had the benefit of German advisers, and are omnipresent in towns and cities, in the armies and administrations, in the schools and universities, in newspaper and other larger business enterprises. The other group consists of the loosely connected secret societies, atavistic survivals of ancient China, which have their well-disguised, powerful members among the traditional merchants' guilds and gentry associations in small towns and villages, among the bandits along the highways, the pirates along the coast, the big-time gangsters of the large cities, the officials of local and provincial administrations—and even among the surviving groups of former "puppet" collaborationists which are part of the large and dangerous Japanese underground in China.

Both groups embrace sincere yet backward-looking idealists who are, like their predecessors in earlier periods of Chinese history, animated by a deep hatred of change, of everything that is directed against feudal Chinese traditions, and of any kind of foreign influence; frightened officeholders whom nation-wide reforms might sweep away, together with the totalitarian and feudal institutions to which they owe their positions; political opportunists, mercenaries and outright criminal elements, like the flourishing gangsters of Shanghai whose mighty underworld organizations, before the war, enabled their notorious leaders to amass wealth, wield great political influence and even acquire the prestige of high positions in society.

The political forces which those secret organizations are now trying to weld together, with some apparent success, are the most conservative and least enlightened elements of all strata above the peasantry. Among them are the village and small-town gentry and the comparatively few large landowners with their powerful connections in the party, army, and government organizations of the Kuomintang; and those of the surviving war-lord cliques with their semiautonomous provincial armies, who may now be less afraid of the National Government—their rival of the last two decades—than they are of the popular opposition that has grown up both against the war lords and the government.

The struggle for allies seems to be furthest from a decision in the thin stratum of "big business" where the modern bankers, industrialists, and traders of the large cities—men who are by no means devoid of social consciousness or of the realization that China must be lifted out of her age-old rut—are once more faced with a difficult choice, as they were during the days when the national revolution was at its height in 1927. In that fateful year, which marked the beginning of the civil war, the armed forces of a new China, standing at the gates of Shanghai, were about to split into two camps; the reform elements under Communist guidance, much too radical for the large business interests to befriend, and the conservative elements under the leadership of Chiang Kai-shek, too feudal in their thinking and too authoritarian in their approach to the problem of rejuvenating China to be the ideal collaborators of modern business.

In 1927 the business interests chose Chiang Kai-shek and thus made him the ruler of a large part of China. Today many of them still seem undecided where to throw their support in case the compromise solution they favor cannot be brought about. Circumstances have changed. The left wing is much less radical than it was in 1927, and its popular front policies have had surprising success in fostering basic agricultural and handicraft production; a factor which would seem to promise well for the development of modern industry and trade after their sufferings in the past from the hopeless stagnation at the grassroots of Chinese economy. The performance of the right-wing Kuomintang government, on the other hand, has been almost as disappointing to big business as it was to the people; and Chiang Kai-shek's tendency towards state control of key industries, transportation, and shipping is now even more pronounced than it was before the war, if one may judge from his book, China's Destiny.

But modern big business, today, is in a weaker position than it ever was in its short history, on account of Japanese depredations in the big cities. It is in need of large loans and much government help. The present regime of Chiang Kai-shek would be willing to help without demanding that the notoriously low level of prewar industrial wages be raised and manifold measures of social security be introduced, if necessary at the expense of profits, while a popular front government such as the Communist Party, the Democratic League, and the reformist nonparty elements propose to set up together with Kuomintang liberals, would no doubt make any assistance to big business conditional on the fulfilment of such demands.

In intellectual circles, the rising popular opposition to the right-wing Kuomintang regime and the increasing defensive activities of the vested interests are acting like magnets on all these who had not previously taken a firm stand in one camp or another. But, like the men of big business, many intellectuals find the choice difficult. On the one side, they would have to put up with the rigidly traditional stand of the Right which clings to retrogressive Confucianism, has made Chiang Kai-shek's ultra-conservative and antiwestern China's Destiny its bible, and remains inclined to a regimentation of thought toward which even traditional Chinese scholars have long felt strong aversion. On the other side, they see the predominantly antifeudal orientation of the Communist and democratic left express itself in a growing antagonism toward everything that Confucianist and Chiang Kai-shek's neo-Confucianist precepts stand for in the life of the state and the family, in education, literature, and art. That is, they fear reforms so thorough and so identified in their minds with "western" thought that many superficially modern Chinese intellectuals hesitate to give them support.

It is, indeed, difficult for most Chinese, as it is for outsiders who are aware of the massive forces at work in China today, to believe in the easy way out of a compromise solution to the elementary issues that are at stake. The two sides in the present conflict, which far transcends the comparatively narrow confines of the Kuomintang and Communist camps and the pronouncements on policy of their respective leaders, cannot possibly be expected to live and work peacefully side by side in such a way as do the Democrats and Republicans in the United States. Their ideas are mutually exclusive, and neither can be adapted to the other by quick compromise, although both may further modify themselves in some degree, as they have been modifying themselves continuously since they began to oppose one another under different labels almost a hundred years ago. The fight will go on until one side has won, and there is no doubt that the forces of the distant past will eventually suffer defeat, as they have done in every country of the west.

This does not mean that open civil war is inevitable, that Chinese and American efforts at perpetuating the armistice General Marshall achieved early this year are useless, or that the opposition's belief in the possibility of creating a coalition government from the various party and nonparty groups needs no American help because it is utopian. On the contrary, China as a nation and the world as a whole have every reason to try to prevent prolonged civil war with its possible international complications, to try to halt renewed fighting whenever and wherever it occurs, and to try to remove the ground on which the conflict must eventually be fought out to its final decision as far as possible from the battlefield.

Foreign intervention, however, on one side or the other, instead of bringing about a quicker and less plainful solution, would only complicate the conflict, drag it out, distort the issues, and make the final decision different from what the people of China want it to be—a Chinese decision. But we must not forget when we look at China and try to determine our own decisions on policy toward China, which must affect the course of the conflict in one way or another, that it was victory in their own struggles with a feudal past which enabled first England and France and then the United States to create the hope of a democratic world.

Low Compensation of American Dairy Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 20 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, this morning's issue of the Washington Post carries a very illuminating and thought-provoking advertisement, jointly sponsored by the Land O' Lakes Creameries, Inc., the Twin City Milk Producers Association, and the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation.

This advertisement shows that the American dairy farmer, for all his skill, for all his back-breaking work 7 days a week, for all his difficulties in securing labor and machinery, gets on the average the low compensation of less than 53 cents an hour.

This confirms the point which I have repeatedly made—most recently in a Senate address on July 18—namely, that the prices which the American people are paying now for dairy products represent a minimum fair return to the dairy farmer. These dairy prices have risen only by amounts about equal to the Government dairy subsidies, which cost the taxpayer $500,000,000 a year, and which ended with the expiration of OPA on June 30 last.

For anyone to talk looselely of the American dairy farmer as if the farmer were a gouger or chiseler simply because he is getting 6 or 7 cents for a quart of milk, for example, is outrageous and absurd. It is equally unjustified to promote a buyer's strike against the natural products of a farmer who is receiving a mere 53 cents an hour, and asking only for his cost of production plus a reasonable profit. If the farmers of America ever catch the strike fever, the collectivists who have been smearing and hurting agriculture will not know what hit them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the advertisement to which I have referred be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the advertisement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AT TODAY'S PRICES THE DAIRY FARMER MAKES LESS THAN 53 CENTS AN HOUR

How much do you make? You make double and triple this amount, if you are a skilled laborer.

Even if you are an unskilled laborer, you make more than a skilled dairy farmer.

The dairy farmer is a highly skilled worker.

He owns his own tools and equipment. He has invested in cattle, in fields, in barns, in high-priced feeds. This investment is one continual risk.

Still an efficient Minnesota dairy farmer makes less than 53 cents an hour. This figure is not guesswork.

Fifty-three cents an hour includes the full value of his milk, whether it is sold as whole milk, made into ice cream and cheese, or separated and sold as butterfat and skim milk.

Do you know today's price on dairy products in legitimate sales—not in the black market—is higher chiefly because the Government formerly paid part of your bill in subsidies, and you paid the subsidy in taxes to make up the farmer's cost of production? This subsidy cost you in taxes more than $1,500,000,000 in 1 year.

Do you know it cost the taxpayers another $150,000,000 to administer the OPA, which maintained these artifical ceiling prices on dairy foods?

Do you know the cost of producing milk is higher just like everything else today? Feed, the important raw product, has skyrocketed?

Do you know the dairy farmer must work 7 days a week? He does not get time and a half for dawn-to-dusk labor. He does not get double time for Sundays and holidays, or vacation with pay. And he is not restricted on his output per hour.

Yet he must be well above the State average to net himself 52½ cents an hour!

The dairy farmer need not apologize for prices on the food he produces.

His investment, risk, and toil deserve a return that is fair. At today's prices, he is making less than 53 cents an hour. How much do you make?

WOULD YOU SWAP JOBS WITH HIM?

Who says 53 cents? Read this and know the facts:

Fifty-three cents an hour is not based on the experience of one isolated farmer.

It is based on two official reports of the University of Minnesota division of agricultural economics and the United States Department of Agriculture's Bureau of Agricultural Economics. These are known as mimeographed report No. 158, just published, and mimeographed report No. 150.

These reports are not guesswork. They cover 201 dairy farms in 14 counties of southeastern Minnesota—an intensive dairy section where efficiency is far above that of Minnesota's average. Dairy cows on these farms each produce 257 more pounds of milk and 9 pounds more butterfat yearly than the State average. And Minnesota's average production is above the national average. Even at that, each cow produces only fifty-five one-hundredths pound of butterfat in 1 day—much less than 1 pound of butter for two milkings.

Written records were kept every day on these farms, under close supervision of field workers. They show every hour of work spent on dairying, they show costs of feed, and they show the entire income from milk. This included all values of the whole milk, not the butterfat alone.

Every factor was figured so closely that each cow's income was credited with an extra $10 because of its manure.

Yet, figuring all costs—including those of feed at prices quoted on July 17 in the farm areas, and allowing a return of 80 cents per pound for butterfat plus 90 cents a hundredweight for skim milk, the yearly net income per cow was $76.14.

Official State figures show the average man-hours of labor spent on each cow is 145 hours per year. Divide 145 into $76.14, and you will get the same answer as statisticians for the division of agricultural economics. The skilled dairy farmer, at today's prices, gets only 52½ cents an hour for his labor.

If the farmer got $1 an hour, your butter would cost more than $1.10 a pound at the creamery. Add time and a half for overtime, and the figure would top $1.35. Your own imagination can tell you what double time for Sundays and holidays would do.

Can anyone justify a buyers' strike against 53 cents an hour?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 20 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "A Bill More Important to You Even Than OPA," published in the Seattle Star of July 13, 1946. The editorial deals with the National Science Foundation bill recently passed by the Senate.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A BILL MORE IMPORTANT TO YOU EVEN THAN OPA

People of this State have a certain narrow interest in a bill passed by the Senate the other day, to establish a National Science Foundation, because Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON is one of the authors of the measure.

But that is a small matter compared with the interest that the peoples of the world should feel in this legislation.

Everyone knows about some of the developments growing out of the war—the atomic bomb, radar, the proximity fuse, and so on.

The atomic bomb might determine the result in another war very quickly, and at a terrible cost to the country on the receiving end. And the United States, with its high concentration of industry and urban population, would be particularly vulnerable.

That is why Americans generally feel that this country must keep its atomic bomb secrets—though scientists are agreed that there are few secrets about atomic energy, that our development of the bomb was principally a matter of being the first to master certain technical problems.

There is no certainty that the atomic bomb would be the determining factor in another war or the most terrific method of destruction.

World War II was kept mercifully free from chemical warfare. But military scientists in this field have gone far beyond the poison gases of World War I.

Bacteriological warfare at present is only a term that creeps into an occasional technical discussion. But death through the purposeful spread of malignant disease would be worse than the death that comes in an instant through the explosion of atomic energy. The fact that disease might not be confined to enemy ranks probably explains why bacteriological warfare was not employed by the Germans and Japanese in World War II.

A desperate, defeated Hitler, in some future war, might well try to drag the world down with him, instead of dying alone.

All these methods of destruction cover matters which science already knows about. The probabilities are that within the next few years some scientists—perhaps our own, perhaps those of other nations—may be responsible for developments going far beyond the atomic bomb in importance.

In our southwestern desert some military scientists are now shooting rockets into the air to heights of 85 miles and more. Their object is not like that of Hitler's, to develop missiles that could be shot across the Atlantic or the Pacific. Their main purpose is to learn more about the upper atmosphere.

Science already has some knowledge about these layers of thin upper air known as the ionosphere. Long-distance radio transmission operates by bounding radio waves against some of the layers. While at a height of a few miles, where airplanes fly, frigid temperatures prevail, even in summer time, the contrary is true in the ionosphere, where the rockets are beginning to penetrate. Temperatures at 100 miles or so may approach the boiling point of water, the scientists say, and at greater altitudes are immeasurably higher.

One of the most striking facts about this upper atmosphere, explaining in part the temperature factor, is that it consists of thinly spaced atoms and particles of atoms, highly charged with electricity. On this account it operates as a curtain or screen to filter the mysterious cosmic and other rays from the sun.

If even a small segment of this protective blanket were to be torn away so that the full force of all the sun's rays could fall upon a portion of the earth, that portion of earth would be so thoroughly cooked within a few seconds that no human or other life could exist. So the scientists say.

That fact should accent the importance of the rocket experiments. But rocket experiments represent only one small sector of the scientific research front.

Nor does scientific research seek primarily for means of killing people more efficiently. As a matter of prudence, in a world not yet organized for permanent peace, science concerns itself with military problems. But the main aim of science is to help people to live, not to die. And in a better organized world that would be science's sole aim.

The advancement of science is sought in the science foundation bill. One purpose is to coordinate the research work of government and of private industry. Promising students would be provided with scholarships and fellowships.

Most of this country's best known scientists have been deeply interested, for more than a year, in rival bills originally prepared by Senator MAGNUSON, of this State, and Senator HARLEY KILGORE, of West Virginia. After several months of hearings a subcommittee eventually prepared the compromise measure adopted the other day by the Senate.

The subject is so abstruse and the issues so involved that the adoption of the bill attracted scant general attention. But, if the House follows the Senate in its action, the resultant National Science Foundation may mark a milestone in national and world history.

Youngsters in some future school generation may memorize 1946—not as the year of the OPA debate and the Louis-Conn fight—but as the year which saw the National Science Foundation authorized.

Cost of Living

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times:

COST OF LIVING

The first few days with OPA have witnessed some sporadic increases in rents and retail prices. On the whole, however, it is clear that the vast majority of producers and distributors are making every effort to keep prices within bounds. Many large distributors and producers have pledged themselves to this end.

Mr. Bowles has stated that Monday's "increases turned out to be worse than I had feared." However, he went on to point out that responsible merchants and businessmen had demonstrated their determination to hold the present price levels as long as possible. Mr. Bowles recognizes that most of the price and rent increases "occurred because a few producers, a few storekeepers, a few landlords, and a good many speculators saw fit to take advantage of the situation." It is surprising, therefore, to have him point out that the 1-day rise of 3.7 percent in the prices for basic commodities could at that rate "more than double" the cost of living in 20 days. Not only is that bad arithmetic, but he made the mistake of assuming that a rise in basic commodities is identical with an increase in living costs.

In considering the increases in prices which have taken place, it is important to distinguish between speculative advances to take advantage of the new situation and those increases which inevitably would follow the dropping of subsidies and the readjustment of prices of products which were available mainly in the black market. Thus the elimination of subsidies has made inevitable a rise in the prices of butter, milk, cheese, coffee, bread, flour, meats, and similar products, if producers are to continue to receive the prices paid previously. It has been estimated that the rises in the prices of these foods would add about 10 percent to the cost of food when subsidies were eliminated. Certainly such increases cannot be attributed to the "greed" of businessmen.

Similarly, in a number of instances, for example, meat, black-market prices were tremendously in excess of the so-called legal prices, and hence the fact that such prices are now quoted openly does not mean that all consumers are being forced to pay more. On the contrary, at the new market price it is probable that some consumers are paying less while others, who were formerly paying the legal price, when they could get the goods, are paying more. Thus to the extent that this factor contributes to a rise in the official index it will be bringing that index closer to reality rather than reflecting an actual rise in living costs.

Misleading Food Price Figures

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN PHILLIPS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix and to insert material on the subject of food prices and the false statements which have appeared recently on that subject, I now reprint a letter from Congressman HARRIS ELLSWORTH, of Oregon, which was printed in the Washington Post of July 19, 1946.

Congressman ELLSWORTH needs no commendation from me, to support his letter to the Post. He is recognized in this House as an authority on the subject, and is the secretary of the Republican Congressional Food Study Committee. He has been making a study of food prices and comparisons, and the letter gives some of his findings. Your particular attention is invited, Mr. Speaker, to the analysis of the four factors which make up the costs of food and other items, and which reveal the differences between the actual costs the buyers were paying before the end of OPA and the fictitious prices which the propaganda of that agency said the buyers were paying. The letter follows:

MISLEADING FOOD-PRICE FIGURES

Tuesday the Post invited me to comment in general on some of the misleading price surveys which have had wide publicity in the past 2 weeks.

Wednesday there appeared on page 1 of the Post a price chart on which I would like to comment specifically and which I believe deserves a complete explanation to your readers.

Charts and studies such as this are the most misleading and confusing of all, since they are based—as you correctly state—"on Bureau of Labor Statistics daily indices of 28 basic commodities."

This official source gives such surveys a ring of authenticity which leads most people to accept them without question, even though the figures themselves may not bear out at all the conclusions that are drawn from them. Your chart is an excellent case in point.

"This chart," the Post says, "indicates the rise in the cost of living from June 21 until yesterday (July 16)."

That, I respectfully submit, is an erroneous and misleading conclusion. The chart shows no such thing, and the figures on which it is based were not intended for that purpose.

The BLS commodity index is intended to show the variation in prices of 28 basic commodities—and even for that purpose it is almost worthless in this period of transition from a controlled to a free economy.

The reason why the index itself has little or no value at the moment is this: The prices on which it is based since July 1 are the actual prices at which these specific commodities have ben sold. In contrast, the prices on which it is based during OPA control are fictitious ceiling prices which in many instances do not reflect with any measure of accuracy the real price of the commodities.

There are four important factors that are not reflected in the published prices used by the BLS and other agencies in compiling their commodity indexes during the period of OPA control. These are:

1. Black-market prices (which were so general in many commodities that they were the prevailing prices);
2. Subsidies (which were paid by the Federal Government for the specific purpose of holding down published prices);
3. Quality deterioration (getting grade C meat instead of grade AA, when you pay for AA);
4. Alternative buying (having to buy a $4.45 shirt because the $2.50 shirts you usually buy have disappeared from the market).

Obviously all these things added tremendously to the real cost of commodities under OPA, but they are ignored completely by BLS in its commodity index.

Recognizing this deficiency in commodity indexes, the New York Journal of Commerce recently recalculated its own index to take into account two of these factors—black markets and subsidies. When it did so it found that the food index stood at 243.2 on June 28, instead of at 171.1 as shown in its official index—and that by July 13, with the index representing actual selling prices, it had dropped 19 points, to 214.

Comparing the actual prices of today with the fictitious official price level under OPA is like comparing apples to pears. It may be an interesting pastime, but it proves absolutely nothing.

During this period, when the Nation is in the throes of transition from a controlled economy to a free economy, it seems to me that there is an extra responsibility on newspapers and other sources of public information to be extremely careful in drawing conclusions which may be misleading.

I know the Post would not intentionally publish any misleading information, and I believe that if you discuss the BLS commodity index thoroughly with authorities in that agency you will agree with me that a chart such as the one you used Wednesday should not be used without careful explanation of exactly what it does and does not show.

Member of Congress from Oregon.

What's Wrong With Housing—Army and Navy Nails?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THAD F. WASIELEWSKI
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. WASIELEWSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of July 18, 1946:

WHAT'S WRONG WITH HOUSING—ARMY AND NAVY NAILS?

More than 10 months ago the war ended with Japan's surrender. From that moment on it was known that the Army and Navy would not need some of the tremendous supplies of materials they had. Within a few weeks of VJ-day, it became increasingly apparent that we were to have a housing shortage of unprecedented proportions.

It required nothing more than common sense to dictate release of as much Army and Navy building material as possible. No profound economic studies were necessary. The country was experiencing an acute shortage of some materials and had been all through the war. It was obvious that these shortages would be increasingly acute, as more and more houses were needed for returning GI's.

One of the most plaguing shortages for builders all over the country was nails—common nails, without which you can't build a house. In recent weeks, the shortage has been so bad that some local builders have literally sent their trucks out in the State, trying to pick up a few kegs of nails. Some builders have employed carpenters, at the present pretty stiff hourly rate, to straighten nails.

Meanwhile, the Army and Navy have been holding thousands of kegs of nails with no use for them whatsoever. Now, more than 10 months after VJ-day, they are getting ready to release 12,000,000 pounds of nails, enough for 30,000 houses. The Nation is promised that they will be available in the next 30 days.

What the country should ask caustically is why they weren't released many months ago and more important how many other vital building materials are piled up in Army and Navy storehouses or dumps?

Why can't we get these materials to use in the present shortage?

Voting Records of Senators

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, July 20 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Voting Records," published in the Washington Post of July 12, 1946, endorsing the resolution which I recently introduced, Senate Resolution 295, providing for the publication of the voting records of Senators.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VOTING RECORDS

We are in hearty accord with the resolution introduced by Senator GLEN H. TAYLOR requiring that the voting records of Senators be tabulated and published. Mr. TAYLOR proposes that the Secretary of the Senate compile all roll-call votes within 3 weeks after the close of the present session, with a brief description of the item voted on, and that enough copies be printed to make them available for sale at cost throughout the balance of 1946. The resolution also calls for the votes of each Member to be gathered in one place so that his entire voting record may be easily appraised.

This is a procedure which ought to be extended to the House as well as the Senate and which ought to be established as a permanent policy. There can be no logical opposition, for the widest possible publicity given to how elected representatives vote on various issues is a matter of fundamental honesty in a democracy. Too often now the digging out of such records requires the work of research agencies, and the information is not readily obtainable by the average citizen. Politicians thus have some reason to hope that the electorate will have forgotten their votes by the time elections roll around. This, of course, is a situation inimical to the interests of representative government.

Pearl Harbor Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the report of the Pearl Harbor Investigating Committee will be filed today. Because of the fact that many newspapers have heretofore carried stories to the effect that I had unqualifiedly agreed to the report of the committee, it seems entirely proper that this statement should be made.

I participated in the drafting of the committee report and argued for days in an effort to have incorporated into the full committee report views which I held as to the responsibilities and interpretations which I placed upon the admitted facts. As a result of long and continuous argument, the committee report does reflect some of the efforts made in this direction. When the report was finally concluded and adopted by the majority of the committee I found myself unable to agree with many of the conclusions and innuendoes contained therein.

Accordingly, I prepared a statement expressing my views, and that statement is published as part of the report, beginning on page 266-A. These views express my opinion upon the evidence as to the responsibilities to be assessed for the Pearl Harbor disaster. In order that the Members of Congress and the public who may not have an opportunity to read the report may have a better picture of the situation, I am incorporating as part of my remarks the complete text of my findings as a member of this committee:

ADDITIONAL VIEWS OF MR. KEEFE

INTRODUCTION

The committee report is divided into five parts. Part I deals with the diplomatic background of the Pearl Harbor attack. Part II describes the actual attack and its aftermath. Part III discusses responsibilities in Hawaii. Part IV discusses responsibilities in Washington, and part V includes certain recommendations of the committee. Scattered throughout the entire five sections of the committee report are conclusions with respect to individuals in charge of carrying out our diplomatic, military, and naval obligations prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor. I find myself in agreement with most of these conclusions and recommendations. The voluminous facts contained in the committee report have been accurately assembled from the enormous record compiled by the committee. Any criticism which I may have toward the marshaling of facts in the committee report is directed to the manner in which such facts have been used to sustain the various arguments and conclusions indulged in in the committee report.

It correctly states that both Washington and Hawaii were surprised at the attack upon Pearl Harbor. It is apparently agreed that both Washington and Hawaii expected the initial attack to come in the Asiatic area. What was done in Washington as well as what was done in Hawaii was admittedly done in the light of the universal military belief that Hawaii was not in danger from an initial attack by Japan. If this belief was unjustified, as I believe it was, then the mistake lies on the Washington doorstep just as much as it does upon that of Hawaii. Throughout the long and arduous sessions of the committee in the preparation of the committee report, I continuously insisted that whatever "yardstick" was agreed upon as a basis for determining responsibilities in Hawaii should be applied to the high command at Washington. This indicates in a general way my fundamental objection to the committee report. I feel that facts have been martialed, perhaps unintentionally, with the idea of conferring blame upon Hawaii and minimizing the blame that should properly be assessed at Washington.

A careful reading of the committee report would indicate that the analysis of orders and dispatches is so made as to permit criticism of our commands in Hawaii while at the same time proposing a construction which would minimize the possibility of criticism of those in charge at Washington.

I think it is true that none of the military chiefs at Washington or Hawaii thought the attack would come at Pearl Harbor. I conclude that they all thought it would come first in the Far East. Obviously this was a fatal mistake, and I agree that the mistake was without proper justification and that neither Hawaii nor Washington should be excused from criticism for having made it. I think that the facts in this record clearly demonstrate that Hawaii was always the No. 1 point of danger and that both Washington and Hawaii should have known it at all times and acted accordingly. Consequently I agree that the high command in Hawaii was subject to criticism for concluding that Hawaii was not in danger However, I must insist that the same criticism with the same force and scope should apply to the high command in Washington. It is in this respect that I think the tenor of the committee report may be subject to some criticism.

I fully agree with the doctrine relating to the placing of responsibility on military officers in the field and their resulting duty under such responsibilities. I agree that they must properly sustain this burden in line with the high and peculiar abilities which originally gave them their assignments.

In the execution of their vitally important duties, however, the officers at the front in the field are fairly entitled to all aids and help and all information which can reasonably be sent to them from the all-powerful high staff command in Washington. If both commands are in error, both should be blamed for what each should have done and what each failed to do respectively. The committee report, I feel, does not with exactitude apply the same yardstick in measuring responsibilities at Washington as has been applied to the Hawaiian commanders. I cannot suppress the feeling that the committee report endeavors to throw as soft a light as possible on the Washington scene.

In order to clearly appraise the contentions herein expressed, I feel compelled to restate some of the basic military aspects of the Pearl Harbor disaster as shown by the evidence.

MILITARY ASPECTS OF THE PEARL HARBOR DISASTER

During the year 1941 the United States Pacific Fleet was based in Pearl Harbor in the Hawaiian island of Oahu. It had proceeded to the Hawaiian area for fleet exercises in the spring of 1940. Its scheduled return to its regular bases on the west coast was delayed from time to time. From these delays there gradually emerged evidence of the President's decision to retain the fleet in the Hawaiian area, to deter Japan from aggression in the Far East. The Commander in Chief of the Fleet, Admiral J. O. Richardson, protested this decision with a vigor which caused him to be relieved of command. He believed that the readiness of men and ships of the fleet for war operations would impress Japan rather than its presence in Hawaii, where facilities to render it ready for war were greatly inferior to those available on the west coast. Richardson was succeeded in command by Admiral H. E. Kimmel in February 1941. The appointment of Kimmel was made on his record as a capable officer. There was no political or other favoritism involved. At this time the decision to base the fleet in Hawaii was an established fact. Pearl Harbor was the only anchorage in the Hawaiian area offering any security. It was then, however, an extremely deficient fleet base. Its exposed position rendered concealment of fleet movements practically impossible in an area filled with Japanese agents. The Army's equipment for antiaircraft defense was meager. The local Army-Navy defense forces did not have sufficient long-range patrol planes to perform effective distant reconnaissance, even if the patrol planes of the fleet were made available to augment the handful of Army reconnaissance planes.

Under these circumstances, the position of the Fleet in the Hawaiian area was inherently untenable and dangerous. The Fleet would sacrifice its preparations for war, and its potential mobility in war, if it concentrated its resources on the defense of its base. Moreover, with only four tankers suitable for fueling ships at sea, ships of the Fleet had to come into Pearl Harbor for refueling, to say nothing of maintenance and repair, and the necessary rest and relaxation of crews. Once the ships were in Pearl Harbor, with its single channel, they were a target for any successfully launched air attack from carrier-borne planes. The severity of the attack might be mitigated, but damage to the ships found in port was inevitable. To prevent a hostile carrier from successfully launching planes required that it be first discovered and attacked. Discovery, other than by lucky accident, required air reconnaissance of the perimeter of a circle of 800-mile radius from Oahu. The Fleet did not at any time have patrol planes sufficient in number to carry out such reconnaissance. The Japanese task force which raided Oahu on December 7, 1941, was composed of 6 carriers. The Pacific Fleet had on that date 3 carriers, one of which was on the Pacific coast for repair, leaving only two immediately available in the area of a prospective sea engagement. An engagement at sea would have found the preponderant strength with Japan.

Although the Fleet was placed by the President in the Hawaiian area in 1940 as an implement of diplomacy and as a deterrent to Japan, its strength was appreciably reduced in April and May of 1941. At that time, 1 aircraft carrier, 3 battleships, 4 cruisers and 18 destroyers were detached from the Pacific Fleet and transferred to the Atlantic. The President directed the Chief of Naval Operations to consult the British Chiefs of Staff on the proposal to effect this transfer. They gave their opinion "that the consequential reduction in the strength of the United States Pacific Fleet would not unduly encourage Japan" (exhibit 158, letter from Admiral Danckwerts to Admiral Turner, April 28, 1941). The transfer to the Atlantic was then carried out. The Commander in Chief of the United States Pacific Fleet was not asked for his opinion. The Chief of Naval Operations wrote him about the proposed transfer stating "I am telling you, not arguing with you" (exhibit 106, letter from Admiral Stark to Admiral Kimmel, dated April 19, 1941).

The primary mission assigned the Pacific Fleet under existing Navy war plans was the making of raids on the Marshalls. These were to divert Japanese strength from the so-called Malay barrier. No existing war plan of the United States in 1941 contemplated that the Pacific Fleet would go to the rescue of the Philippines or resist Japanese naval forces attacking the Philippines. The Pacific Fleet was so inferior to the Japanese navy in every category of fighting ship that such a mission was considered too suicidal to attempt. The American public in 1941 was deluded about the fighting strength of our Fleet in the Pacific, by irresponsible utterances from men in authority. Japan was under no such misconception. Her consular agents in the Hawaiian Islands needed only their eyesight, and possibly binoculars, to appraise correctly the strength of the fleet.

An inferior fleet, under enemy surveillance in an exposed naval base without resources to protect it could only avert disaster by receiving the best possible evidence of the intentions of its potential enemy. The commander in chief of the fleet in 1941 recognized that information was essential to his making appropriate disposition to meet any crisis. He formally requested the chief of naval operations that he "be immediately informed of all important developments as they occur and by the quickest secure means available" (exhibit 106, official letter CINCPAC to CNO, dated May 26, 1941).

The best evidence of Japanese intentions in the year 1941, available to the United States Government, were messages exchanged between the government of Japan and her diplomatic consular agents abroad. These were intercepted by the Army and Navy. They were decoded and translated in Washington. The President, the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy, the Chief of Staff, and Chief of Naval Operations regularly received these intercepted messages.

The President and the other officials receiving the intercepted messages in Washington prior to December 7, 1941, considered it likely that Japan would attack the United States. At a meeting of the President and his so-called War Council on November 25, 1941, according to Mr. Stimson's notes the President stated: "That we were likely to be attacked perhaps (as soon as) next Monday" (Stimson Statement, p. 47). There was abundant evidence in the intercepted messages that Japan intended to attack the United States. Japan had fixed a deadline date of November 25, extended to November 29, for reaching a diplomatic agreement with the United States. There were at least six Japanese messages emphasizing this deadline. If the deadline date passed without agreement, the Japanese government advised her Ambassadors in Washington: "Things are automatically going to happen." The necessity for agreement by the deadline date was stressed by Japan in these terms: "The fate of our empire hangs by the slender thread of a few days"; "We gambled the fate of our land on the throw of this die" (exhibit 1, pp. 137, 93). On November 26, 1941, prior to the advanced "deadline" date, the United States Government delivered to Japan a diplomatic note, which the intercepted messages revealed Japan considered to be a "humiliating proposal," impossible of acceptance (exhibit 1, p. 195). The intercepted diplomatic messages further revealed that Japan expected to "rupture" negotiations with the United States when she replied to the American note of November 26 (Exhibit No. 1, p. 195). To prevent the United States from becoming unduly suspicious Japan instructed her envoys in Washington to keep up a pretext of continuing negotiations until this Japanese reply was ready for delivery (exhibit 1, p. 208). A message from the Japanese Government to its Ambassador in Berlin, sent on November 30, was intercepted and translated by the Navy in Washington on December 1 (exhibit 1, p. 204). In this message the Japanese Ambassador was instructed to "immediately interview Chancellor Hitler and Foreign Minister Ribbentrop and confidentially communicate to them a summary of developments. * * * Say very secretly to them that there is extreme danger that war may suddenly break out between the Anglo-Saxon nations and Japan through some clash of arms and add the time of the breaking out of this war may come quicker than anyone dreams."

The President regarded this message as of such interest that he retained a copy of it, contrary to the usual practice in handling the intercepted messages (R. 10887). On December 2, 1941, elaborate instructions from Japan were intercepted dealing in precise detail with the method of internment of American and British nationals in Asia "on the outbreak of war with England and United States" (exhibit 1, p. 198).

In the "bomb plot" or "ships in harbor" message of September 24 the Japanese Government gave detailed instructions to its consul general in Hawaii as to the character of report it required concerning vessels in Pearl Harbor. Pearl Harbor was to be divided into five sub areas. An alphabetical symbol was given each area. The Japanese Government instructed the consul:

"With regard to warships and aircraft carriers, we would like to have you report on those at anchor (these are not so important) tied up at wharves, buoys, and in docks. (Designate types and classes briefly.) If possible, we would like to have you make mention of the fact when there are two or more vessels alongside the same wharf."

This despatch was decoded and translated in Washington on October 9, 1941 (exhibit 2, p. 12).

On September 29, 1941, the Japanese Consul in Hawaii replied to his government. He established a system of symbols to be used in designating the location of vessels at key points in Pearl Harbor. This despatch was decoded and translated in Washington on October 10, 1941.

On November 15, 18, 20, and 29 the Japanese Government urgently called for information about the location of ships in Pearl Harbor (exhibit 2, pp. 13 and 15). On November 15 the Japanese Consul in Honolulu was directed to make his "ships in harbor report" irregular but at the rate of twice a week (exhibit 2, p. 13). The reports were to give vessel locations in specific areas of the harbor, using the symbols established in September (exhibit 2, p. 15). The greatest secrecy was enjoined, because relations between Japan and the United States were described as "most critical." On November 18, the Japanese Consul General reported to Tokyo the locations of the ships in the various sub areas of Pearl Harbor, giving minute descriptions of the courses, speed, and distances apart of destroyers entering the harbor (exhibit 2, p. 15). On November 29 reports were requested even though there were no movements of ships. These dispatches were intercepted, decoded, and translated in Washington on December 3, 4, 5, and 6, 1941.

The "bomb plot" or "ships in harbor" message, and those messages relating to Pearl Harbor which followed it, meant that the ships of the Pacific Fleet in Pearl Harbor were marked for a Japanese attack. No other American harbor was divided into sub areas by Japan. In no other area did Japan seek information as to whether two or more vessels were alongside the same wharf. Prior to this message Japanese espionage in Hawaii was directed to ascertain the general whereabouts of the American Fleet, whether at sea or in port. With this message Japan inaugurated a new policy directed to Pearl Harbor and to no other place, in which information was no longer sought merely as to the general whereabouts of the fleet, but as to the presence of particular ships in particular areas of the harbor. In the period immediately preceding the attack Japan required such reports even when there was no movement of ships in and out of Pearl Harbor. The reports which Japan thus sought and received had a useful purpose only in planning and executing an attack upon the ships in port. These reports were not just the work of enthusiastic local spies gathering meticulous details in an excess of zeal. They were the product of instructions emanating from the Government of Japan in Tokyo. Officers of the high command in Washington have admitted before us that this message, if correctly evaluated, meant an attack on ships of the Pacific Fleet in Pearl Harbor (R. 3036, 4014; 4874; 2100–2102, 11313–11314; 6390, 6394; 5378).

Lieutenant Commander Kramer, of Naval Intelligence in Washington, promptly distributed the Pearl Harbor "bomb plot" message to the President, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Stark, the Director of Naval Communications, the Director of War Plans, and the Director of Naval Intelligence (R. 11209). It bore the notation "interesting message" (R. 11207). It was accompanied by a summary of its contents as follows:

"Tokyo directs special reports on ships in Pearl Harbor which is divided into five areas for the purpose of showing exact locations (R. 11207)."

Military Intelligence through Colonel Bratton delivered the "bomb plot" message to the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the Chief of the War Plans Division (R. 12083). The message was discussed several times by Colonel Bratton, Chief of the Far Eastern Section, Military Intelligence Division, War Department General Staff, with his opposite numbers in the Navy Department (R. 12105). They discussed possible significance of the message, as indicating a plan for an air attack on ships in Pearl Harbor (R. 12105). In the course of these discussions officers in Naval Intelligence stated that the Japanese were wasting their time in getting such meticulous detail about the location of ships in Pearl Harbor because the fleet would not be in Pearl Harbor when the emergency arose (R. 12105). Despite the fact that the "bomb plot" message and related intercepts dealing with the berthing of ships in Pearl Harbor were delivered to General Marshall and Admiral Stark, they testified before the committee that they have no recollection of ever seeing them (R. 2911–2912; 5787–5792). No intimation of these messages was given to General Short or Admiral Kimmel in Hawaii. On the contrary, Admiral Kimmel had been advised by the Navy Department on February 1, 1941:

"No move against Pearl Harbor appears imminent or planned for in the foreseeable future (exhibit 15)."

In the days immediately preceding Pearl Harbor, Japan made no effort to conceal the movements or presence of her naval forces in southeast Asia (R. 453). The movements of her troops in Indochina at that time were the subject of diplomatic exchanges between the United States and Japan (Foreign Relations of the United States, Japan, 1931–41, vol. II, p. 779). Yet, the intercepts showed that some Japanese plan went into effect automatically on November 29, from which Japan hoped to divert American suspicion by a pretext of continued negotiations. What was its nature? Only the President and his top advisers in Washington had this information.

Despite the elaborate and labored arguments in the report and despite the statements and high ranking military and naval officers to the contrary, I must conclude that the intercepted messages received and distributed in Washington on the afternoon and evening of December 6 and the early hours of December 7, pointed to an attack on Pearl Harbor:

1. The "Pilot Message." This was a message from Japan to her Ambassadors in Washington advising them that the Japanese reply to the American note of November 26 was ready and being sent to them in 14 parts; that it was to be treated with great secrecy pending instructions as to the time of its delivery, and that the time for its delivery was to be fixed in a separate message (exhibit 1, p. 238).

2. The first 13 parts of the Japanese reply. This included all but the last paragraph of the Japanese note handed to the Secretary of State on December 7 (exhibit 1, pp. 239–244).

3. The fourteenth and last paragraph of the Japanese reply, and the message to the Japanese Ambassadors which fixed the time for delivery of the Japanese note as 1 p. m., Washington time, December 7 (exhibit 1, p. 248).

The "Pilot Message" was filed in Tokyo at 6:56 a. m., Washington time, December 6; it was intercepted by the Navy by 7:20 a. m., Washington time, December 6, and forwarded to the Navy Department. It was sent by the Navy to the Army for decryption and translation about noon, Washington time, on December 6 (exhibit 41). It was decrypted, translated, and distributed about 3 p. m., Washington time, by the Army to Mr. Hull, Mr. Stimson, General Marshall, the Chief of the War Plans Division, General Gerow, and the Chief of Military Intelligence, General Miles (R. 12050). In the Navy Department the Director of Naval Intelligence, Admiral Wilkinson, received the so-called Pilot Message prior to 6 p. m., Washington time, on December 6 (R. 4658). He had previously told his subordinates to be on the lookout for the Japanese reply and felt sure that he gave instructions that the "Pilot Message" was to be delivered to Admiral Stark (R. 4661–4662). Admiral Turner, Chief of the War Plans Division in the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations, received the "Pilot Message" in the evening of December 6 (R. 5440–5442). Admiral Stark and General Marshall each denies that on December 6 he had knowledge of the "Pilot Message" (R. 3473; 5813). We find on the testimony of General Miles and Colonel Bratton that the "Pilot Message" was delivered to General Marshall during the afternoon of December 6, 1941 (R. 3589–3590; 12049–12050). This "Pilot Message" said that Japan's reply to the American note of November 26 was about to be sent from Tokyo to Washington, and indicated that a rupture of diplomatic relations or war was a matter of hours.

On the evening of December 6, between 9 p. m. and midnight, Washington time, the first 13 parts of the Japanese reply to the United States were delivered to the President, Mr. Knox, the Office of the Secretary of State, and the Chiefs of Army and Navy Intelligence (R. 10453–10455; 12052–12054). After reading this message the President stated "This means war" (R. 12441). He later telephoned Admiral Stark about the critical turn of events (R. 14757–14759). When Mr. Knox received the message he called Mr. Stimson and Mr. Hull and arranged a conference with them for Sunday morning (R. 10675–10681).

Mr. Stimson asked the Navy Department on Saturday evening to furnish him by 9 a. m. Sunday morning the following information:

"Compilation of men-of-war in Far East; British, American, Japanese, Dutch, Russian; also compilation of American men-of-war in the Pacific Fleet, with locations, and a list of American men-of-war in the Atlantic without locations" (R. 13988).

Admirals Stark, Ingersoll, and the Secretary of the Navy were consulted about this request. The Secretary of the Navy directed that the information be compiled and delivered prior to 10 o'clock Sunday, December 7 (R. 13988). This was done. The compilation showed that practically all the ships of the Pacific Fleet were in Pearl Harbor (exhibit 176).

In the early morning of December 7, 1941, about 5 a. m. Washington time, the message fixing the hour for delivery of the Japanese note as 1 p. m. Washington time was available in the Navy Department in Washington (R. 10694–10701). This was 8½ hours before the attack on Pearl Harbor. Admiral Stark and his principal subordinates have testified before us that they had knowledge of this message about 10:30 a. m. (R. 4675, 9146–9148, 10469). This was 5½ hours after it had been received in the Navy Department. It was about 3 hours before the attack. The relation of 1 p. m. Washington time to early morning in Hawaii was pointed out to Admiral Stark (R. 9146–9148; 9154–9156; 9236–9254; 4679; 4685). Admiral Stark was urged by the Director of Naval Intelligence to send a warning to the fleet (R. 4673). The chief intelligence officers of the Army had the "1 p. m. message" by 9 a. m. Washington time, immediately appreciated its significance, but did not succeed in bringing it to General Marshall's attention until nearly several hours later (R. 12077–12078; 12079–12081). Marshall was horseback riding in Virginia. No action was taken by the Army until he saw and read the 1 p. m. message and related intercepts, at which time he sent a message to General Short which went over commercial facilities and was received after the Pearl Harbor attack (R. 2935–2939; 8396). Admiral Stark took no action on this information except to agree to the inclusion in the belated Army message of instructions to General Short to advise Admiral Kimmel of its contents (R. 5814–5816).

Mr. Hull, Mr. Stimson, and Mr. Knox had the 1 p. m. message at their conference about 10:30 a. m. Washington time December 7 (R. 10473). The relation of Washington time to time in Hawaii and the Philippines was brought to their attention (R. 10473–10475). Mr. Stimson's notes describing the Sunday morning conference state:

"Today is the day that the Japanese are going to bring their answer to Hull, and everything in MAGIC indicated they had been keeping the time back until now in order to accomplish something hanging in the air. Knox and I arranged a conference with Hull at 10:30 and we talked the whole matter over. Hull is very certain that the Japs are planning some deviltry and we are all wondering where the blow will strike" (Stimson statement, p. 59).

The 1 p. m. message was delivered to the President about 10:30 a. m. (R. 10476).

Why did the high command in Washington fail to disclose promptly to Admiral Kimmel, General Short, and other American commanders in the field the information available in Washington Saturday night and early Sunday morning? In seeking the answer to this question we have encountered failures of memory and changes in sworn testimony. I am constrained to reach these conclusions:

As a result of his conversation with the President late Saturday night December 6, Admiral Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, did receive notice of a critical turn in Japanese-American relations (R. 14757–14759). Even if it be assumed that he had no inkling until that time of vital information which had been available to him for at least 6 hours, the call from the President should have provoked his active and immediate efforts to elicit from his subordinates the data which they possessed as to the immediacy of war. He failed to make such efforts. Sunday morning, when the Saturday messages are known to have come to his attention together with the 1 p. m. message, he again did not take action, despite the recommendations of the Chief of Naval Intelligence that a warning be sent to the fleet. He failed to exercise the care and diligence which his position required.

General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the Army, had the "Pilot Message" available to him on the afternoon of Saturday, December 6. This placed on him an obligation to make sure he would promptly receive the subsequent information which the pilot message indicated would be soon forthcoming. He did not do so. In placing himself outside of effective contact with his subordinates for several hours on Sunday morning, he failed to exercise the care and diligence which his position required.

The alleged failure of the chief subordinates of Admiral Stark and General Marshall to furnish them promptly with the intercepted messages on Saturday night was unusual for two reasons. First, it was a departure from the usual routine for the distribution of intercepts. Second, these two were the only usual recipients of intercepts who testified that the messages were not brought to their attention on Saturday night. Neither Admiral Stark nor General Marshall made any effort thereafter to ascertain why such a colossal break-down should occur in the functioning of their staffs on the eve of war (R. 3490–3491; 6215).

I have pointed out that during the critical period prior to the attack, the administration in Washington made certain over-all policy decisions as to how to deal with the Japanese crisis. One decision was that Japan should commit the first overt act against the United States and thus resolve the dilemma in which the administration's secret diplomacy had placed it. The other was to be in instant readiness to strike at Japan to check her further aggression against the British and Dutch in far-east Asia. Certainly the information and orders sent to General Short and Admiral Kimmel prior to the attack reflected the policy adopted in Washington.

General Short and Admiral Kimmel were not informed about the most important diplomatic steps in 1941. They were not informed of the parallel action agreement at the Atlantic Conference or the warning to Japan which followed. They were not informed of the significant terms of the American note to Japan of November 26. They were not informed of the commitment made to Great Britain, as set forth in the Brooke-Popham telegram of December 6. They did not receive the vital intercepted Japanese messages or any condensation or summary of them. In response to Admiral Kimmel's request for information in his letter of May 26, 1941, he did receive in July 1941 from the Navy Department the actual text of seven intercepted Japanese diplomatic messages (exhibit 37, pp. 6–12). In the week before the attack he received the next of another intercepted message describing the Japanese intrigue in Thailand. Kimmel testified that he believed that he was getting all pertinent information affecting the Pacific Fleet. This was the assurance Admiral Stark had given in response to the definite request in the letter of May 26, 1941. The intelligence officer of the Pacific Fleet, Captain Layton, wrote to Captain McCollum, his opposite number in Naval Intelligence in Washington, on March 11, 1941, to urge that intercepted Japanese diplomatic traffic be sent to the fleet. McCollum's reply satisfied Layton that the fleet would receive diplomatic traffic which affected its actions (R. 12923). But the vital intercepts were not sent to Admiral Kimmel or General Short. The fact that a few intercepts were sent to Admiral Kimmel shows that the withholding of others was not attributable to fear of the security of naval communications and consequent prejudice to the secret of magic.

The "bomb plot" message and related intercepts would have been of incalculable value both to General Short and Admiral Kimmel. Yet they were given no intimation of their existence.

The message of November 27 to Admiral Kimmel warned him of the threatened Japanese move in southeast Asia, and ordered him to be ready to execute a Fleet offensive against the Marshalls required by war plans. Readiness for an offensive at some distance from Hawaii precluded concentrating the limited resources of the Fleet upon the defense of its base, which no dispatch from the Navy Department mentioned as a point of attack. The offensive missions prescribed by the war plans required the full use of the patrol planes of the Fleet. These planes were recently acquired and required alterations and maintenance work to put them in shape for war. The planes were too few for full distant searches from Hawaii. Partial searches were properly considered of doubtful value and involved the risk of making the planes useless for the reconnaissance required in the raids on the Marshalls at the time when they would be needed. Task forces at sea and patrol planes going to and from outlying islands carried out such distant reconnaissance as was feasible. As suggested by the Navy Department on November 27, the two carriers of the Pacific Fleet were sent on missions to outlying islands. Lacking air protection, the battleships appeared better disposed in port than at sea. The fuel limitations and other logistic deficiencies of the Pacific Fleet were so acute that it was physically impossible to keep the whole Fleet, or major portions of it, at sea for extended intervals. The disposition of the ships and the use of patrol planes on and after November 27 were logical and reasonable in view of the message of that date.

On the evening of December 6, in response to Secretary Stimson's request and at the direction of Secretary Knox, the Navy Department compiled from its records a summary showing that all the major ships of the Pacific Fleet were in Pearl Harbor. At this time the information available in Washington showed that war was only hours away. Yet the two Secretaries and the high command made no effort to direct any change in the dispositions of the Fleet as shown in the Navy Department summary. They took no steps to furnish Admiral Kimmel the information which they possessed as to the imminence of war. Consequently they deprived him of any chance to alter his dispositions in the light of that information. I conclude that Secretaries Stimson and Knox and the high command in Washington knew that the major units of the Fleet were in Pearl Harbor on December 6–7, 1941, and were satisfied with that situation.

The message of November 27 to Admiral Kimmel illustrates one feature of the pre-Pearl Harbor plan of action of the administration. The fleet was to be in readiness for offensive raids on the Marshalls to counter the Japanese advance in southeast Asia. The message sent to General Short by General Marshall on November 27, 1941, shows the other feature of the administration's plan of action—to make sure that the Japanese would strike first so that the offensive by the fleet would be approved by the American public. The message to General Short stated:

"If hostilities cannot, repeat cannot, be avoided, the United States desires that Japan commit the first overt act. This policy should not, repeat not, be construed as restricting you to a course of action that might jeopardize your defense. Prior to hostile Japanese action you are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary, but these measures should be carried out so as not, repeat not, to alarm the civil population or disclose intent" (exhibit 32, p. 7).

General Marshall testified that instructions about the "overt act" were put into the message on the personal order of the President (R. 3443–3447). In addition the War Department sent three other messages to the Army and Army Air Forces in Hawaii on November 27 and 28, all of which were directed to sabotage and subversive activities. One of these messages from the War Department on November 28 stated:

"Protective measures should be confined to those essential to security, avoiding unnecessary publicity and alarm" (exhibit 32, p. 13).

The Navy Department also cautioned Admiral Kimmel against committing the first overt act. On November 29 he received from the Navy Department the substance of the Army's message to General Short with the additional directive—

"Undertake no offensive action until Japan has committed an over act" (exhibit 37, p. 38).

On November 27, 1941, General Short reported to General Marshall the measures he had taken in response to General Marshall's message. His reply specifically referred to General Marshall's message by its number: It stated: "Report Department alerted to prevent sabotage. Liaison with the Navy. Reurad four seven two twenty-seventh" (exhibit 32, p. 12). The Chief of the War Plans Division of the Army, General Leonard T. Gerow, saw General Short's reply, noted and initialed it (exhibit 46). This reply was routed by General Gerow to General Marshall, Chief of Staff. Some question has arisen as to whether General Marshall in fact actually saw General Short's reply. In order that the reader may have the exact facts, I desire to report the evidence, question and answer, beginning page 1420 of the printed record:

"Mr. KEEFE. Now, with the country on the brink of war, General Marshall, you having the then impression, as you have stated it a few moments ago, that Japan was liable to precipitate war by attacking any time, any place, it would be highly important to the Chief of Staff to see to it that the orders which he had given were carried out, would it not?

"General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. Now when General Short's message came back the evidence indicates, somewhat inconclusively perhaps, that it was part of three or four papers, the top one being the reply of MacArthur, then Short, then a route sheet, the MacArthur message being on top and that bears your endorsement with your initials.

"General MARSHALL. Correct, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. Your initials do not appear on the Short message but they do show the initials of the Secretary of War and the War Plans Department, General Gerow. Now am I correct in the assumption from an understanding of your evidence on that point that you think you must have seen the Short message although you did not initial it, having initialed the top one?

"General MARSHALL. That was my assumption, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. Well, is that a mere assumption or is it a fact?

"General MARSHALL. I stated I did not recall, sir; that I must assume that I had seen it.

"Mr. KEEFE. Well, if you saw that Short message, General Marshall, as Chief of Staff it imposed some responsibility upon you, did it not?

"General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. It was addressed to you as Chief of Staff, was it not?

"General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. And the very telegram itself indicates that it is in response to the command order which you had issued to him?

"General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. And it was a message which attempted on the part of Short to convey to you as chief of staff the nature of the alert under which he was operating?

"General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. That was his response to your order?

"General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. Now, I have read the various statements, General Marshall, that you have made at various times in connection with this matter. You recall that when you were before the Army board first you were somewhat confused about those things because you thought that at some time in November there had ben a change in alert numbers. Do you remember that?

"General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. Now, it is perfectly clear now that a reading of this message indicates that there isn't any alert number specified in Short's wire.

"General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. So that puts that out of the picture, doesn't it?

"General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. So we get down to the simple fact that here is a message from your commanding general in the bastion of defense in the Pacific to which all of our defenses, as you have testified, were tied, in which he tells you that he is alerted to prevent sabotage; liaison with Navy. Now in all fairness, General Marshall, in the exercise of ordinary care as Chief of Staff, ought you not to have proceeded to investigate further and give further orders to General Short when it appeared that he was only alerted against sabotage?

"General MARSHALL. As I stated earlier, that was my opportunity to intervene and I did not do it.

"Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, you say that was your opportunity. That was your responsibility, was it not?

"General MARSHALL. You can put it that way, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. Well, I don't want to put it that way. I am asking you. You used the words 'that was your opportunity,' I do not want an opportunity to arise in the future discussion of this matter to have a conflict of words and not to be able to understand just what you meant. Do I understand that your use of the word 'opportunity' is synonymous with responsibility?

"General MARSHALL. Mr. Keefe, I had an immense number of papers going over my desk every day informing me what was happening anywhere in the world. This was a matter of great importance. It had gone into the machine, it had been sent out, the acknowledgments had come back. They passed the important messages over my desk. I noted them and initialed them; those that I thought the Secretary of War ought specifically to see I put them out for him to see, to be sure that he would see it in case by any chance he did not see the same message.

"I was not passing the responsibility on to the Secretary of War. I merely wanted him to know.

"Now, the same thing related to those orders of the War Department. I was responsible for the actions of the General Staff throughout on large matters and on the small matters. I was responsible for those, but I am not a bookkeeping machine and it is extremely difficult, it is an extremely difficult thing for me to take each thing in its turn and give it exactly the attention that it had merited.

"Now, in this particular case a very tragic thing occurred, there is no question about that, there is no question in regard to my responsibility as Chief of Staff. I am not attempting to evade that at all, but I do not think it is quite characterized in the manner that you have expressed yourself.

"Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, let me put it in another way. You have now stated it was your responsibility as Chief of Staff to see to it that General Short out there in Hawaii, which you have described as being your bastion of defense, to see that he was alerted, and if he misinterpreted your order to see that that order was carried out.

"General MARSHALL. That is my responsibility, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. Now, I have stated it correctly; haven't I?

"General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; you have."

Subsequently, in the same examination (printed record pp. 1422-1423) General Marshall stated that General Gerow had a direct responsibility in this matter and that he had full responsibility as Chief of Staff. General Marshall was very fair. He admitted that a tragic mistake had been made, and while it was the direct responsiblity of General Gerow, Chief of War Plans, to have "caught" General Short's reply and to have immediately advised his Chief of Staff, yet General Marshall as Chief of Staff did assume over-all responsibility for failure of the Washington headquarters to interpret and evaluate General Short's reply and to see to it that he was on an all-out alert in accordance with the command directive issued in the message from Marshall to Short on November 27. The Secretary of War saw, noted and initialed General Short's reply. (Exhibit 46.) It was the responsibility of General Marshall to see that General Short was properly alerted (R. 3723). General Short, after being ordered to report his state of readiness to General Marshall, was entitled to assume that this state of readiness was satisfactory to the Chief of Staff unless he heard to the contrary (R. 3443). Neither General Marshall, General Gerow nor Secretary of War Stimson made any criticism or suggestion to General Short about the condition of his alert in Hawaii in the 10-day period prior to the attack. Because of their silence General Short was led to believe that the Chief of Staff approved his alert against sabotage. I believe that Secretary Stimson, and Generals Marshall and Gerow, understood the nature of his alert which was plainly indicated in the reply itself. I further believe they were satisfied with General Short's alert until the blow fell on Hawaii.

On June 17, 1940, General Marshall had placed the Hawaiian Department on all-out war alert by the following message (exhibit 52):

"Immediately alert complete defensive organization to deal with possible trans-Pacific raid comma to greatest extent possible with out creating public hysteria or provoking undue curiosity of newspapers or alien agents. Suggest maneuver basis. Maintain alert until further orders. Instructions for secret communication direct with Chief of Staff will be furnished you shortly. Acknowledge."

General Marshall followed up this alert with great care and received considerable detailed information about it (exhibit 52). He described the information which caused the alert in 1940 in a letter to the commanding general in Hawaii, General Herron, as follows:

"You have no doubt wondered as to the alert instructions sent to you on the 17th. Briefly, the combination of information from a number of sources led to the deduction that recent Japanese-Russian agreement to compose their differences in the Far East was arrived at and so timed as to permit Japan to undertake a trans-Pacific raid against Oahu, following the departure of the United States Fleet from Hawaii.

"Presumably such a raid would be in the interest of Germany and Italy, to force the United States to pull the fleet back to Hawaii.

"Whether the information or deductions were correct, I cannot say. Even if they were, the precautions you have taken may keep us from knowing they were by discouraging any overt act" (exhibit 52, p. 13).

On November 27, 1941, the information which General Marshall had showed a far more severe crisis in Japanese-American relations than existed in June of 1940. As his letter to General Herron shows, he felt that this all-out alert in Hawaii in 1940 may have discouraged the Japanese from attacking that area. Yet he did not repeat on November 27, 1941, his message of June 17, 1940, to Hawaii with its clear-cut order: "Immediately alert complete defensive organization to deal with possible trans-Pacific raid." He assigned as a reason for not doing so, the fact that in the message of November 27, 1941, "you had to include instructions of the President regarding overt acts" (R. 3975).

Mr. Stimson describes the preparation of the Army message of November 27 to General Short as follows:

"If there was to be war, moreover, we wanted the Japanese to commit the first overt act. On the other hand, the matter of defense against an attack by Japan was first consideration. In Hawaii because of the large numbers of Japanese inhabitants, it was felt desirable to issue a special warning so that nothing would be done, unless necessary to defense, to alarm the civil population and thus possibly precipitate an incident and give the Japanese an excuse to go to war and the chance to say that we had committed the first overt act." (Stimson statement, pp. 21-22.)

Again on December 7, Mr. Stimson noted in his diary:

"When the news first came that Japan had attacked us, my first feeling was of relief that the indecision was over and that a crisis had come in a way which would unite all our people. This continued to be my dominant feeling in spite of the news of catastrophes which quickly developed." (Stimson statement, p. 62.)

The same fear of publicity, alarm, or anything which might savor of a first overt act by the United States, rather than by Japan, is reflected in the President's message to High Commissioner Sayre in the Philippines on November 26, 1941. After describing the crisis in Japanese-American relations, the President directed Mr. Sayre to impress upon the President of the Philippines "the desirability of avoiding public pronouncement or action since that might make the situation more difficult" (R. 13861-13862).

On Saturday night December 6 the President read the first 13 parts of the final Japanese diplomatic note, remarked "This means war," and decided to get in touch with the Chief of Naval Operations (R. 12442, 12443). He learned that the Chief of Naval Operations was at the theater. He then stated that he would reach the Admiral later, that he did not want to cause public alarm by having the Admiral paged. The fact that the admiral had a box reserved was mentioned. The President did not wish him to leave suddenly because he would surely be seen and undue alarm might be caused (R. 12444).

General Marshall failed to use the scrambler telephone on his desk to call General Short in Hawaii on Sunday morning, December 7, nearly 2 hours before the attack, and give him the same information which he sent in the delayed telegram which reached General Short after the attack. General Marshall testified that among the possible factors which may have influenced him against using the scrambler telephone was the possibility that the Japanese could construe the fact that the Army was alerting its garrisons in Hawaii as a hostile act (R. 3390).

"The Japanese would have grasped at most any straw to bring to such portions of our public that doubted our integrity of action that we were committing an act that forced action on their part" (R. 3193).

The concept of an "incident" as a factor which would unify public opinion behind an all-out war effort either in the Atlantic or Pacific had influenced the thinking of officials in Washington for a long time. Many plans which might have produced an incident were from time to time discussed and considered. As early as October 10, 1940, Secretary Knox had advised Admiral Richardson, then Commander in Chief of the Pacific Fleet, of a plan the President was considering to shut off all trade between Japan and North and South America. This would be accomplished by means of a patrol of American ships in two lines extending from Hawaii westward to the Philippines, and from Samoa toward the Dutch East Indies (R. 792). This plan was to be instituted in the event Japan retaliated against Great Britain upon the reopening of the Burma Road scheduled for October 17, 1940 (R. 792). Admiral Richardson was amazed at this proposal and stated that the fleet was not prepared to put such a plan into effect, nor for the war which would certainly result from such a course of action (R. 793).

On February 11, 1941, the Chief of Naval Operations in a Memorandum for the President, described the President as considering a plan to send a detachment of vessels to the Far East and perhaps to permit a "leak" that they were going out there (exhibit 106). He quoted the President in the same memorandum as stating that he would not mind losing one or two cruisers, but that he did not want to take a chance on losing five or six. Again, in a letter of April 19, 1941, the Chief of Naval Operations quoted the President as saying to him:

"Betty, just as soon as those ships come back from Australia and New Zealand, or perhaps a little before, I want to send some more out. I just want to keep them popping up here and there and keep the Japs guessing" (exhibit 106).

On May 24, 1941, Admiral Stark wrote Admiral Kimmel—

"Day before yesterday the President gave me an over-al' limit of 30 days to prepare and have ready an expedition of 25,000 men to sail for and to take the Azores. Whether or not there would be opposition I do not know, but we have to be fully prepared for strenuous opposition" (exhibit 106).

On July 25, 1941, the Chief of Naval Operations wrote Admiral Kimmel to the effect that he might be called upon to send a carrierload of planes to Russia via one of the Asiatic Russian ports (exhibit 106). "I don't know that you will, but the President has told me to be prepared for it, and I want you to have the thought." Admiral Kimmel replied to this suggestion as follows:

"I entertain no doubt that such an operation, if discovered (as is highly probable), will be tantamount to initiation of a Japanese-American war. If we are going to take the initiative in commencing such a war I can think of more effective ways for gaining initial advantage. In short, it is my earnest conviction that use of a carrier to deliver aircraft to Asiatic Russian ports in the present period of strained relations is to invite war. If we have decided upon war it would be far better to take direct offensive action. If for reasons of political expediency it has been determined to force Japan to fire the first shot, let us choose a method which will be more advantageous to ourselves" (exhibit 106).

On July 31, 1941, Admiral Stark sent Admiral Kimmel a copy of a letter to Capt. Charles M. Cooke as follows:

"Within 48 hours after the Russian situation broke I went to the President, with the Secretary's approval, and stated that on the assumption that the country's decision is not to let England fall, we should immediately seize the psychological opportunity presented by the Russian-German clash and announce and start escorting immediately, and protecting the western Atlantic on a large scale; that such a declaration, followed by immediate action on our part, would almost certainly involve us in the war and that I considered every day of delay in our getting into the war as dangerous and that much more delay might be fatal to Britain's survival. I reminded him that I had been asking this for months in the State Department and elsewhere, etc., etc., etc. I have been maintaining that only a war psychology could or would speed things up the way they should be speeded up; that strive as we would it just is not in the nature of things to get the results in peace that we would, were we at war.

"The Iceland situation may produce an 'incident.' You are as familiar with that and the President's statements and answers at press conferences as I am. Whether or not we will get an 'incident' because of the protection we are giving Iceland and the shipping which we must send in support of Iceland and our troops, I do not know—only Hitler can answer" (exhibit 106).

Again Admiral Kelly Turner, War Plans Officer for the Chief of Naval Operations stated, in describing United States-British Staff conversations on war plans in 1941:

"It was felt by the Naval Department that there might be a possibility of war with Japan without the involvement of Germany, but at some length and over a considerable period this matter was discussed and it was determined that in such a case the United States would, if possible, initiate efforts to bring Germany into the war against us in order that we would be able to give strong support to the United Kingdom in Europe" (testimony of Admiral R. K. Turner before Admiral Hart, pp. 251, 252, question 10, exhibit 144).

On November 29, 1941, the Chief of Naval Operations sent a despatch to the Commander in Chief of the Asiatic Fleet which commenced with this unusual statement:

"President directs that the following be done as soon as possible and within two days if possible after receipt this despatch" (exhibit 37, p. 39).

The President's directions were that the Commander in Chief of the Asiatic Fleet was to charter three small vessels to form a "defensive information patrol." The minimum requirements to establish these ships as United States men of war would suffice in manning them. These requirements were: Command by a naval officer and the mounting of a small gun and one machine gun. The employment of Filipino crews with the minimum number naval ratings was authorized. The ships were to observe and report by radio Japanese movement in the West China Sea and Gulf of Siam. The President prescribed the point at which each vessel was to be stationed. One vessel was to be stationed between Hainan and Hue; one between Camranh Bay and Cape St. Jaques; one off Pointe De Camau (exhibit 37, p. 39). All these points were clearly in the path of the Japanese advance down the coast of Indochina, and toward the Gulf of Siam. The Navy Department did not originate this plan (R. 11351). The Navy Department would not have directed it to be done unless the President had specifically ordered it (R. 11351). Admiral Hart was already conducting reconnaissance off that coast by planes from Manila (R. 11350). So far as the Navy Department was concerned, sufficient information was being received from this air reconnaissance (R. 11351). Had the Japanese fired upon any one of these three small vessels, it would have constituted an overt act on the part of Japan (R. 11352).

AFTERMATH OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

Eleven days after Pearl Harbor, the Roberts Commission was appointed by the President to find the facts about the Pearl Harbor attack. Its duty was "to provide bases for sound decisions whether any derelictions of duty or errors of judgment on the part of United States Army or Navy personnel contributed to such successes as were achieved by the enemy * * * and, if so, what these derelictions or errors were, and who were responsible therefor."

General Marshall and Admiral Stark were witnesses at the first meeting of the Commission. Their testimony was not given under oath and was not recorded. Neither was that of their chief subordinates, Admiral Turner and General Gerow. The Commission examined General Short and Admiral Kimmel under oath in Hawaii. They were not permitted to be present during the testimony of other witnesses, to examine or cross-examine them, or to know what evidence had been presented.

The Commission knew that Japanese messages had been intercepted and were available, prior to the attack, to the high command in Washington. It did not inquire about what information these intercepts contained or who received them. Mr. Justice Roberts testified before this committee: "I would not have bothered to read it (the intercepted Japanese traffic) if it had been shown to us" (R., vol. 47, p. 8836). Misleading statements made to the Roberts Commission by high ranking naval officers in Washington to the effect that Admiral Kimmel had all the information available to the Navy Department (R. 4891–4900, 4893–4895, 5021–5022) went unchallenged.

The Roberts Commission's failure to inquire into the Japanese intercepts and their distribution and evaluation in Washington, prevented it from correctly assessing responsibility for the disaster. The facts were then fresh in the minds of key witnesses in Washington. They could not then have honestly forgotten their whereabouts at important times. When the Roberts Commission bypassed the facts about the intercepted messages, it nearly buried the truth about Pearl Harbor. Its report became the indictment of two officers based upon incomplete evidence.

The Roberts report was published January 25, 1942. General Short, reading it in the press, was dumbfounded, and immediately called his friend General Marshall on the telephone to inquire whether he should retire. Marshall advised him to "stand pat," but told Short he would consider the telephone conversation "authority" for Short's retirement if it became necessary (R. 8446). On the same day, the Secretary of the Navy directed that Admiral Kimmel in San Francisco be informed that Short had submitted a request for retirement (exhibit 121). This information was immediately telephoned to Kimmel. Kimmel, who had not previously thought of retiring, construed the telephone message as a request that he do so, and submitted a formal request for retirement dated January 26, 1942. General Short, who thought it was not fair to General Marshall to have to act only on the basis of a telephone conversation, sent to Marshall a formal request for retirement in writing, addressed to The Adjutant General dated January 25, 1942. On January 26, General Marshall recommended to Secretary of War Stimson that General Short's application for retirement be accepted "today," but that it be done "quietly without any publicity at the moment" (R. 8459). Admiral Stark requested the Army to keep him advised about Short's retirement as he proposed to "communicate this fact to Admiral Kimmel in the hope Kimmel will likewise apply for retirement" (R. 8459). However, on January 28, 1942, he sent a telephone message to Kimmel to the effect that the previous telephone notification about Short's retirement was not intended to influence him. Thereupon Admiral Kimmel submitted his letter of January 28, 1942, to the Secretary of the Navy, in which he stated: "I desire my request for retirement to stand, subject only to determination by the Department as to what course of action will best serve the interests of the country and the good of the service" (exhibit 121).

The President personally directed the method of handling the requests for retirement of Kimmel and Short. On January 29, 1942, he instituted a three-point program for dealing with the matter. The Army and Navy were to act together. After a week's waiting they were to announce that Kimmel and Short had applied for retirement and that their applications were under consideration. After another week had passed, public announcement was to be made that the applications had been accepted with the condition that acceptance did not bar subsequent court-martial proceedings. Court-martial proceedings, however, were to be described as impossible without the disclosure of military secrets. The wording of the condition in the acceptance was troublesome to the administration. The President, Secretary Stimson, Secretary Knox, and Attorney General Biddle labored over the language (R. 8462, 8464, exhibit 171). The administration wanted to avoid public criticism for having barred court-martial proceedings. On the other hand, it did not wish to stimulate the public or the officers to expect or demand court-martial proceedings (R. 8464, 8467). Finally, language as suitable as possible was agreed upon. The phrase to be used in accepting the retirement applications was "without condonation of any offense or prejudice to future disciplinary action." Admiral Kimmel and General Short were each retired by letters so worded, dated respectively February 16 and February 17, 1942. The Secretary of the Navy, in announcing the Navy's action, stated that he had directed the preparation of charges for court martial of Admiral Kimmel alleging dereliction of duty. The public were informed that a trial could not be held until such time as the public interest and safety would permit.

The public reaction was as planned. Kimmel and Short were considered solely responsible for Pearl Harbor. The Roberts report, considered by Justice Roberts as only an indictment, became, in effect, a conviction. The two officers were helpless. No court martial could be had. They had no way of defending themselves. They remained in ignorance of what evidence the Roberts Commission had heard. Admiral Stark wrote to Admiral Kimmel on February 21, 1942:

"Pending something definite, there is no reason why you should not settle yourself in a quiet nook somewhere and let Old Father Time help the entire situation, which I feel he will—if for no other reason that he always has" (exhibit 121).

The high civilian and military officials in Washington who had skillfully maneuvered Kimmel and Short into the position of exclusive blame knew at the time all the hidden facts about Pearl Harbor, at least as much and probably more than this investigation has been able to uncover. As the 2-year statutory period for instituting court-martial proceedings was about to expire, Kimmel and Short were requested by the Secretaries of War and Navy to waive the Statute of Limitations. Admiral Kimmel did so but with the provision that any court martial be held in "open court" (exhibit 171). General Short did likewise (R. 8496–8499). Similar requests were not made of other officers, not even of those who before this committee publicly accepted responsibility for certain failures of the high command in Washington.

In June of 1944 the Congress directed the Secretaries of War and Navy to conduct investigations into the Pearl Harbor attack. The War Department denied the Army Board of Investigation access to the intercepted messages. General Miles, Director of Military Intelligence, at the time of Pearl Harbor, was ordered by General Marshall not to testify on the subject of the intercepts (R. 11843). For a considerable period the Navy Court of Inquiry was denied access to the same material (exhibit 195). After repeated demands by Admiral Kimmel, the Navy Department released this restriction upon its own Court. The War Department finally followed the same course. For the first time, late in the Board's proceedings, Army officers were permitted to testify before the Army Board as to all details regarding the intercepts (R. 12035). But many important Army witnesses had already testified under the limitations previously ordered.

In the fall of 1944 the Army board and Navy court made their reports to the Secretaries of the War and Navy. These reports were critical of the conduct of Admiral Stark and General Marshall. The findings were not made public. The Navy court exonerated Admiral Kimmel. Admiral Kimmel's request to read its report was refused by the Secretary of the Navy (R. 6811). The Secretaries of War and Navy instituted further secret investigations dispensing with the services of the three-man board and court previously established, and each entrusting the conduct of proceedings to a single officer. Admiral Kimmel's request to be present at the further Navy investigation, to introduce evidence, to confront and cross-examine witnesses was denied by the Secretary of the Navy (R. 6812). The affidavits and testimony at the further investigations contain many instances where witnesses gave evidence materially different from that which they had previously sworn to before the Army board and the naval court. These changes were especially marked in testimony of certain key witnesses on the subject of the dissemination and evaluation of the intercepted messages in Washington. Again, before this committee these same witnesses further changed their testimony from that sworn to twice previously, or pleaded lapses of memory.

The record of the high military and civilian officials of the War and Navy Departments in dealing with the Pearl Harbor disaster from beginning to end does them no credit. It will have a permanent bad effect on the morale and integrity of the armed services. The administration had ample opportunity to record and preserve all the facts about Pearl Harbor, even if their public disclosure needed to wait upon the war's end. This was not done. The policy adopted was to place the public responsibility for the disaster on the commanders in the field, to be left there for all time. The policy failed only because suppression created public suspicion, and the Congress was alert.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

This investigation has not brought to light all the facts about Pearl Harbor. We have been denied much vital information. Mr. Stimson did not answer certain important interrogations which, in consideration of the state of his health, were submitted to him in writing. He has also denied to the committee his diary entries for the days December 2 to December 6, 1941. These were significantly omitted from his written statement. Mr. Hull's health permitted only a brief appearance before us and no examination by the minority members of the committee. Written interrogatories were submitted as to when he first saw or obtained information as to the contents of certain vital intercepted messages, including the 1 p. m. message. Mr. Hull answered: "I do not recall the exact times that I first saw or learned of the contents of the messages you cite" (R. 14316). "I do not recall" was an answer frequently received from other important witnesses. Messrs. Maxwell Hamilton, Eugene Dooman and Stanley Hornbeck, State Department officials who played important roles in 1941 in our Far Eastern diplomacy, have not testified. We have been denied Ambassador Grew's diary. In December 1941 Gen. Bedell Smith was secretary to the General Staff of the Army. He did not testify. His possible knowledge of the distribution of intercepted messages to General Marshall on Saturday evening, December 6, was not investigated. Admiral (then Captain) Glover was the duty officer in the office of the Chief of Naval Operations on December 6, 1941. His log for that night contained the vital information about Mr. Stimson's interest in precise locations of the ships of the Pacific Fleet. Admiral Glover sent the committee a telegram but did not testify. Mr. Welles' memoranda of Atlantic Charter conferences was obtained from State Depatrment only after his oral testimony before us had been completed.

On the evidence before us I concur in the findings of the committee with respect to responsibilities of our commanders in Hawaii. I believe that the "mistakes of judgment" referred to in the committee report are directly related to the failures of the high commands in Washington to have their organizations fully alerted and on a war footing and that those in command at the Washington level must bear their full share of the responsibility for the tragedy of Pearl Harbor.

I further conclude that secret diplomacy was at the root of the tragedy. The United States had warned Japan that an advance to Malaya or the Dutch East Indies would mean war with this Nation. The President gave Great Britain assurances of our armed support in such event. What Japan and Britain knew, our commanders in the field and our own people did not know. Washington feared that national unity could not be attained unless Japan committed the first overt act. Accordingly, the Army in Hawaii was put on an antisabotage alert, a defensive posture containing the least possible risk of incident in Hawaii which Japan might claim was an overt act by the United States. The mobilization of American public opinion in support of an offensive by the Pacific Fleet against Japan was to be accomplished, if at all, by a message to Congress "at the last stage of our relations, relating to actual hostilities." This message was to be the prelude to hostilities by the United States if Japan attacked the British and the Dutch at the outset of the war and did not attack this Nation. A direct attack by Japan against the United States at the outset of hostilities would make such a message unnecessary. Mr. Simson's diary describes the plan succinctly: "The question was how we should maneuver them into the position of firing the first shot without allowing too much danger to ourselves." In formulating this plan undoubtedly Washington was influenced by public promises to keep us out of war unless attacked.

With full knowledge of Japan's intentions prior to the attack, Washington had one plain duty to the American people. That duty was to inform them of their peril. This was not done. Washington had a further duty to make sure that our forces were ready to meet the attack by furnishing their commanders afield and afloat with all available information, or by evaluating that information and giving them appropriate clear and categoric instructions.

Those who find in various instances of poor coordination between the services the causes of Pearl Harbor are satisfied with a superficial explanation. The state of readiness of our armed forces in the field was a reflection of over-all policy adopted on the highest level in Washington. The President had delivered to him the Japanese intercepted messages and possessed much more information about Japanese plans and intentions than any field commander. He gave most minute directions to commanders in the field, even as to the scouting positions of individual ships, when he thought such directions necessary. A merger of the armed forces and unity of command in Hawaii in November and December 1941 could not have eliminated the dangers in the policy of maneuvering Japan into striking the first blow. That policy would still have shaped the orders given, as well as the information sent to a single commander in the field.

Those who find American public opinion responsible for Pearl Harbor accept an entirely false theory. Enlightened public opinion is based on accurate public information. The American people, if kept well informed of their real diplomatic position, do not need an incident to unite them. If foreign policy and diplomatic representations are treated as the exclusive, secret information of the President and his advisers, public opinion will not be enlightened. The very nature of the consequent public alarm places the armed forces of the Nation in effective readiness and may even deter an enemy from executing its planned attack. The best deterrent to a predatory Japan in late 1941 was a thoroughly informed and obviously alerted America.

In this connection it will be noted that when the reports of the Army Board and the Navy Court of Inquiry were submitted to President Truman on August 30, 1945, he made the following statement:

"I have read it (the Pearl Harbor reports) very carefully, and I came to the conclusion that the whole thing is the result of the policy which the country itself pursued. The country was not ready for preparedness. Every time the President made an effort to get a preparedness program through the Congress it was stifled. Whenever the President made a statement about the necessity of preparedness he was vilified for doing it. I think the country is as much to blame as any individual in this final situation that developed in Pearl Harbor."

An examination of the facts ought to compel any person to reject this conclusion. The record clearly demonstrates how the Army and Navy get the funds needed for national defense. The Army and Navy are required to submit their respective estimates each year to the Bureau of the Budget. This Bureau, acting for the President, conducts hearings and finally makes recommendations to the President as to the amounts to be recommended to the Congress for appropriation. The Congress is in effect the people of America. The record discloses that in the fiscal years 1934 to 1941, inclusive, the Army and Navy jointly asked for $26,580,145,093. This is the combined total of Army and Navy requests made to the Bureau of the Budget. In the same period the President recommended to the Congress that it appropriate to the combined services $23,818,319,897. The Congress actually made available to the Army and Navy in this period $24,943,987,823. Thus it is apparent that the President himself recommended to the Congress in the fiscal years 1934 to 1941, inclusive, that it appropriate for the Army and Navy $2,761,826,033 less than had been requested by the Army and Navy. The people's Representatives in the Congress gave to the Army and Navy in the form of appropriations and authorizations for expenditure $1,256,667,926 more than the President had recommended in his budget messages to the Congress.

The mere recital of these undisputed figures should dispose of the contention that "the country is as much to blame as any individual in this final situation that developed in Pearl Harbor." I am including herein for ready reference a complete statement:

	Asked	Budget	Congress
1934	$320,900,513	$280,746,841	$280,066,381
1935	305,271,321	288,960,155	283,862,094

Congress restored: $1,256,667,926 of the Budget cut.

Another subject that has been bandied about the country for a number of years relates to what has been frequently referred to as the failure or refusal of Congress to fortify the island of Guam. The contention has been made that Congress refused to appropriate money to fortify the island of Guam and that as a result of such failure the entire war in the Pacific in its initial stages was lost to the Japanese.

The fact is that no proposal was ever submitted to the Congress involving the fortification of Guam. The Navy did request an appropriation of $5,000,000 for the purpose of dredging the harbor at Guam (Stark testimony, R. pp. 6546–6547). The first request of the Navy was rejected by the Congress. Thereafter the appropriation requested by the Navy was passed with only one vote against it. The dredging operation was being carried on when war broke out with Japan.

It is interesting to note that "Rainbow No. 5," which is the Joint Chiefs of Staff worldwide war plan, placed the island of Guam in category F (R. p. 6535). The following questions and answers tell the story:

"Mr. KEEFE. Now, I would like to ask a question which bothered me with respect to your Rainbow No. 5, which places the island of Guam in what is called category F.

"Admiral STARK. I have the category here.

"Mr. KEEFE. Now, will you state for the record what category F means?

"Admiral STARK. Yes, sir. We have that, I am sure. This is out of Joint Action, Army and Navy, and refers to degrees of preparation, and they are put in categories of defense, A. B, C, D, E, and F.

"Mr. KEEFE. Well, take Guam to start with. That is in F. Now give us what Category F means.

"Admiral STARK. Category F: 'Positions beyond the continental limits of the United States which may be subject to either minor or major attack for the purpose of occupation but which cannot be provided with adequate defense forces. Under this category the employment of existing local forces and local facilities will be confined principally to the demolition of those things it is desirable to prevent falling into the hands of the enemy."

"Mr. KEEFE. Then, so far as Guam was concerned, at the time this basic war plan was devised it was the considered opinion of both the Army and Navy that it could not be defended and it therefore was placed in Category F that required those on the island, through demolition or otherwise, to destroy anything of value to the enemy and to permit it to be taken?

"Admiral STARK. Yes, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. And to surrender?

"Admiral STARK. Yes, sir.

"Mr. KEEFE. That is right, is it not?

"Admiral STARK. That is correct; yes, sir (R., p. 6537).

"Mr. KEEFE. Now, at the time of the attack on Guam and the capture of Guam by the Japs were improvements on the harbor being made at that time or had they been completed?

"Admiral STARK. They had not been completed. Of course, I recall very clearly the legislation with regard to that. I do not know just what their status was at this moment. I had obtained from Congress the appropriation, I believe it was $6,000,000, for certain improvements to the harbor. You recall the first year I lost it by six votes, and the following year it went through almost unanimously, only one vote being opposed to it. Just how far we had gotten along with that I do not recall at the moment.

"Mr. KEEFE. With those improvements completed, Guam would still be in Category F, would it not?

"Admiral STARK. In the same category, Category F, The improvements were not such as improved the defense of Guam but very little.

"Mr. KEEFE. Even with the improvements that were requested and contemplated, the island of Guam, in the opinion of the Joint Army and Navy Board, could not be successfully defended due to the power that Japan had in the mandated islands surrounding it; is that right?

"Admiral STARK. That is correct" (R. p. 6547).

These simple facts as disclosed to the public for the first time in these hearings should effectively dispose of the contention that "Congress refused to fortify the island of Guam, and hence the United States suffered tremendous loss in the initial stages of the war with Japan."

In the future the people and their Congress must know how close American diplomacy is moving to war so that they may check its advance if imprudent and support its position if sound. A diplomacy which relies upon the enemy's first overt act to insure effective popular support for the nation's final war decision is both outmoded and dangerous in the atomic age. To prevent any future Pearl Harbor more tragic and damaging than that of December 7, 1941, there must be constant close coordination between American public opinion and American diplomacy.

A Strong Delusion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN PHILLIPS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the San Diego Union of July 16, which has just come to my desk, expresses so clearly the situation which the country faces today, and the fallacy of the theory on which OPA was based, that I have asked leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix and to reprint the editorial as part of the extension.

We have been governed by a group of young, and probably sincere theorists, who knew nothing of the principles on which this Nation became so strong that it offered its people the highest standards of living in all the world; so strong that it could twice in our lifetimes step in and bail out of trouble other nations of the world, who had been experimenting with other theories. Some of these other theories are the ones the bright young men now seek to impose on the United States. St. Paul spoke of the "strong delusion." The strong delusion, right now, as the editorial points out, is that the Government can run everybody's business, and provide for everybody, better than the people can provide for themselves.

The complete editorial follows:

A STRONG DELUSION

It is recorded in the epistles of Paul that when a certain erring people proved immune to ordinary methods of correction the Almighty decided to "send them a strong delusion." Not so much as a matter of divine ordination, but merely as a matter of cause and effect, the people of the United States for more than a decade have been the victims of a "strong delusion." The substance of this delusion is that "the Government" can run everybody's business and provide for everybody better than the individuals themselves.

One of the strongest phases of our delusion was that concocted during the emergency of war, and perpetuated long after the war's end—the delusion that one individual, politically appointed by a political President, could run the business and industry of this country—the delusion that a mere official title and a vast operating fund could qualify a mediocrity, blest with presidential favor, to control wages and prices and profits for a national production volume approaching at its peak $200,000,000,000 a year.

By reason of its vast development the United States in industry and business has become largely a Nation of specialists. Because of the intricacies of mass production almost a lifetime of training and experience is required to master a single line of endeavor. Experts cannot be turned out overnight or qualified by a mere political appointment. In the hard world of dollars and cents results must count. Leaders in practically all our great financial, industrial, and business institutions have come up "the hard way."

How was the delusion ever put over on the American pepole that a publicity agent, without practical experience in producing a potato or a locomotive, could be endowed by Presidential edict with the capacity to run all the vast industries and businesses of the United States? The French had a ready excuse for everything: "C'est la guerre." That, for 5 years, was our excuse—it is the war. But the end of the war found the same old idea being propagated—at an expense of several hundred million dollars annually to the taxpayer; the idea that a single human brain, certified by the President, was better qualified to run all the business and industry of the country than the men who had built and maintained it—and that this same individual brain was qualified to act as guardian for all the millions of consumers in the United States.

Let's take a look from the practical side. There are scores of outstanding geniuses in the business and industrial world of the United States. In motors take the names of Henry Ford, Charles Wilson, Alfred Sloan. In steel take the names of scores of men who have made marvelous records. In textiles, in airplanes, in electrical production, in meat packing, in railroads, in farm machinery, in oil production, in banking, in construction, we think of a dozen outstanding names. In agriculture, in stock raising, in the development of fruits and vegetables, there are names that shine like lighthouses.

Does any sane person think for one minute that any one of the individuals who have achieved fame and success in any of these lines of enterprise would undertake, even with the sanction and support of the President of the United States, to run all the business and industry of the country? Does anybody assume that Henry Ford, having made a success in the motor industry, would assume responsibility for the steel industry and the raising of all the country's corn and hogs? Can anybody believe that Charles Wilson, successful head of General Motors, would undertake by Presidential appointment to regulate the growing of oranges and apricots in California? Is it conceivable that the most successful banker of Wall Street would consider himself qualified to control the raising of steers in Texas and sheep in Wyoming?

Yet for 5 years we have labored under the "strong delusion" that a publicity man, with no experience in business save that of advertising and propaganda, could run the vast enterprises of the United States, dictate their wages and their profits, and tell the consuming public what to pay for everything from a spool of thread to a threshing combine. A man who never slopped a pig must tell pig raisers what to pay for feed and what price to ask for the fattened product. A man who never sewed a button must tell textile men what to charge for a shirt. A man who never saw a saw mill must tell lumbermen what to charge for lumber.

There is peculiar significance in the fact that the man chosen for the dictatorship of American industry and business was essentially a publicity man; Chester Bowles' only business experience was in advertising. It is equally peculiar that his chosen successor was a publicity man—Paul R. Porter, whose chief claim to distinction was his job as press agent for the New Deal. The natural result of these selections was obvious—volumes of publicity and propaganda. The United States of America in all its history never saw such a flood of "selling copy" as it witnessed in the regime of Chester Bowles, master slogan maker, and his mediocre successor, Paul Porter, official press agent for the Democratic national committee. These masters of sales talk and catch-phrases have spent millions of dollars of taxpayers' money to terrorize the people; but instead of aiding and stimulating production, they have halted and curtailed it, with the inevitable result of inflation.

Out of all the scores of honest, decent, patriotic men in the business and industry of the United States today there is not one who would be so vain and self-sufficient as to assume arbitrary powers over all industry and business, all wages and prices, in this great Nation. The absent and most disinterested of them rightly would say that it is a job even beyond the capacities of a superman.

Yet we find ourselves, under the "strong delusion" of the New Deal, submitting supinely to the doctrine that one little publicity agent, dowered with executive prerogatives, is more capable of running the business of this country than the men who made it—and more intelligent than the millions of consumers who keep it going.

The Biblical end of the "strong delusion" is that the people shall perish. Are we ready to give up?

Representative Simpson Gets Try-Out as Delegation Boss

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEON H. GAVIN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article:

REPRESENTATIVE SIMPSON GETS TRY-OUT AS DELEGATION BOSS

(By Charles B. Holstein)

WASHINGTON.—A former University of Pittsburgh football player of the "Pop" Warner era is getting a try-out these days as captain-elect of Pennsylvania's Republicans in Congress.

Although outranked in length of service by two members of the present delegation and not slated to become chairman until next year, Representative RICHARD M. SIMPSON, 45, of Huntingdon, Pa., already is calling many of the signals for the group.

That is because Representative JAMES WOLFENDEN, of Upper Darby, the dean of the delegation, is ill in a Philadelphia hospital following a motorboat explosion, and Representative J. ROLAND KINZER, of Lancaster, the man next in line, wants SIMPSON to get some experience in the quarterbacking role now for next year.

Neither WOLFENDEN nor KINZER is running for reelection.

SIMPSON, the No. 3 man, on the other hand is considered virtually a sure thing to return for a sixth term from the largely rural and overwhelmingly Republican Seventeenth District, which includes Bedford, Fulton, Huntingdon, Juniata, Mifflin, Perry, Snyder, and Union Counties—a wide swath of central Pennsylvania.

A big-boned varsity tackle on Glenn L. "Pop" Warner's last two teams at Pitt, SIMPSON graduated from the university in 1923 following service in this country in the Tank Corps in the First World War. He spent two terms in the State legislature and was elected to Congress in May 1937 to fill a vacancy.

He's been here ever since, meanwhile earning a law degree from Georgetown University. Father of two young daughters, SIMPSON has been a widower since last year.

A conservative in his politics and economics, DICK SIMPSON appears to have the confidence and support of the whole delegation on all matters strictly of party concern, although not all of the State's GOP Congressmen go along with him on issues involving labor legislation, price control, tariffs, and similar problems.

SIMPSON seldom makes a speech on the House floor. When he does it is usually on technical phases of the very complex issues which come before him and other members of the No. 1 committee of the House—the Ways and Means Committee. These include such matters as taxes, tariffs, the social-security laws, and other revenue-raising measures.

In stepping somewhat to one side so that SIMPSON can build up experience in leading the delegation, KINZER, the 72-year-old acting chairman of the delegation, is convinced of two things:

1. That Pennsylvania's GOP Congressmen will be more numerous next year, possibly picking up 6 more seats from Democrats, compared to the present line-up of 19 Republicans and 14 Democrats;

2. That if this group works as a unit, they can make their influence one of the dominating voices in the House. He is counting, of course, on Republicans capturing the House next year after 14 lean years as the minority party.

SIMPSON'S colleagues say he's doing all right in his leadership try-out and shows promise of effecting a unified drive next year from Republican objective.

He took a leading part in arranging the get-acquainted conference of Pennsylvania's Republican congressional and State nominees here last month and spoke for the group in dealing with the press.

Since then, he has been more and more prominent in prevote conferences with Members in trying to line up the delegation, particularly for frontal attacks against the New Deal, as such, and against the bureaucrats—issues in which economics are secondary to party considerations.

SIMPSON is a firm believer in the frontal attack. Pop Warner's Pitt teams used to count heavily on sheer weight to push the opposition aside, and SIMPSON, who bore the brunt at tackle of many power plays, is all for increasing the weight of numbers on his team in Congress next year.

Pennsylvania's Democratic Congressmen, however, are conceding no losses so far.

Death Benefits Available for Widows, Orphans, and Dependents of Deceased Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERRETT P. SCRIVNER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 16, 1946

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, besides the men who are returned to civil life with broken bodies and shattered nerves, those who find the results of war with them long after the peace are the widows, orphans, and dependents whose loved ones have made the supreme sacrifice.

In recognition of its obligation to those dependents, a sympathetic Government has made some provision to help them carry on.

Where the death of the veteran has occurred in service, or has resulted from a service-connected disease or injury, the benefits are the same for the widows, orphans, and dependents of World War II as they are for the dependents surviving our veterans of World War No. I, and the following monthly pension benefits are payable:

(a) For a widow but no child	$50
(b) For a widow and 1 child (with $13 additional for each additional child)	65
(c) For no widow but 1 child	25
(d) For no widow but 2 children (with $10 additional for each additional child)	38
(e) For dependent father and mother:
Both parents, for each	25
One parent only	45

(Note.—Pension benefits are allowable to dependent parents only in those cases where the veteran's death is due to service in the armed forces.)

Where the veteran's death was not the result of a service-connected disease or injury, pension benefits are available to his widow or orphans, provided he served

90 days or more during the period of the war—World War I or World War II—or had been discharged for a disability incurred in service; and his discharge from service must be under conditions other than dishonorable. As to widows of veterans of World War I, marriage to the veteran must have been prior to December 14, 1944, and it is necessary only to establish legal widowhood to be eligible for pension benefits, subject to income restrictions. For widows of veterans of World War II there is no fixed marriage date, but to establish eligibility for pension benefits it is necessary that the veteran at the time of his death was receiving or entitled to receive benefits for disability incurred in service, or that he had at the time of his death a disability due to service for which pension would be payable if 10 percent or more in degree; and legal widowhood must be proved. The monthly pension benefits payable are the same for both groups, and, subject to income restrictions, are:

(a) For a widow but no child	$35
(b) For a widow and 1 child (with $5 additional for each additional child)	45
(c) No widow but 1 child	18
(d) No widow but 2 children (equally divided)	27
(e) No widow but 3 children (equally divided)	36
(With $4 additional for each additional child, the total amount to be equally divided.)

(NOTE.—Payments are limited to an aggregate of $74 in any one case.)

APPLICATIONS

Applications for these benefits should be sent to the regional office of the Veterans' Administration serving your county—Wichita for Allen, Anderson, Bourbon, Franklin, Linn, and Miami; Kansas City, Mo., for Douglas, Johnson, and Wyandotte.

Veterans' Administration form 534 is used by widows and orphans in filing claims, and form 535 is used by dependent parents.

SIX MONTHS' GRATUITY PAY

Immediately upon notification of the death of a person in service from wounds or disease, not the result of his or her misconduct, there is payable to his widow, child, or dependent relative a sum equivalent to 6 months' pay at the rate being received on the date of death. This benefit is available first to the widow, if no widow to a child or children, and if neither widow nor child, to any other dependent relative of the person in service previously designated by him or her to receive this pay.

Proper forms on which to make application will be sent to the person entitled from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, as the case may be, when the death of the person in service is officially recorded. Applications should be returned, with any evidence called for, to the office from which blanks were furnished.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS

Any amount found in the final settlement of his accounts to be due a person who has died in service, where no demand is presented by a duly appointed legal representative of the estate, is payable through the General Accounting Office, Washington, D. C., first to the widow (or widower); if no widow (or widower), to the child or children or their issue; if no widow (or widower) or descendants, to the father and mother in equal shares, or if one parent be deceased, to the survivor; if no widow (or widower), child, father, or mother, then to brothers and sisters and children of deceased brothers and sisters. Blanks will be sent from the respective services.

ASSISTANCE

Persons claiming these benefits may call on veterans' service organizations or the Red Cross for assistance in the preparation of applications and assembling needed evidence. If there are any further questions, write to your Congressman, ERRETT P. SCRIVNER, 316 House Office Building, Washington, D. C. He will also be glad to help in presenting claims to the proper agency of the Government.

Soviet Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLEN H. TAYLOR
OF IDAHO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, July 20 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "As Others See Us" written by Scott Nearing. The article deals with Soviet foreign policy.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AS OTHERS SEE US
(By Scott Nearing)

The people who are saying hard things about Soviet foreign policy would gain a better understanding of the situation if they would put the shoe on the other foot.

If the Soviet Union (1) possessed the secret of the atomic bomb and (2) were doing its best to keep it from us, meanwhile (3) building up a stockpile of the bombs, (4) maintaining an army larger than ever before in its history, and (5) a navy larger than all the other navies of the world combined, (6) proposing to continue the wartime draft, and (7) introduce universal compulsory military training in time of so-called peace, (8) allowing her army and navy officers to talk openly of attacking us before we should have time to recover from our war effort and perhaps learn to make our own atomic bombs, (9) carrying on a press and radio campaign to foment suspicion and hostility toward us, (10) seizing and holding military bases along both our frontiers (Iceland, Greenland, the islands of the Pacific), (11) sending a naval expedition into northern waters for special training in arctic warfare, (12) maintaining armed forces at our very gates (United States Marines, planes, and ships in Manchuria, United States troops and anti-Soviet armies in India, Germany, Italy, Greece), (13) proposing for 1947—2 years after the war—a military budget greater than that of any other country, with a higher percentage of expenditure for military purposes than was made by Germany or Japan when they were actively preparing for war, and if (14) the Greek Catholic Church were offering to lead a holy war against us, and if (15) Marshal Stalin officially sponsored a public ceremony at which a former prime minister who had twice tried to overthrow our Government and our economic system was highly honored and in his address urged an alliance between our two most powerful rivals—what would they think of Generalissimo Truman and Foreign Commissar Byrnes if they did not work night and day to see that the United States had friendly governments in every capital from Canada to Argentina and if they did not move heaven and earth to discover the secret of the atomic bomb?

Let us try to see ourselves as others see us—and this does not mean only the U. S. S. R.

Penalty for Drunken Drivers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Washington Post of July 20, 1946:

SEVENTY-EIGHT-MILES-PER-HOUR SPREE IN AUTO COSTS WOMAN $175

Sue L. Derman, 28-year-old former waitress, who drove along New York Avenue NE. July 4 at speeds up to 78 miles an hour, was fined $175 on three traffic counts in municipal court yesterday.

Miss Derman, of 1524 Varnum Street NW., had pleaded guilty to leaving after colliding, driving without a permit, and driving while drunk before Judge Walter J. Casey July 5.

Police charged that the automobile she was driving struck a taxi at First Street and New York Avenue and continued along New York Avenue without stopping.

She picked up two teen-age hitchhikers returning to Baltimore and then hit speeds up to 78 miles an hour, police said, until she clipped a fender off a car at Montana and New York Avenues.

Police said the car she was driving belonged to Reed Ledman and his mother, Mrs. Myrtle Ledman, of 1726 Thirty-fourth Street NW.

Mr. Speaker, the above article describes a condition in our country that should not be. "When you drive don't drink. When you drink don't drive." That is a slogan everyone should adhere to. Now it seems to me that when a person who admits they are drunk, driving on the highway at 78 miles an hour, hitting more than one car in their wild chase, should receive from a judge more than a fine of $175. When they take a car not belonging to them, when they have no driver's license, when they are drunk they then deserve more than a fine of $175. How can our judges break up this drunken driving with a fine? They subject all whom they meet on the road to danger of being hit by a drunken driver and being wounded or killed, property damaged, hospitals filled, the public menaced. Our judges must do more than fine these menacing drunken drivers by committing them to some place where they will not commit the deed soon again, even if it be to a Keeley Cure or the Alcoholics Anonymous. Judges do your duty.

Atomic Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PHILIP J. PHILBIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, utilization of atomic energy for promoting industrial development, advancing medical science, and improving economic and social standards may be of utmost importance to humanity. Untold benefits and improvements for the whole human race may well be hidden in the newly discovered force of nuclear physics. Behind this discovery lies years of painstaking scientific research by individuals in many countries. Undoubtedly the extreme exigencies of war, spurring to a desperate pace the practical application by the Army, by American industry, and its superior large-scale production methods of these new scientific principles, resulted in techniques of manufacture, handling, and use that presently constitute in the main the so-called secrets of atomic energy. From a strictly scientific standpoint there are no such secrets, because scientists of many countries are familiar with the principles involved and can, therefore, proceed along the same path of discovery and innovation which we did to the acquisition of complete information and knowledge of the so-called industrial know-how which will enable them ultimately, and perhaps in the not too distant future, to match our achievements in this field. Let us not delude ourselves that other nations are uninformed concerning atomic energy or the essential means of harnessing it.

The practical use of atomic energy has been confined almost entirely thus far to the creation of horribly destructive explosives employed exclusively in warfare for the destruction of property and fellow human beings. In this respect it is and will be a military weapon of greatest importance to the security and safety of our country. Up to this time atomic energy has been utilized only in warfare, though the potential value to mankind for good or evil would seem to be very great. If directed toward peaceful purposes—toward building instead of destroying, toward healing instead of killing—it may confer substantial benefits upon our own Nation and upon humanity.

It seems clear to me that research in and development of the atomic principle and the direction of atomic energy into industrial, medical, and other scientific and practical uses should proceed under civilian control and with as complete freedom for individual research scientists, scholars, and technologists as is consistent with the public welfare. On the other hand, in view of present very disturbing world conditions and the present status of our international relations and our failure to resolve many of the great questions upon which enduring peace depends, it is my conviction that we should not at this time establish any arrangement which by any stretch of the imagination might result in the giving away to other nations of the knowledge and techniques we possess concerning the atomic bomb and the materials out of which it is made. We must leave our armed forces unfettered in perfecting military use of the atom, even in hoping it may never have to be used in warfare again.

There is no need for undue haste in forcing through legislation relating to this subject. As a military necessity we must conserve the secret of the atomic bomb just as we protect any other military secret. In view of its tremendous destructive character, we should join as soon as possible with other nations—we should urge, work, and strive—to outlaw its use in warfare completely, just as we have outlawed poison gas and other inhumane instrumentalities. We should also follow the same course with regard to weapons possibly even more destructive than the atomic bomb, such as those existing and contemplated for bacteriological or biological warfare and guided missiles loaded with atomic and disease-carrying explosives, as well as all other inhuman media of destruction. It would be a great boon to the human race, it would be a great blessing to future generations of every nation, if we could outlaw by international agreements based on good faith and good will and sincere intentions of our associates in the United Nations all of these terrible death-dealing and most atrocious weapons, of which the atomic bomb appears at this time to be the outstanding.

But until the time comes, however, when, as a practical matter, we can accomplish this cherished end, I do not believe it would be wise to give away any of our atomic secrets, or even take a chance that they may fall into the hands of other nations. After all, we have just emerged from one horribly destructive world conflict and if we are sincere in our war aims, if we would strive to save modern civilization from annihilation, we must devote all our energies to preventing another. In the meantime, until universal international disarmament can be effected, until effective international institutions for preventing war can be perfected under the United Nations or by other available means, we must keep our own Nation protected against the possibility of attack and against the bleak eventuality of another war. This can best be done by maintaining a fully adequate national defense, an Army, Navy, and Air Force of sufficient strength, mobility, and modernity to secure our country against aggression and to fulfill our obligations toward world peace.

Let me repeat: There should be no undue haste or hysteria about this great question of atomic energy. Legislation should not be forced through this House in the closing days of the session when the calendar is crowded with so many important measures and when the membership is absorbed with so many other urgent matters. This question should receive the most careful deliberation so that our American civilian scientists may be protected in their right of unfettered research and American industry accorded fullest possible opportunity to develop this great discovery without sweeping totalitarian domination. There is no reason whatever why we should move to render our whole economy subject to the atom, or to bacteriology or to any other phenomenon of modern science any more than we should have rendered it subject to electricity, gunpowder, or many other revolutionary inventions and discoveries of the past.

We will have to live in a world of atomic energy, atomic power, and atomic explosives and the marvels of chemistry and physics and science. That is the stark and unavoidable reality, whether we like it or not. Americans have no more to fear from this great new force than nationals of any other nation, although we may have more to lose or more to gain depending on our attitude and policy toward its development. Americans have courage—at least as much courage as those of other nations, and Americans are not being thrown into panic over the atomic bomb. To the contrary, Americans have the courage to live with it and the will to try to shape the atomic principle to peaceful and constructive purposes rather than the destruction of man and his civilized institutions.

Our armed forces and our scientists can continue meanwhile—as they should—their research and work upon atomic energy and other related principles of modern science that may hold out great benefits. In order to accomplish these aims, it is not necessary for us to confer practically unlimited power upon a Government commission to reshape the social and economic order. Let us give further and most careful consideration to this whole subject. In that way we can keep atomic energy in its proper proportion to other scientific discoveries of past, present, and future and we can keep it in line with the concepts of freedom inherent in our form of government and economic organization.

Bullies of the Ballot Box—in McMinn County, Tenn., GI Ticket's Fight on Biggs-Cantrell Machine Comes Under Heading of Liberating Oppressed Peoples

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, as a part of these remarks, I include an editorial from the Knoxville Journal of July 18, 1946, as follows:

GI TICKET'S FIGHT ON BIGGS-CANTRELL MACHINE COMES UNDER HEADING OF LIBERATING OPPRESSED PEOPLES

McMinn Countians should not be pleaded with to support their GI county ticket in August simply on the grounds that the opposition to the Biggs-Cantrell organization is comprised entirely of ex-servicemen. As has been asserted here before, where all other things are equal certainly ex-servicemen should have preference in all things, but a man can't expect to be elected to any office when having served in the armed forces is his only qualification. One might further suggest that there is nothing more disgusting than to see an ex-serviceman who never heard a gun fired except by accident, wrap himself in the colors and attempt to capitalize on the uniform.

It occurs to any observer of the McMinn County situation, however, that it is particularly fitting for the opposition to Messrs. Biggs and Cantrell to be composed of GI's.

As Congressman JOHN JENNINGS so appropriately pointed out, we have just concluded a war—it is too early to determine whether we won it—which had as one of its announced purposes of liberation of peoples who had been deprived of their political freedom.

We all know, by now, that our efforts were a failure if this was what we were fighting for. In most cases, our victory at arms simply delivered oppressed populations from the tyranny of Hitler into that of Joe Stalin.

However, the ideal in this case was not injured by the practical failure to realize it. Fortunately for mankind, ideals survive human failures of all kinds. So even though we have failed in other parts of the world, there is no reason to not keep trying in our own country, where populations are under the yoke of political oppression. Such is the case in McMinn County, and the GI boys are actually continuing one of the purposes of the recent war in attempting to wrest control of the county from the Biggs-Cantrell organization.

It is perfectly clear that they can have no success in this attempt unless they get overwhelming support from the people of McMinn County, enough to offset the fraud, in the form of absentee balloting, that everybody knows is being planned in this election as it has been made a regular fixture of every other recent election in McMinn County.

There are two spots in Tennessee where political skullduggery will have to be eliminated before all the voters of Tennessee will regain their political freedom. One of these is Shelby County—this is the big one—and the other is in Polk, McMinn, Bradley, and Monroe where the Biggs organization continues in the saddle by a combination of force and election manipulation.

Confederate Celebration at Elmira, N. Y.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an explanatory statement of Fred P. Myers, commander in chief of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, concerning a celebration honoring Confederate veterans at Elmira, N. Y., and the remarks made by him on that occasion:

CONFEDERATE CELEBRATION AT ELMIRA, N. Y.

During the War Between the States, there was a Confederate prison camp at Elmira, N. Y., where 2,200 Confederate soldiers, prisoners of war died and are now buried. The cemetery is carefully maintained by the Federal Government. This celebration was the first Confederate celebration in history in the North sponsored by northern people, being under the auspices of the Kiwanians of Elmira, N. Y.

As commander in chief of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, I was invited to place a wreath at the Confederate monument in the cemetery, and to display the Confederate flag, which I gladly did.

It was a historic occasion, and a gracious gesture by the northern people, and a beautiful indication of the spirit of mutual good will in a reunited country. The master of ceremonies wrote me that the occasion has occasioned many expressions of appreciation of the good spirit of the occasion, and that much good has been done. It has been publicized in both North and South.

FRED P. MYERS.

REMARKS BY FRED P. MYERS, COMMANDER IN CHIEF OF SONS OF CONFEDERATE VETERANS, IN PLACING A WREATH AT THE MONUMENT IN THE CONFEDERATE CEMETERY AT ELMIRA, N. Y.

Upon this historic occasion, in this northern city, under the gracious auspices of northern friends, we, sons of the men who wore the blue and sons of the men who wore the gray, are met to do honor to the memory of the 2,200 Confederate soldiers now resting here in their eternal sleep. As commander in chief of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, I count it a high and solemn honor to place this wreath at this magnificent monument here in the midst of the graves of the comrades of our fathers.

On Sunday, June 2, at the Confederate Monument in the Arlington National Cemetery, according to custom, wreaths were placed at the direction of the President of the United States, by representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic, of the American Legion, and by many Confederate organizations. All this is a tribute to the greatness of America and the glory of Americanism; and our country should be a worthy example to a distracted world today, for we meet here as friends and in mutual respect as sons of men equally honest, who in their day honestly differed on vital issues; as sons of men of equal courage, who manfully contended in battle for the right as they understood it in the cause they had espoused; and in our day, as men of mutual good will we stand together as patriotic citizens of a country now happily reunited. Forgetting the inevitable bitterness of war, we each treasure sacred memories of our own, which together we cherish as a part of our common heritage. The blue and the gray have blended through the long perspective of the years; and we honor our great Nation in what we thus do on this memorable day.

Pie in the World Bank Sky

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting an article, under unanimous consent, written by Herbert Bratter, which article appeared in the Nation's Business of June 1946. Eventually the World Bank, financed largely by the taxpayers of the United States, will be one of the many international bureaucracies devoted to spending and lending the hard-earned money of our tax-burdened and tax-ridden citizens. The officials of this World Bank are certainly taking good care of themselves.

The article follows:

PIE IN THE WORLD BANK SKY

(By Herbert Bratter)

On the special train which carried from Washington to Savannah most of the delegates to the recent inaugural meeting of the governors of the World Bank and World Fund, secretariat officials handed out a list of those attending the meeting.

One foreign ambassador, on looking over the list, was quite disturbed to note that he was designated merely as "delegation official," whereas his counterpart from a neighboring republic was listed as "governor of the Fund and Bank."

The ambassador was from a part of the world where it is important that such an error be corrected promptly—and so it was.

The local and international kudos which comes from membership on the governing boards of the Bretton Woods Fund and Bank may be the chief compensation received by most individuals concerned. In some cases, however, the financial remuneration received is not unimportant.

At the Savannah meeting, salaries and expense money of the two new governmental institutions were fixed—and on a very ungovernmental scale.

Since these institutions have their headquarters in the United States, the precedents established may have far-reaching effects here.

When Congress passed the Bretton Woods program, which involved a $5,925,000,000 participation by the United States, it merely endorsed the agreement signed in New Hampshire in 1944. This agreement left it to the governors of the Fund and Bank to decide what they would pay themselves as salary and expense money, and to determine the functions of the top manager and the executive directors of the twin institutions.

FOR BIG PAY

Under the leadership and insistence of the United States delegates—notably Secretary of the Treasury Fred M. Vinson, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Harry D. White, and Assistant Secretary of State Will Clayton—the scale of salaries for top officials was fixed at a high level at Savannah.

For one of the top posts Mr. White, an author of the World Fund, had already been nominated and confirmed by the Senate; and for another of the top posts, Mr. Clayton's economist assistant, E. G. Collado.

When, before all the delegates at Savannah, Mr. White made his vigorous argument for a high scale of pay, he was, therefore, actually arguing for himself. Since he had the votes of the United States in his hand, Mr. White, of course, won out—and thereby advanced his own pay from $9,800 before taxes to $17,000 after taxes.

Government tax experts figure that Mr. White's new pay is as good as $25,000 before taxes.

The only salaries determined at Savannah were those of top operating officials. Annual salaries were set at net after taxes as follows:

General manager of the Fund	$30,000
President of the Bank	30,000
Executive director of the Fund (12; but 13 if U. S. S. R. joins)	17,000
Executive director of the Bank (12; but 13 if U. S. S. R. joins)	17,000
Alternate executive director of the Fund (12; but 13 if U. S. S. R. joins)	$11,500
Alternate executive director of the Bank (12; but 13 if U. S. S. R. joins)	11,500
Per diem for governors and alternate governors, in addition to their travel expenses	50

These are good jobs. The $30,000 salaries are apart from entertainment and similar expense money.

For a married man with two children in this country, $30,000 after taxes is the equivalent of about $60,000 before deductions; $17,000 after taxes is what you have left if you earn about $25,000 before taxes; and $11,500 net is in the United States as good as $14,000 in salary checks. But in those foreign countries where national income taxes are heavier than here, a man would have to earn before taxes much higher amounts.

The unniggardly $50 a day which the governors of the Fund and Bank have allowed themselves is seven times as much as the $7 a day which the United States allows its officials traveling abroad. Inside the United States the allowance is $6 a day.

The $50 per diem starts, of course, when the governor or alternate leaves his home and ends when he gets back. The delegate to a Fund or Bank meeting who comes to this country from Paraguay or South Africa, for example, will, therefore, run up quite a bill, excepting as his lodging may be provided by the transportation company. The directors and alternates are also allowed expenses for moving their families and furniture.

They get paid for missing connections, too. Some delegations to and from Savannah were held up waiting for the Atlantic weather to behave—at $50 a day. Several of the delegates, unavoidably delayed, were entitled to turn in expense bills equal to a substantial part of an ordinary Government official's annual pay.

NO PAY FOR OBSERVERS

Not all the visitors to the Savannah meeting got the $50 per diem. Five countries (among them, Russia), although Bretton Woods signatories, had not yet ratified the agreements, but were invited to send observers to Savannah. According to a press dispatch, when a correspondent asked a State Department official whether the observers would get expense money, the apocryphal un-Harvardian reply was:

"What the hell, they didn't kick in anything."

In at least one respect, the Fund and Bank are taking no avoidable chances with their dignified fellow officials. Their bylaws in each case require that "an individual putting forward a claim for reimbursement for any expenses incurred by him shall include therewith a representation that he has not received and will not claim reimbursement in respect to those expenses from any other source."

By the end of 1946, it is estimated, the Fund will have a staff of about 300, and the Bank about 200. Included in these figures are the approximately four dozen executive directors, their alternates, and the equal number of secretaries of each; and the economists, statisticians, accountants, clerks, and typists who go to make up a typical Washington organization. The scale of pay for these lesser employees will be higher than that for corresponding American civil servants, if the Savannah precept prevails.

In any case, tax exemption will apply to all of them. The British do not see any reason for such large and lush staffs. Also they opposed having the headquarters of Fund and Bank in Washington. But the American delegation at Savannah argued that in Washington the twin financial bodies would have the benefit of all the information more readily available there than elsewhere.

How good by American Government standards is a salary of $30,000 after taxes—the equal of $60,000 before taxes—may be seen by a few comparisons. The president of the World Bank and the general manager of the Fund are better paid than any American Government official except the President of the United States, whose salary is $75,000 before taxes.

Compared with the $30,000 after taxes ($60,000 before taxes), the Vice President of the United States receives only $15,000; the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, $20,500; and Cabinet members $15,000. All these salaries are subject to income tax.

The Governor of Maryland gets only $4,500 gross a year, plus an executive mansion and certain upkeep expenses. The Governor of Massachusetts gets $10,000. The highest paid State governor, New York State's chief executive, gets $25,000 and a home.

The new level of pay obtained by the Treasury's chief monetary economist, Harry White, when he took his hat and moved across the street into the Washington Hotel as executive director of the Fund, was equivalent to multiplying by about two and a half his peak United States Government salary. But an even greater income raise was that of E. G. "Pete" Collado, United States executive director of the World Bank, who gets $17,000 a year after taxes. In his last State Department position Mr. Collado, as an economic adviser, was paid $8,250 before taxes.

While, as Washington staffs go, the Fund and Bank are small institutions, the fact that they bring a high pay scale to the capital is regarded by some of the older bureaucrats as all to the good. One old Washingtonian with whom I discussed the matter observed:

"In this Government department in 1921, a division chief's top pay was $2,500. The new Secretary at that time decided this wouldn't do: that we should have to bring in good men from private business and pay division chiefs as much as $6,000. So this was done. The old people in the department didn't like to see outsiders come in and get these high-paying jobs, but I advised them to be patient. The more $6,000 jobs the better, I told them. Eventually this became the standard for all division chiefs.

"And during the recent war the same thing happened. The temporary agencies paid much higher salaries than we could. They drew employees away from us. Some of our remaining people were dissatisfied. But I advised them to have patience; and now, as you know, salaries all along the line are being raised, even for the stenographers. So I say, hurray for the Fund and the Bank."

THE ARGUMENT FOR HIGH PAY

In Treasury circles the pay scale adopted under United States sponsorship at Savannah is defended on the grounds that it is necessary to pay well to attract good men; that the salaries are commensurate with the importance of the work and comparable to those paid by other financial institutions; that the Latin Americans wanted the pay scale to be high; that Americans going to the Fund and Bank from the United States civil service are surrendering retirement benefits; and that the present scale of United States Government pay is no criterion, because it is notoriously low in the more responsible jobs and also because it is soon to be increased.

On the basis of Federal income-tax rates and the fact that the Bank and Fund will pay income taxes for the officers concerned, the Savannah meeting authorized for 50 top officials gross salaries totaling $956,000 a year plus travel expenses for all and entertainment expenses for two. This is before hiring a single economist, lawyer, or stenographer. Compare this figure with the $320,102 annual pay roll of the entire 95 persons who constitute the entire board and staff of the $3,500,000,000 Export-Import Bank, soon to be granted another $1,250,000,000 by Congress.

BRITISH ASKED LOWER SALARIES

Chief opposition to the high salary scale for executive directors came from the British delegation. Disclaiming any responsibility for the decision on a salary scale which equals or greatly exceeds the highest remuneration available in most countries for public service," the late Lord Keynes observed, "It is not uncommon to find that one mistaken decision leads to another," and he voiced his regret that the British had not foreseen at Bretton Woods some of the "wholly unexpected" developments at Savannah.

With pointed reference to Harry White and E. G. Collado, American executive directors and active participants in all the evolution of the Fund and Bank agreements perfected at Bretton Woods, the British lord added:

"I do not wish to deprive any man, especially old and respected friends, of their due and proper reward. But, in our view, so large a body of persons cannot properly be remunerated on the very high level proposed, which equals or greatly exceeds the highest remuneration available in most countries for public service. My country feels, therefore, that they cannot share in any way the responsibility of this decision."

SALARIES LOOK TOO HIGH

In Britain with the high tax rates now in force a married man with 2 children would need a gross salary of $400,000 to have $80,000 left after taxes; $30,000 gross to have $17,000 net, and $24,000 gross to have $11,500 net. The gross pay of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is $20,000. The Permanent Secretary of the Treasury has a gross salary of $14,000, and the Chairman of the Midland Bank, one of Britain's largest commercial banks, $40,000. In all Britain today there are only about 60 of His Majesty's subjects who have left after taxes more than $24,000 a year.

If the Savannah salaries look scandalously high in Britain, how must they appear elsewhere?

Czechoslovakia's executive director of the Fund with $17,000 after taxes is a tycoon as compared with government officials in Prague. There the highest paid cabinet officer, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, must pay heavy income taxes on his annual $5,600, a figure which includes all representation allowances.

An idea of what a director's salary of $17,000 after taxes means in Latin America may be had by comparing this with the pay of the chief executive in various Latin-American countries. The following figures are before taxes and do not include extra allowances of the office.

President's salary (converted into United States dollars)

Country:
Argentina	$23,358
Venezuela	18,806
Ecuador	6,838
El Salvador	5,280
Peru	4,610

But then, why talk of mere thousands of dollars when there are billions waiting to be dispensed?

Government by Pressure

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. LEROY JOHNSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me today, I am enclosing herewith a statement appearing in the Sacramento Union on July 10. It was written by Charles J. Lilley, the editor of the paper, and points out very convincingly that government by pressure is and will not result in the best kind of legislation for the public.

California has a system whereby the candidate may file for the nomination of more than one party. In order to file on a party other than the one in which he is registered, he must obtain the sponsorship of a certain number of members of the other party. The theory is that if Democratic voters at the primary decide that they are willing to endorse and accept as their candidate Mr. JOHNSON, who happens to be a Republican, that they should be permitted to do so. A primary is the party expression of its members as to who they would like as their candidate for any particular office. I think it is appropriate to say that if one receives the nomination of both parties he does have a feeling of serving all the people more definitely than if he were not sponsored by the other party as well as his own.

Mr. Lilley formerly was a writer for one of the press associations and covered Congress for a number of years. He knows what he is talking about. He understands how proposed legislation is finally crystallized into law. He knows that balanced judgments and sincere efforts by Members of Congress to arrive at the correct solution of public questions are not helped by rabid partisans and strong pressure groups who frequently have selfish interests to serve. The great mass of people are really nonpartisan in their views. What they want expressed is a policy that will be for the welfare of all the people and not a biased political or partisan viewpoint placed in the law. Also, on many of the issues that are presented to Members of Congress for their action, the people have never had a chance to express themselves. In many instances they have not had a chance to study the matter. In the nature of things they must have confidence in the integrity, the intelligence, the courage, and the vision of their representatives. Honest service on the part of a Congressman where he expresses his convictions on the basis of his study and understanding of the principles involved is usually approved by the constituents. Frequently, Congressmen differ with the views of some constituents. However, in our State our people are tolerant and if they understand that the conviction was formulated after study and consideration and is the conscientious conviction of the Congressman they accept his judgment. Letters from people who understand the problem and state their reasons are very helpful and welcomed by a Congressman. But mere pressure that one vote one way or another without giving any reasons therefor are not really helpful. I commend to the reading of my colleagues the statement by Mr. Lilley:

Pressuring those in public office by threats of vote reprisals or by deluging them with telegrams, letters, or resolutions from hastily formed organizations bearing imposing titles isn't going to settle any major national controversy on a fair and impartial basis satisfactory to the American people. If one side starts such tactics, then the other side will copy them. The great mass of the people themselves, who don't take part in such controversies, remain silent so that only the minorities are speaking.

When editorial writers and radio commentators exhort the public to get in touch immediately with their Congressmen and tell them just what to do between now and November, or else, they are asking the people to demand that these officials not exercise sound judgment in the settlement of a national emergency but to act in a certain way for fear of being defeated when seeking reelection. Public officeholders who can be influenced by such tactics will never provide sound government, or good government. They will be ruled by fear and will favor the side which makes the loudest noise.

The California system whereby Congressmen can cross-file and be elected in a primary is being widely denounced by those who want to influence the votes of those representing the State's congressional districts. But it is fortunate in the OPA crisis that many of the California Congressmen, including LEROY JOHNSON, of the Third, or Sacramento, District, have already been elected in the primary and therefore can decide how to vote according to their own best judgment instead of the way the CIO, Walter Winchell, or someone else tries to tell them how to ballot.

Californians have shown in their balloting this year that they want men in public office who inspire confidence, who have the courage of their convictions, and who will not be swayed by radical elements or give in to pressure groups. They showed this by reelecting Governor Warren in the primary in the most amazing election showing ever made by a chief executive of this State. If a public official has to be threatened, to be kicked around, and to be pressured into doing the right thing he has no place in public office. Sacramentans try to elect officials in whom they can have confidence, and they back them up against the efforts of pressure groups to run them out of office. Californians follow this same policy. Good men should be kept in public office and be supported to the limit. The bad ones should be thrown out before they contaminate the others.

Sacramento, like other cities, seems to have some residents who are able to build more than moderate-priced houses despite the priorities placed on all residential construction to assist the World War II veterans to get homes. They are few, however. Mostly the citizens who stayed at home, like the commercial and industrial enterprises, are holding off all but the most essential improvements in order that those who did the fighting can get the first residences that are built and can get suitable quarters for themselves. A happy home cannot be erected by depriving a serviceman of what he rightfully deserves for the part he played in saving his country. If those who use political influence, or other methods, to get priorities they do not deserve only could hear what their neighbors say about them they might be less eager to be the first to get new homes.

Communism Threatens America—The Infiltration Reaches Vermont

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DEWEY SHORT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago Tom Clark, Attorney General of the United States, in addressing the Chicago Bar Association, spoke as follows:

One of the greatest dangers, in my opinion, to civil liberties of our fellow citizens, and one which should be taken literally by all the members of our profession, is the method of communism to shackle democracy by indirection.

Declaring that "no one but a complete crackpot can be deluded by what we see going on today," Mr. Clark said:

We know that there is a national and international conspiracy to divide our people, to discredit our institutions, and to bring about disrespect for our Government.

Why should we blind ourselves to obvious facts?

He spoke more truly than he realized and more correctly than most of us appreciate. A glaring example of the extent to which the Communists will go is found in the primary campaign in Vermont. In Vermont, of all States, think of it. This is the way they do it: They cannot run a Communist ticket in Vermont, but some weeks preliminary to the date on which candidates must file their petitions in order to get their names on the primary ballot a group of Communists met at Barre, Vt. One of their organizers heartily endorsed and urged all Communists to support a college professor who had announced that he was going to run against Representative PLUMLEY. The Suburban List, a farm journal, commented upon what happened, saying:

There was a recent meeting of the Communists in Barre and a representative of the Communist organization, in addressing the meeting, urged them to support Andrew E. Nuquist for Member of Congress. It is very evident that the Communists would not be urged to support Nuquist unless they knew what they might expect from him were he nominated and elected. From this fact there can hardly be any stronger argument given for support to CHARLES A. PLUMLEY for Congress.

The Evening Caledonian, of St. Johnsbury, Vt., had this in part to say about the Vermont situation:

Andrew E. Nuquist, assistant professor of political economy at the University of Vermont, is a newcomer to the political scene who emerged from cloistered halls to engage in a primary contest with Representative CHARLES A. PLUMLEY for the Republican nomination for Member of Congress from Vermont.

Imbued with ideas far to the left of the usual Vermont conservatism, the professor serves as a stalking horse for the CIO-PAC which is out to defeat Congressman PLUMLEY because of his support of the Case bill containing restrictions upon labor and in opposition to the Congressman's conviction that responsibilities must be placed upon labor to prevent the growth of a group so powerful that it can rise above the fundamental law of the land.

PLUMLEY'S host of friends and supporters will take care of the CIO-PAC combination at the polls. But a more serious political indictment than acceptance of CIO-PAC support may be lodged against PLUMLEY'S professor-opponent from Burlington unless the latter repudiates Communist support asserted by the Burlington Suburban List to have been recently tendered him at a meeting of the Reds in Barre.

Probably no one would accuse Professor Nuquist of being a Communist, but he must know that Vermont does not permit the Communist Party to have a place on the ballot; that Vermonters are anti-Communist, and that a candidate accepting such support is foredoomed to failure in any political contest.

Indeed, the spectacle of a representative of a Barre Communist organizer urging support of Nuquist, a candidate on the Republican ticket, as reported by the Suburban List, is a strange one for Vermonters, creating a situation calling for prompt repudiation by the candidate so endorsed and for his personal disavowal of all communistic leanings.

There is one way of keeping Vermont clean from the inroads of a politically insidious growth within the body politic, and that is by such an expression of confidence in Congressman CHARLES A. PLUMLEY at the August primary as to overwhelmingly defeat a candidate who is the recipient of Communist endorsement in any form and fails to disavow such support.

Such will be the result, we confidently anticipate, of the Vermont primary in August.

The editor of the Caledonian overlooks the fact that when the professor failed to repudiate the Communists before he had his name placed on the ticket, he acquiesced in the endorsement, and he cannot now disavow the fact that he is a Communist-endorsed candidate.

Obviously, the Communists would not endorse him unless they were ready to vote for him. He cannot deny nor repudiate their endorsement at this late day. He must suit them or they would not want him.

That is where the Communist infiltration comes in. They are subtle and clever boys who work adroitly to achieve their ends, but they are not smart enough to fool a Vermont Yankee.

The professor may repudiate and disavow till the end of time, yet he is their candidate, and the fact remains that he took no steps to repudiate their support or to avoid such a situation, prior to having his name put on the Republican ticket. There is the rub: Sailing under false colors. Vermonters will not be misled, nor should any of us be fooled by what is going on all over the country. This Vermont case is only one of many of the same type. The CIO-PAC are trying to defeat me and most of my colleagues in Missouri. They are against all good Americans.

It is a most outstanding corroboration and confirmation of the statement made by Attorney General Tom Clark that no one but a crackpot can be deluded by what we see going on today.

No postprandial denials or deathbed confessions that he is not a Communist can alter the fact that the Communists were urged to vote for him. That is the infiltration Tom Clark was talking about. The Communists adopted him for reasons which were obviously good so far as they were concerned. No amount of disavowal alters the fact he suited them.

Mr. Speaker, it is bad enough when the parlor pinks, the wild-eyed radicals, and fellow travelers in our large and highly industrialized centers join corrupt city political machines to perpetuate the New Deal indefinitely in power, but when these Bolsheviks invade rock-ribbed Republican sections of our country like my district and the State of Vermont, to undermine the faith of a pioneer and self-reliant people and to weaken their faith in our American traditions, then the citadel of our freedom and the palladium of our liberty are shaken to their very foundations, and representative, constitutional government is placed in grave danger.

It is all right for any person to have his head in the clouds as long as he keeps his feet on the ground.

Those of us who have known intimately and worked closely with the gentleman from Vermont, CHARLIE PLUMLEY, for many years know that he is a man of balance, with glowing ideals and with much hard, practical sense. Never before in our history has the Congress and the country more needed men of his character and courage, his outstanding ability, and long experience to help bring about a just and lasting peace and to preserve this great Republic—the last best hope of earth.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to include a newspaper article in my remarks, I submit the following reprint from Rockwood Publications, issue of July 4, 1946.

This article is a classic which I am sure every Member of Congress will greatly enjoy. not only because of its truth but also because of its keen political insight and rare literary style. I wish every American could read it:

THE MAN WHO CAME TO VERMONT

All during the Rooseveltian dominance Vermonters, traveling in other States, were subjected by friends and acquaintances to a considerable amount of good-natured "ribbing"—referred to as residing outside the Union; gazed on as if one were surveying a museum piece and squinted at with the look employed when evaluating an ancient wine of rare vintage; for to the casual, superficial, surface-gazers, the typical Vermonter is a product of isolated provincialism, clannish in his affinities and still harboring, in his thought life, the norms and concepts of the Victorian era.

Such evaluations are as unsympathetic as they are incorrect. We are not a priggish people, warped by tradition, narrowed by the limitations of our geographic boundary, blind to the import of trends and movements outside our domain and too void of intellect to be receptive to new ideas and progressive advancements; we are not a people set apart, different and peculiar, content in our egotism and hostile to any who proclaim ideas and represent theories contrary to our fostered principles and conservative concepts in political and economic philosophy. We welcome the stranger in our midst and are eager to show true New England hospitality to visitors and guests as well as those who, from other States and countries, have come to Vermont to establish their abodes; but from these emigrants we rightfully expect a display of the cultural amenities—not an uncritical acceptance of our standards, of our institutions; of our mores and folkways, but at least a patient study of these factors before a newcomer launches upon any missionary crusade or evangelistic campaign in the interests of upsetting our domestic domain and substituting, in lieu thereof, some mode of life and existence which we have dismissed as undesirable, as incapable of contributing to our happiness and welfare.

We do not like to be placed in the family position so brilliantly portrayed by Kaufman and Hart in their delightful comedy, "The Man Who Came to Dinner," and wherein the owners and residents of the house are relegated to the "third floor back" while their guest takes complete possession, dogmatically ruling in his own interests and with the zeal and aggressiveness of a New Deal bureaucrat. We think this analogy pertinent when it comes to our relationship with a certain associate professor of political science, resplendent with degrees from the left-wing-dominated University of Wisconsin and who, before he has even had an opportunity to disinterestedly survey and evaluate our political institutions and practices, proceeds publicly to uphold his preconceived notions and ideas as affecting the State and its people and to advance himself as a suitable candidate to replace a trusted and esteemed Congressman who, over a period of many years, has conscientiously and with amazing fidelity represented, in our Federal Government, the people of this State.

The professor advises us in his releases that we need young blood in Washington and from Vermont—somebody who will make a lot of oratorical noise in the Halls of Congress; a man of action, presumably, we infer, a sort of "super-go-getter," bloated with academic theories and more concerned in promoting a crusade to exploit socialistic causes than in quietly, honestly representaing the present will and desire of the majority—a policy and procedure which has been faithfully and loyally followed by CHARLES A. PLUMLEY, our present incumbent.

By one who is in a position to interpret Vermont public opinion, it can be said of Mr. PLUMLEY that rarely, if ever, has he failed in this cardinal function of a Congressman. Invariably, the position which he has taken, as effecting legislative matters, has been the opinion as maintained by a substantial majority of his constituents. We like this practice; we like too, the quiet backstage self-effacing committee work to which, throughout his tenure in office, Mr. PLUMLEY has so conscientiously contributed of his time, his experience, his sound, practical judgment—a vital function in our national legislative system and one the import of which any associate professor of political science must be fully aware.

We welcome this university instructor to our State, but find no justification for taking seriously his blitzkrieg offensive for political preferment. Our interest, therefore, must remain purely intellectual, for we know the people of our State too intimately and thoroughly to entertain any notion that they will dismiss a friend of long standing, an able and conscientious Representative in order to confer honor upon an academic product of one of our most radical institutions and, according to undenied reports, a man whose candidacy has been given the organized political endorsement of Vermont Communists.

In our judgment, Congressman PLUMLEY is the true liberal, for while realizing that our representative form of democracy is not the last word in governmental systems and that changes are and will continue to be effected, he is too conservative to chase rainbow utopias and too erudite, in the revelations of history, to pursue down a dead-end street the cloistered dreams of discredited totalitarian theories.

What, do we ask, has this contender to offer? New political wares and appurtenances which will materially benefit the welfare of our democratic processes? Apparently not; apparently (basing our judgment upon information which has come to our desk) this youthful professor in the science of politics would foist upon us theories in socialism which were ancient in the days of Plato and Aristotle and which were in an advanced state of decomposition back in the period of Rousseau, of de Tocqueville, of Bryce, and Emerson—mildewed debris of intellectual fancy long since dismissed as worthless by intelligent Vermonters.

Yes, Professor; we welcome you to Vermont. Take off your wraps, make yourself at home; but do not try to kick us out in the back shed, to take over our property, to manage our affairs—at least not until we have become better acquainted; until you really know us for what we are, for there are many in Vermont who are as brilliant as you, who were educated at institutions as advanced as Wisconsin and who have found, after settling in Vermont, that there was a lot of home work in creative thinking to be done before they were in a position to write the last chapter to a truly masterful, constructive doctor of philosophy thesis.

Bullies of the Ballot Box

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, as a part of these remarks, I include an editorial from the Daily Maryville Times, Maryville, Tenn., from the pen of its editor, the Honorable Clyde Emert.

What every well-informed person in Tennessee knows, the Department of Justice in Washington, D. C., is deemed to know. The people of McMinn County and the people of this country who believe in protecting the sacred right of the citizens of this country, and especially of the returned soldiers, sailors, and marines of this country, to vote and have their votes counted as cast, have the right to expect and do expect the Federal Department of Justice to protect the right of the citizens of McMinn County to vote without having to exercise the right under the guns of machine deputy sheriffs, policemen, and the armed satellites of the Cantrell machine.

The editorial follows:

JENNINGS FIGHTS M'MINN COUNTY MACHINE

Congressman JENNINGS' castigation in the House of Representatives of the Biggs-Cantrell machine in McMinn County should win the hearty approval of every liberty loving citizen. The people of that county have been under the heels of political tyrants who are as ruthless as was Hitler. Citizens have been afraid to go to the polls on election day knowing that gunplay is a common occurrence in that county. The GI's are determined to break up the machine. It is to be hoped further bloodshed may be avoided. It would seem that if there is any law by which the Governor can give those boys protection against gun toters and blackjack wielders, he should do it.

Little Hitlers have been developing in various parts of the country. They do not work for the common good. They work for selfish interests. The sooner the country is rid of their influence, the sooner we shall return to a democratic form of government.

Congressman JENNINGS, who has had experience with the Biggs-Cantrell machine, and whose single-handed fight got them in such close quarters that they took McMinn County out of the Second Congressional District, made one statement in the Congress that should challenge the attention of every citizen of Blount and all other counties living in this judicial district. He said concerning the conduct of the 1944 elections in McMinn County now in the hands of the Department of Justice that "If any prosecutions result they must be in Federal court. None can be had in McMinn County. All the machinery for the enforcement of the law in McMinn County is absolutely under the control of the machine."

When a Member of the Congress writes into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the charge that the courts of McMinn County (which is in the same judicial circuit as Blount County) are absolutely under the control of the machine it is high time that the voters throughout the circuit begin girding themselves to rid the circuit of those directing the machinery for the enforcement of the law.

The GI's of McMinn County seem to feel they are waging a war for freedom in their home county which is just as important as the war they went to Europe to win. And why try to establish liberty in Europe if they do not have it in their own back yards?

Bullies of the Ballot Box — Shall the Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines From McMinn County, Tenn., Come Home From the Battlefield To Be Butchered at the Ballot Box?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, I include as a part of my remarks an editorial on the forthcoming election in McMinn County, Tenn., appearing in the Knoxville News-Sentinel of July 16.

The statement in this editorial that carrying guns is not the way to get reform is timely. The GI candidates and their supporters in overwhelming numbers should attend the polls unarmed.

"Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just; and he but naked, though locked up in steel, whose conscience with injustice is corrupted."

And—with reference to the concluding statement of the editorial: "On the other hand, the machine boss in McMinn himself is running for sheriff. That, too, looks menacing. A political boss-sheriff always has for deputies his political henchmen. They can carry guns—legally."

In this statement the editorial is only partially correct. The fact that a man is a deputy sheriff, of itself, does not authorize him to carry a gun. He can carry a gun legally only when he is, in good faith, engaged in the execution of criminal process. A deputy sheriff, or a policeman, has no more legal right to carry a pistol or blackjack while serving as an election official than a robber or a burglar has to be armed in the perpetration of a robbery or a burglary.

The editorial follows:

M'MINN BEARS WATCHING

Neighboring McMinn County, scene of bitter political strife over many years, has some new elements in this year's campaign, which is now at a seething stage. An all-GI ticket has been formed which is bucking the Cantrell machine and the results will be interesting, indeed.

We are aware that picking candidates or taking sides in somebody's election from the outside is a ticklish pastime. But certain things stand out that certainly carry a warning to citizens in any county as to how machine control can be a handicap not easily shaken off.

Our staff correspondent, Willard Yarbrough, gave the background of the McMinn political scene in a series of News-Sentinel articles last week.

The set-up for the Democratic machine that has dominated McMinn for some years grew out of a series of local legislative bills that ousted the elected county court, named a majority of its own henchmen instead, and redistricted the county. That this can be done stresses the need for home rule privileges by constitutional amendment in Tennessee.

The Cantrell-machine men defend the fee system that prevails in McMinn, whereas experience has shown that it is vicious.

The machine controls the election commission. Past occurrences in McMinn have shown that always results in trouble when the ballots are counted.

Blood has already been drawn in the current campaign fued. A shooting occurred and a man was wounded, but nobody was even arrested.

The GI ticket has some needed reforms in its program and some brave candidates out to buck the machine and oust it from control if possible. We admire their spunk. It shows a spirit that is needed in many counties where machines are in control.

But we cannot but view with alarm the expressed hint that the GI's will not hesitate to use guns on election day if things go awry. That is never the way to get reform. True reform can come only by orderly processes.

On the other hand, the machine boss in McMinn himself is running for sheriff. That, too, looks menacing. A political boss-sheriff always has for deputies his political henchmen. They can carry guns—legally.

The Washington Evening Star Takes Up the Cudgels of Those Striving To Keep Un-American Influences Out of Public Office

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL E. MUNDT
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me by the House, I am calling attention at this time to an important editorial appearing in last night's edition of the Washington Evening Star. Under the title "Keep the Gates Shut," the Star's editorial supports with vigor the proposal I made on the House floor last Thursday recommending that immediate steps be taken to restore the badly scuttled pre-employment investigative services of the Civil Service Commission and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. Speaker, may I call attention to the fact that in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Thursday, July 18, beginning on page 9389, there appears my full report on the startling and dangerous conditions which have stemmed from an unwise and almost unnoticed maneuver on the part of President Truman's Budget Bureau. I recommend that Members read that report and that editors, public-spirited citizens, radio commentators, veterans' organizations, patriotic bodies, and good Americans everywhere now join in our efforts to correct this deplorable situation before Congress takes any adjournment for the summer.

The gates of Federal employment have been left open to political racketeers, communistic agents, foreign saboteurs, reds, pinks, punks, and political pustules of every degree and design. Almost no safeguards have been left by this injudicious and inexcusable action of the Budget Bureau whereby Fascists, Communists, and just ordinary plain run-of-the-mill political crackpots can be detected before receiving Federal employment and thus deterred from practicing their sabotage of our American system from within the walls of our citadel of Government. It is a matter which requires our immediate attention.

The fact that the War Department just this week had to discharge five civil-service employees at the Aberdeen, Md., proving ground because of their communistic activity merely serves to dramatize the urgency of this situation.

Mr. Speaker, the editorial from the Washington Evening Star follows:

KEEP THE GATES SHUT

It is ironic that disclosures regarding alleged subversive activities at the Army's Aberdeen proving grounds should come almost simultaneously with the virtual abandonment by the Civil Service Commission of its procedure for fingerprinting and investigating applicants for Federal employment. The investigations which led to dismissal of five employees at the closely guarded Aberdeen ordnance plant took place prior to collapse of the investigative system because of lack of funds. Representative MUNDT, of South Dakota, did not exaggerate the situation when he described as "foolhardy and dangerous" this relaxation of vigilance. The Aberdeen case serves to emphasize the need for continued alertness.

It is true, as Mr. MUNDT told the House, that this serious matter had "all but escaped public notice"—until The Star called attention to it in its news and editorial columns last Sunday. But it cannot be said with equal verity that Congress was not informed about the dilemma facing the Commission as a result of budget cuts, nor can Congress in all fairness, pass the buck completely to the Budget Bureau. Both Civil Service Commissioner Flemming and Director J. Edgar Hoover of the Federal Bureau of Investigation testified at appropriation hearings regarding the hazards of investigative relaxation, but Congress failed to heed the warnings.

As a result of this apathetic attitude, Congress approved the absurdly small sum of $78,624 for civil service "loyalty" investigations in the 1947 fiscal year, as compared with an appropriation of $2,246,498 last year. This means that the Commission must discontinue fingerprinting altogether and that it will have facilities for checking on the character and loyalty of about 1 out of every 500 applicants. If there is any real investigating to be done, it will have to be done by the various departments, and few have funds or equipment to do the job.

It is not too late to insure closing of the gates against criminals and subversive agitators who may seek to enter the Government service for ulterior purposes. Congress cannot afford longer to turn its back on the warnings of those in a position to know the perils of taking down the barriers. This is an emergency justifying introduction and prompt passage of a special deficiency appropriation before Congress adjourns for the summer.

The Price Holiday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial, which appeared in the New York Times on July 5, 1946:

THE PRICE HOLIDAY

Mr. Truman's veto of the price control extension bill was the logical outcome of the all-or-nothing policy followed by OPA officials and the administration. The bill would have kept rent control intact. Under it no increases in any commodity prices would have been required for 30 days. No increases under the Taft amendment would have been required for at least 60 days. The President could have signed the bill, even if his objections had been warranted, but told Congress that he regarded it as at best a stopgap measure, and called for the prompt passage of a better one. Instead, Mr. Truman, at the same time as he spoke of "the great calamity which will befall this country if price and rent control end at midnight Sunday," announced the veto which brought this calamity about. In the attempt to force Congress into giving him everything, the President has got, so far, nothing.

The need of the moment is to end the present uncertainty without delay. As Congress almost unanimously favors the resumption of rent control, the quickest way to end the most important uncertainty is to pass immediately a simple separate resolution extending rent control for a year, and then to deal with the much more controversial and difficult problems of general price control. But the President's lieutenants in Congress, faithful to the administration's previous strategy, refuse to do this. This refusal is based on the fear that if they permitted Congress to restore rent control separately they might not be able to get from it all the price control they want. Once again they are gambling with an all-or-nothing policy, or something very close to it. And once again the gamble may be lost.

Meanwhile, neither these leaders nor the administration seem to recognize how profoundly the situation has been changed—psychologically, legally, and economically—by the lapse that has been allowed to occur in price control. What we have today is not a free market but a bewildered one. No one knows whether or when controls will be reimposed, nor at what level, nor under what conditions. Legitimate industrial and trade buying is being paralyzed by fear of a later price roll-back. No processor, manufacturer, wholesaler, or retailer knows whether, if he pays higher prices, now legal, in order to continue employment and production, he will be allowed to pass on the increase later, or whether he will be penalized by being forced to take a loss under restoration of old ceilings. No one knows whether price contracts entered into now will in a few days or weeks be recognized as legal. Businessmen may be assured that a retroactive price law would be unconstitutional, but they may not know how this will be interpreted in their particular case, and it may be little satisfaction to them to know that they will be entitled to expensive and long-drawn-out litigation.

The lapse of price control alters the situation in many other ways. It has meant a stop in subsidies. It has carried consumers and buyers over the first psychologic shock of paying some higher prices. In a few lines a flood of supplies, in spite of uncertainties regarding price-control resumption, has started at the producers' end of the pipe line. The most important function that might have been achieved by the price-control extension bill vetoed by the President was to taper off price controls in an orderly manner. But it may come to seem foolish to reimpose price controls in order to taper them off. This would be equivalent to throwing the consuming public into the water, then fishing it out and telling it to wade in cautiously. If price control is reimposed now, as it nears the termination point again, supplies will once more dwindle as producers and sellers await the time when they will be removed. Will the country want to go through this inevitable transition trickle all over again?

Last night the Senate Banking Committee approved a new 1-year price-control bill for which Senator Barkley predicted Presidential approval. Delays and amendments are probable, however. Meantime Congress and the Administration might do well to consider whether the time for over-all price control has not passed, and whether the time for selective price control has not arrived. This would imply that there should be no wholesale reimposition of ceilings under the old blanket formula. Instead of ceilings being removed only by specific exemption, they could be reimposed only on selected commodities which would have to be specifically and separately named. These could include only major items in the cost of living and only items that were in severely short supply. The power would be retained to ration these. In fact, the question might be raised whether it was desirable to put price ceilings on items that did not have to be rationed.

Meanwhile, regardless of what program is considered, there could well be considerably less hysteria regarding the price rises that are already alleged to have taken place. Some of these price rises represent no more than the removal of subsidies. Others merely translate former black-market prices into legally recognized prices. There is good reason to think, for example, in spite of the rise in official price indexes (which systematically refused to recognize anything but OPA ceilings) that in important lines like meat real average prices paid may have declined.

Senator Arthur Vandenberg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 17, 1946

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the following editorial accurately reflects the sentiments of the people of Connecticut in regard to Senator VANDENBERG and the efforts he has made to maintain respect for the American principle of justice as opposed to despotism:

EPILOG TO A CONFERENCE

ARTHUR VANDENBERG continues to grow in stature. His report to the Senate on the meeting of foreign ministers was a fine exhibition of statesmanship. Read in conjunction with the address delivered by Secretary Byrnes the day before, it completes the picture of the accomplishments and the failures of the Paris Conference, and it represents one further step in the development of our foreign policy.

The calling of the peace conference for July 29 was the principal achievement recorded by Mr. VANDENBERG. Twenty-one nations will participate in its deliberations, and thereafter "the last word again reverts to the Four Great Powers." The question has been raised whether it is not in a high degree futile to call a peace conference composed of delegates who for the most part merely the right to recommend. Mr. VANDENBERG furnishes the arresting answer that even though the conference will have no power to decide, "the conscience of the Allied world will have spoken * * * and it speaks with superlative authority."

The need of carrying on negotiations in a spirit of give-and-take is emphasized by the senior Senator from Michigan. He reminds us that before he went abroad, he stated that "we could compromise within principles, but that the dignity and honor of the United States of America and the world's hope of peace with justice cculd no longer compromise with principles themselves, as was too often done under pressure of war exigency upon too many previous occasions." He feels that the American delegation at Paris did not compromise with principle on this occasion. This is a heartening note, for it suggests that improvisation and expediency which have so often betrayed us in the past have been dismissed as poor guides in the formulation of foreign policy.

While Senator VANDENBERG is in no sense a pessimist or a defeatist, he discloses with the utmost candor the enormous obstacles stil remaining in the way of peace. "The lesser treaties, while indispensable in a preliminary way, are on the perimeter of the problem. Germany and Austria are at the core. * * * Here the differences were not only acute, they were often acrimonious," and in this area no progress toward reaching common ground was made.

He reports a remark made at Paris to the effect that if negotiations had been confined to America, France, and Britain, total agreement including plans for the German and Austrian treaties could have been achieved within 10 days. At every turn the attitude of the Soviet Union prevented this. "Eastern communism and western democracy are the forces which confront each other in planning for a new and better world. They differ in ideas, ideals and ideologies. For example, they certainly could not agree upon a definition of "democracy," although this is the objective to which both profess to subscribe."

Among three factors described by Mr. VANDENBERG as essential to world peace, he lists first "the dependable and effective operation of the United Nations in behalf of justice courageously sustained by collective security." Here he touches upon the heart of the problem. He has pointed out graphically the vast difference between Russian ideas and our own. This difference intrudes into the domain of principle, where we suspect that the principles for which Senator VANDENBERG contends have little in common with those which govern the Soviet Union. And if the United Nations is to operate "in behalf of justice," whose notion of justice will prevail in a body in which we sit side-by-side with the Soviet Union? A wide gulf lies between despotism and democracy, between the justice of the firing squad and the justice of the court of law. How to bridge this gulf with no sacrifice of principle presents a problem which anyone less resourceful than Senator VANDENBERG would be tempted to abandon in despair.

National Pensions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN C. BUTLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the social-security bill is due to come before the House for discussion. I thought this would be an appropriate time to place in the RECORD an address made by me on July 16, 1946 in Holland, N. Y. before a group of people of that area on this subject:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it gives me great pleasure to appear before you today and discuss with you this subject of "National Pensions." I am of the opinion that as time progresses, we as a nation will be coming more and more to the realization that National Pensions shall have an important part in our economic as well as our social and political life. If we are to have a healthy national economy, then all the members of society must be able to avail themselves of the great benefits that come as a result of our great technical age. It is just as important that we shall be able to use the products of our farms, mines, factories, and stores, as it is for us to be able to produce them. What benefit is this full production we hear so much about if we are not going to be able to use at least as much as we need of the things that we produce? Is it going to benefit the Nation as a whole very greatly if we produce large quantities of good things for only the people of other nations to enjoy?

We have been talking of these questions in Washington. At least, some of us have. Just as you citizens are wondering just what this dreamland of a postwar world is going to mean to you, so we in Washington—as I say, some of us—are beginning to wonder what it is going to mean to all Americans. Our power to provide in such great abundance that we astonish not only ourselves, but we astonish the world, has certainly been demonstrated. We did it for the war. And, thank God, the war has ended. In fact, it ended about 1 year ago. Soon even Washington will awake to the fact that the war has ended. Then it may be officially so declared. Is it not strange that the greatest war in history ended so many months ago, and yet there is no established peace? Officially the war itself has not been declared at an end. Yet we thank God that the terrible orgy of destruction has ceased to pillage, to maim, and to kill. Our Congress, like the people they represent, is growing impatient at the delay in our approach to the peace. We could use great speed in going to war, but we seem to move at a greatly reduced rate of speed toward the peace. Perhaps this may not be as much a fault as it appears. If we take time and evaluate the numerable problems, and carefully work out a program for our postwar economy that will lend itself to serve the needs of our great and free America, then our time and efforts shall be well spent. This is our aim and desire, and as intimated before, we do have quite a number of fine legislators in Washington that are giving themselves devotedly to this end.

Naturally, the question of national pensions is looming more and more in importance as we examine our prospective peacetime economy. If we are to adjust ourselves to the rapidly changing conditions that come with the developments, and continued great developments in the machine age, we can only find that pensions for the older citizens to take them out of the labor market is the logical means of meeting this problem. We propose that the age of retirement should be fixed at a point low enough to keep away unemployment. Certainly, now, it should be as low as age 60. Then there should be a national pension for everyone, man and woman, Democrat and Republican, regardless of religion or race—I say, everyone who is retired—large enough to provide a well-rounded standard of living. This pension should be adequately financed by an equitable tax in which all should pay in accordance with their ability to pay. It should be collected and paid out currently. I would like to emphasize my conviction that in the collection of taxes, for all purposes, our citizens should be called upon to contribute in accordance with their ability to pay. But, when the Government returns to the citizen its benefits, the citizens enjoy those benefits equally, share and share alike. This is a tradition or characteristic that is imbedded in the very foundation of the Republic. It is as old as the Constitution. It is the essence of the Constitution, including the Bill of Rights.

For this very important reason I am repeating my urgent conviction that all national pensions should be uniform. Every citizen, regardless of the State in which they live, regardless of their race, religion, political affiliation, should receive the same pension, with the only provision that they are of the age required by law and that they are retired from competitive work, business, profession, or enterprise. Just because the State in which one is domiciled does not find itself in position to match the payment made by the Federal Government should not mean that a citizen in New York should receive less from the Federal Government than a citizen of California or Colorado. These matters of discrimination on the part of the Nation should cease once and for all. I say it again, national pensions should be uniform.

National pensions should be adequate. They should be at least large enough to make the pensioner a good cash customer for American markets. We might have a million pensioners drawing the current average pension of a little over $20 per month, and we would not have even one customer for an automobile. None could live in a good home. Not one could wear good clothes or even eat good food. Why not take this matter of providing America's postwar market in our consideration of national pensions? Then, let us retire even less people but make those whom we do retire good customers. The spending of those good incomes through pensions will stimulate production and provide good paying jobs to maintain incomes for those not retired. A large pension would thereby become an investment instead of the present heavy expense. In addition to being uniform our national pensions should be adequate.

And now let us look at our present system of national pensions. Yes, we will agree they are better than no pensions at all, but not much. They are called in Washington social security. What a name. Social security. It reminds me of the tallest man I think I have ever known, was dubbed "Shorty" by his friends. It is a name in reverse. If our program were social it would treat all our citizens alike. It does not do this. It collects taxes or prepaid social-insurance premiums by a given rate against the workers of America. But when it comes to paying his retirement, if he is fortunate enough to live until he is old enough to retire, not according to our previously named American principle "share and share alike," but in accordance to the amount of taxes that he paid in. This is one of the jokers in this so-called social program. Those, and they are the great masses of Americans, who had reasonably small incomes will receive mere pittances in the way of retirement benefits. Those with continued large incomes will have a reasonably good retirement. How very unsocial our program is when squared against this admitted fact. Then if it were security it would not alone be required to provide an adequate retirement income for all, but it would need to fit itself into an otherwise sound national economy. An economy that we could reasonably expect to be existant and operating with ability to meet its obligations at the time those who are young now will be old enough to cash in on their retirement. This program is woefully deficient here. If the Government collects these multiple millions for these retirement purposes, and holds them inviolate in reserve for the purpose of paying the pensions, then it will be definitely taking money out of circulation. It will be drying up the blood stream of business. It will be rendering the very system of enterprise from which it is expected to draw these funds unable to provide the funds. On the other hand, if it does not hold the funds in reserve and goes ahead, as I understand now it is doing, and uses the funds for other purposes, then there will be no reserves from which to pay the pensions once the taxpayer or worker arrives at the age of retirement. This makes the entire system little less than a fraud. For these reasons I appear before you to decry our so-called social security as a woefully inadequate, unequitable, yes, an unworkable program. I think it should be so officially declared by the Congress, I feel it should be liquidated and in its place I shall work as best I can to provide an adequate, uniform, national pension.

Bullies of the Ballot Box—Brutal Bosses Set To Bulldoze and Blackjack Brave Boys of McMinn County at Ballot Box on August 1, 1946

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN JENNINGS, JR.
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, 3,526 brave boys from McMinn County served in the armed forces of their country in this war. They faced death on the battlefield, in the air, and on the sea. Seventy-nine in the Army alone died in battle. Others died in the air and on the sea. Hundreds were wounded in action.

On Thursday, August 1 next, four men who served their country in this World War, and one who served in the first, will be voted for by the people of McMinn County as candidates for public office.

They are:

For sheriff, Knox Henry, 33-year-old veteran of the European campaign, a Republican.

For trustee, Frank Carmichael, 29-year-old son of a farmer, who rose from the ranks to become a major in the Army in the European theater; wounded in action, he wears the Purple Heart, and is a Democrat.

For county court clerk, George (Gump) Painter, 33, who served 30 months in the Pacific. He is a Democrat.

William (Bill) Hamby, 29, former Army captain, candidate for circuit court clerk, a Democrat.

And Charlie Pickle, 52-year-old World War I veteran, for register of deeds, a Republican.

To win, these men and their supporters must meet and overcome methods by which the Cantrell machine has seized and held power in McMinn County for the past 10 years.

First. The machine controls the Election Commission. The two Democratic commissioners appoint each and every officer of the election, and two of the three judges of election, at every precinct in the county. The Republican commissioner can appoint only one judge and one clerk.

Second. For the past 10 years, the two Democratic election commissioners have appointed policemen, deputy sheriffs, justices of the peace, and other stooges to hold the elections. These officers, while holding the election, have been heavily armed with pistols and blackjacks. The Sheriff Pat Mansfield, who is one of the Democratic election commissioners, has appointed and permitted his armed deputy sheriffs to serve as election officials. He has appointed armed policemen and other armed men to hold these elections. The sheriff has made these appointments of his deputies, in elections in which he was a candidate for sheriff. The other Democratic Election Commissioner George Woods, has participated in these appointments, when he was a candidate for representative in the legislature. Many of these armed men who held these elections were "repeaters," that is, they had repeatedly, by the appointment of Woods and Cantrell, and their predecessors held elections while armed, and had repeatedly intimidated voters, the Republican judge, and watchers, and had repeatedly miscalled ballots marked for Republican candidates, switched ballot boxes, stuffed ballot boxes, and in conspiracy with Woods and Mansfield, placed in the ballot box hundreds and thousands of fraudulent ballots, under the pretense they were the ballots of "absentee" voters.

Third. These GI candidates and their friends have served notice on the Democratic machine that they intend to challenge the fraudulent, brutal, intimidation of voters by election officials, and the stuffing of the ballot boxes. They intend to challenge by every legal means the use of force by armed deputy sheriffs, policemen, and machine thugs. They are set to stand guard at the courthouse to see if Woods and Mansfield, the two Democratic election commissioners, post at the courthouse a list of the names of those, in whose names they propose to stuff the ballot box with fraudulent absentee ballots. The law requires that these names be posted at the courthouse not less than 10—and later than 3—days before the election. No citizen of the county has ever been able to see such a list posted at the courthouse. And George Woods has refused to permit any Republican to see the public records of such names he is required by law to keep—if in fact he has kept such records.

Fourth. The Cantrells, who are the head and front of the Democratic machine, their creatures, Representative George Woods and Sheriff Pat Mansfield, the two Democratic election commissioners, cannot be prosecuted for anything they do in the Criminal Court of McMinn County. They are in absolute control of the law-enforcement machinery of the county. I have placed in the hands of the Department of Justice approximately 1,000 affidavits showing wholesale election frauds committed in McMinn County in the November 1944 election. This evidence, in my opinion, establishes a conspiracy between George Woods, Pat Mansfield, and the Democratic election officials appointed by them to rob the citizens of McMinn County of their right to vote and have their votes counted as cast, undiluted by election frauds. The Department of Justice, in addition to these affidavits, has the evidence of the repeated frauds of the McMinn County machine, in the records of the Federal court at Chattanooga and Knoxville, and in the chancery court at Athens, the county seat of McMinn County.

These are some of the cases:

First. United States against William C. Moses. Moses while a WPA foreman in McMinn County extorted $23 from the poverty-stricken WPA workers just before Christmas, 1939, and turned it into a Democratic slush fund to be used in a special congressional election on December 30, 1939. He was indicted under section 5 of the Hatch Act, pled guilty and was fined 1 cent in lieu of costs by United States District Judge Leslie R. Darr, and sentenced to remain in the custody of the marshal for 1 hour. Judge Darr believes that it is O. K. for a member of the Biggs-Cantrell machine to violate the Federal statutes and the constitutional provisions for the protection of the ballot. He had the power to fine Moses not more than $1,000 and to imprison him for 1 year, or to both fine and imprison him.

Second. Immediately after the November election of 1940 the people in McMinn County who had been deprived of their votes in that election by the use of the pistol and the blackjack appealed to me for assistance in bringing the guilty parties to justice. I immediately obtained the affidavits of citizens of unimpeachable integrity, setting out the violations of the law in that election at the Claxton precinct, and at other precincts in that county. These affidavits set out the fact that the election officials who were tried and convicted at Chattanooga in Judge Darr's court had slugged a citizen who came to vote, closed the polls at 10 o'clock in the morning, carried the ballot box miles away, to Etowah, and prevented some 400 qualified voters of that precinct from voting. In November and December of 1940 I placed these affidavits in the hands of the Department of Justice. The charges were investigated by the FBI.

The Department of Justice in Washington prepared indictments against those who perpetrated this outrage, along with indictments against other persons in my district who had been guilty of like offenses in that election.

These charges were repeatedly submitted to the grand jury at Chattanooga in the district court of which Judge Darr is the judge. The defendants and those who were conspiring with them were, on every occasion that these indictments were were submitted to the grand jury, able to suppress indictments. And finally, in October 1942, almost 2 years after these offenses were committed, I was notified by an Assistant Attorney General in the Department of Justice in Washington that the grand jury in the district court at Chattanooga had again failed to indict these defendants. In order to avoid these sinister influences, the Assistant Attorney General sent another indictment against these defendants to the district attorney at Chattanooga, with orders to resubmit the indictment before a grand jury at Winchester, Tenn., the other place in the Chattanooga district where the Federal court meets.

This move evidently took the defendants and their fellow conspirators by surprise, and the indictment upon which they were tried in January of this year, in Judge Darr's court, was returned against them. Had it not been for my efforts and those of the citizens of McMinn County interested in these prosecutions, these men would never have been indicted; they never would have been tried.

I placed in the hands of the Department of Justice information before the trial that the man who is the head and front of the violations of the Federal election laws of McMinn County had paid the defendant, Spurgeon Simpson, the sum of $75 to break up that election. The defendant, Simpson, admitted on the trial of the case that he offered one of his fellow officers $75 to assist him in breaking up the election at the Claxton precinct, but he explained it by saying that he was only joking.

You can, therefore, imagine the feeling of let-down, amazement, and righteous indignation on the part of the people of McMinn County and of that whole section of the country and on the part of the press when Judge Darr nullified the action of the jury and freed these defendants. Following his action, the Chattanooga Times carried this editorial:

STERN MEASURES NEEDED

Three McMinn County election officials, convicted in Federal court here of acting under color of the law in depriving certain citizens of the right to vote, were fined 1 cent each and given suspended sentences of 2 years by United States District Judge Leslie R. Darr.

The clemency shown was chiefly prompted, said Judge Darr, by the fact that this is wartime and the convicted persons are needed in the war effort.

Judge Darr mentioned the background of the case. "Practices of this type," he said, "especially in that county are not uncommon, and elections in that section have acquired the reputation of not being conducted in conformity with the law, strictly speaking. It's getting pretty bad when a citizen considers it a natural thing to go to an election equipped wih a blackjack and a pistol."

Precisely because those things which we have just quoted from Judge Darr's statement are true, many will regret that a more stern corrective was not imposed than a 1-cent fine and a suspended sentence.

The McMinn election outrages doubtless contributed to the Napoleonic complex developed by Sheriff Biggs, of Polk County, whose methods have the earmarks of having been encouraged, if not suggested, by the attempts made in McMinn County to sway elections by terrorism. From there it was but a step to the present Biggs method of upsetting election results by legislative acts.

The Biggs phenomenon may not have been caused directly by the McMinn County election scandals, but the pattern is much the same.

The Times believes this wave of totalitarianism can only be stopped by stern measures.

Judge Darr fined these men 1 cent each.

Third. Again in the November 1942 election in McMinn County the same men with pistols and blackjacks held the election. Fraud and violence were county-wide.

I finally succeeded in goading the Department of Justice into submitting to a Federal grand jury at Chattanooga the evidence I furnished that William Rucker, a chief of police at Etowah, had miscalled ballots marked for the Republican candidate for Congress in favor of the Democratic candidate, and assaulted with a pistol the Republican judge who caught him at it and threw him out of the polling place. Rucker was indicted. Judge Leslie R. Darr, under fire for his 1-cent fines in the Moses and the Claxton precinct cases, excused himself, and Rucker was tried before United States District Judge MacSwinford, of Cynthiana, Ky., and a jury. He was convicted. Judge MacSwinford fined him $500 and sentenced him to jail for 60 days.

These are but a sample of the fraud and force that have made elections a mockery and a stench in McMinn, Monroe, and Polk Counties, Tenn.

Smaller Air Lines

REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, out of the recent war have come many hundreds of thousands of highly trained airmen. Most of them are young men; they must find means of making their living in civilian life; and they naturally want to enter the air transportation business. Many of them have done so by forming small air transport companies financed by veterans and operated by veterans. In many cases GI loans and other types of Government financing have assisted them in getting started, and their equipment has been purchased from the War Assets Administration from surplus aircraft of the Army or Navy. This equipment has been put in shape comparable to that being used by the major air lines. These planes are licensed by the Civil Aeronautics Board and capacity loads are being carried for shippers all over the country. Thousands of passengers, unable to secure air transport from major air lines, have been traveling on these so-called nonscheduled air lines.

But today they are faced with the possibility of being forced out of business. I have talked to Mr. James M. Landis, chairman of the CAB, and I do not believe he will permit this to happen, for I am convinced he understands the problem and is determined to work it out. It is important, however, to outline what the danger is and to point out to the Congress its clear duty to these veterans. Our colleague from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], whose service to air transportation in this Nation is outstanding, has done so already and I am glad to join with him.

At present the Civil Aeronautics Board is very slow to grant any "certificates of public convenience and necessity" to these new air lines despite the vast sums spent by the Government in the maintenance of airfields and despite the fact that the air after all belongs to all the people. Only through such a certificate can one of these veteran-operated air lines becomes a scheduled operator. Otherwise they must operate as "nonscheduled air lines" and the restrictions imposed upon operators in this category are becoming more and more onerous. Indeed, "cease and desist" orders have been issued already against two of these carriers on the ground that they have solicited business from the general public or that they operated at too regular intervals. Thus there is grave danger of the Civil Aeronautics Board protecting a monopoly on the part of the major airlines—a thing I am confident the Board does not want to do.

But it will require a rejection by the Board of recent proposals for further limitation of the number of trips per month nonscheduled lines can make; it will require a more liberal definition of the exemption from the requirement of certificates of necessity for these small air lines; it will above all require a full and complete survey of this whole matter of the need of the Nation for additional air transportation and of the right of these veterans to help supply it if the Board is not to be in the position of protecting such a monopoly.

As I have said I am persuaded that the chairman of the Board is alive to the problem and that further consideration will be given before any new orders are issued. Were this not the case my speech today would be much sharper than it is.

For surely the last thing we in America want is for a Government agency to stand between a group of its veterans and their opportunity to help fill a great national need by entering a new and developing line of business on the one hand and certain established interests in that same field on the other.

In further explanation of this important problem I ask consent to include herewith a letter from the Military Pilots Association and a petition filed with the Civil Aeronautics Board on behalf of the nonscheduled air carriers:

MILITARY PILOTS ASSOCIATION,
Miami, Fla., July 10, 1946.

HONORABLE SIR: The veteran pilots of World War II are appealing to you for help in their behalf regarding the new regulations as proposed by the CAB relative to the existing nonscheduled and charter air lines.

The Civil Aeronautics Board is proposing an amendment No. 3 to section 292.1 of the Economic Regulation to which we urgently invite your attention. This amendment, if enacted, will result in thousands of veteran pilots, now employed by the charter lines, being thrown out of work and into extreme economic hardship, as well as the personnel of these companies. This move is highly ill-advised at a time such as this, when our country is trying to recover from a long, hard war. Small business must be encouraged, and the veterans given a chance to pursue the endeavors for which they are best trained and qualified. It is difficult to believe that certain groups are in favor of turning their backs on men who fought so that these Americans might go their way in peace and security. The will of the people should be expressed by the CAB, and these skilled pilots who will be victimized by the CAB's action will be without a livelihood and will eventually be forced to turn to other fields of endeavor, thus losing those hard-won skills bought by the taxpayers for approximately $30,000 per pilot. This we do not believe to be the will of the people.

Many well-known business houses are utilizing the services rendered by these nonscheduled lines, both for passengers and cargo. The major air lines are not adequately handling the air-transportation business, and the fact that the charter carriers are at present doing a tremendous business definitely indicates their place in the air-transportation system of the United States.

We further believe that the amendment, which will limit charter air lines to 10 trips a month between any two destinations and no flights to foreign countries other than Alaska, Mexico, and Canada, is highly monopolistic in character. The charter air lines are as well qualified to carry on air commerce and develop the air pattern and maintain the air supremacy of the country's future as are the scheduled air lines. Approximately half of the commercial flights originating in the United States during the last 6 months were by charter air line companies. Is there any reason why these companies should not be encouraged to compete in the spirit of free enterprise and achieve a rightful place in the country's transportation system?

There seems to be only one answer to these questions: a vigorous investigation in the open light of free enterprise and good business. We urge you to exercise all your influence to bring about such an investigation. As veterans of this war we have faith in our lawmakers and Representatives. We believe we will be given our chance to keep our Nation the strongest, fairest, and best of all.

Sincerely,

MILITARY PILOTS' ASSOCIATION,
E. E. JONES,
Executive Vice President.

PETITION OF STANLEY E. LONG IN BEHALF OF NONSCHEDULED AIR CARRIERS BASED IN THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Stanley E. Long, for the nonscheduled air carriers of California respectfully petitions the Board for reconsideration of the Board's decisions set forth in docket 1501 dated May 17, 1946. On support of this petition the author presents the following reasons for reconsideration and for the granting of a more liberal definition of nonscheduled operations:

1. Investigation into matters relating to and concerning nonscheduled transportation was held long before majority of participants in nonscheduled operations had been released from the armed services of the United States.

2. The nonscheduled exemption order adopted in 1938 is outmoded and does not fairly or adequately care for the orderly development of nonscheduled air-carrier operations.

3. The nonscheduled air carrier is not asking for straight subsidies, mail subsidies, or any other form of financial inducements offered by the Government in order to continue business. They ask only for the right to operate their aircraft on a reasonably economic basis.

4. The report of the examiners recommending repeal of the exemption order for nonscheduled operators and proposing the adoption of a new and even more stringent exemption order would in effect be the order to cease and desist operations for 95 percent of the nonscheduled air transportation industry.

5. Docket 1501 (p. 7) states: "Since the hearings were held and the oral argument heard, the termination of the war has released thousands of trained airmen and made available hundreds of aircraft, and many of these airmen and aircraft are being organized to conduct important new air transportation services, relying upon their exempt status under section 292.1."

6. The nonscheduled air carriers are both able and willing to adhere to every safety regulation, and safety precaution. They are in every sense worthy of participating in an undeveloped phase of the air-transportation industry.

I

Proceedings for an investigation of nonscheduled air carriers were initiated on July 26, 1944, nearly 2 years ago. The vast majority of veteran flyers now engaged in air transportation were still on active duty in the various Air Corps of our armed forces. It was not until they were honorably discharged that they combined finances and talents to organize and commence nonscheduled air operations. None of these newly formed veteran concerns were heard or represented in the proceedings within which they are to be so drastically affected. Public hearings were held in March of 1945, several months before the end of World War II. Despite the decisions and definitions culminated in these hearings, no effort on the part of the Board was made to advise these new concerns of the unlikelihood of their being able to remain in business. They were instead, licensed, after successfully complying with safety regulations, and were allowed to proceed with their operations.

II

The original nonscheduled exemption order of 1938 was indeed adopted at such a time when nonscheduled air transportation was of small economic significance. However, the air-transportation industry, like any other industry must, if it is to progress—expand.

The highly skilled veteran flyers of World War II, trained by the United States Government, at an expense of many millions of dollars, desire to retain their skills, and to apply them now while they are in their most competent form, in providing an air transportation service for the public's convenience and necessity, that necessity having been made known and realized over, and over again.

III

Contrary to the operations of the major scheduled air lines, the nonscheduled operators are not asking to be nursed along by the payment of various Government subsidies. The nonscheduled operator will, if given the chance, develop on an orderly and economically safe basis, the business which he expects to compete for, by offering his services in their most attractive form.

IV

The new exemption order and new carrier classification proposed in docket 1501 would virtually make it impossible for the nonscheduled air carrier to continue his business. Under the recommendations proposed, if adopted, he would be unable to solicit in any way any form of general business.

He would be considered in violation of the order if the public was advised of the availability of his services. Advertising would be outlawed completely, for that would be considered holding out to the public the services which are available. Another stipulation prohibits the completion of more than 10 round trips between 2 points per month.

Any number of trips in excess of this number will be considered a violation of the exemption order and an appropriate order to cease and desist operations will be issued. Of course this number of trips per month is purely an arbitrary one. It is stated even further that if one trip per month is made and the date of this trip each month is the same or even reasonably the same, this will be considered a scheduled operation and also in violation of the exemption order.

V

The statement by the board examiners is quite correct that "Airmen and aircraft are being organized to conduct important new air transportation services."

The facts are that there does exist a large group of efficient, experienced, and well-trained nonscheduled air carriers—furthermore, they have proven themselves vital to the business of transporting both persons and cargo. As evidence of this, nearly every available airplane operated by the nonscheduled carrier was called upon for service during the emergency freight tie-up caused by the recent railroad strike. The point made concerning passenger travel can be substantiated by checking with the unserved public at any airport or air-line ticket office. Proof also lies in the fact that but from 1 airport in California over 700 passengers were served in 1 month by nonscheduled air carriers. This would serve to point up the necessity of satisfying the public in their desire to use air transportation for the normal mode of travel.

If they are to be constantly subjected to long weeks of waiting for a confirmation of space, it is only reasonable to assume that public opinion and public good will will be replaced with an extreme reluctance to depend upon the air lines for transportation. On the other hand, if the vast number of available licensed aircraft are allowed to carry the great overflow of passengers and cargo, it would almost certainly reflect favorably upon the air transportation business as a whole.

VI

The ability of the nonscheduled air carriers can hardly be questioned. Nor can the type of equipment being used be questioned inasmuch as it must pass the same rigid test, and inspections as given the scheduled air lines. The nonscheduled air carriers exhibit also every such right, as the scheduled air lines in developing and advancing the newer phase of cargo in air transportation.

Encouraging the nonscheduled air carriers to develop his business have been various agencies of our Government, including the important War Assets Administration. With War Assets Administration's assistance veterans have been able to purchase surplus aircraft on a contractual basis. Many of these aircraft remain unpaid for at the present time though a very substantial investment has been made in them by the veteran nonscheduled air-carrier concerns.

These carriers in the aggregate operate approximately 529 transport planes, consisting of DC–3's, DC–4's, Lodestars, and Curtis Commandos. These planes were sold to them by the United States Government at a cost of millions of dollars. In addition to the group mentioned above, 2,000 miscellaneous small type planes as well as 3,000 single engine planes are employed in nonscheduled operations.

Nonscheduled air carriers employ a total manpower force of approximately 6,587 pilots, 10,000 ground-crew men, and 2,845 miscellaneous personnel. It can be conservatively said that nearly 100 percent of this group are veterans formerly serving in the armed forces during World War II.

It was stated in docket 1501 (p. 15) that the scheduled air lines had been severely restricted from developing their cargo service during the war years. The implication being, of course, that the scheduled carriers, having served war contracts should now have first opportunity to expand even more than they have already. On the other hand it must be admitted that the nonscheduled air carriers, composed in the main of veterans from World War II, were hardly in a position to build either their reputation or their business of air transportation. Now that they have returned and are competently able to render a valuable service and at the same time rehabilitate themselves in their chosen occupation, it would not seem reasonable to deny them that right.

Wherefore, the author of this petition, in behalf of the nonscheduled air carriers (see list attached) based in California, respectfully petitions the board for reconsideration of the decision rendered in docket 1501 and petitions further that no order to cease and desist be issued until after the matter has been reopened and the vitally affected nonscheduled carriers have ample time to prepare and present their cases at a public hearing.

Respectfully submitted.

STANLEY E. LONG,
Representing nonscheduled carriers based in California.

The attached petition represents the collective desires of the author and the companies listed hereunder: Westair of California, Gardena, Calif.; California Growers Air Express, Fresno, Calif.; Pacific Seaboard Airways, Gardena, Calif.; National Air Cargo, Los Angeles, Calif.; N. A. T. S., Air Transport Service, Oakland, Calif.; Pacific National Air Express, Glendale, Calif.; Skyvan Inc., Long Beach, Calif.; Transairways, Long Beach, Long Beach, Calif., Viking Air Transport, Glendale, Calif.; California Eastern Airways, San Francisco, Calif.; Airline Transport Carriers, Long Beach, Calif.; Charter Service Safeway Airlines, Los Angeles, Calif.; Continental Skyvan, Oakland, Calif.; Fireball Air Express Co., Long Beach, Calif.; Sky Freight Airlines, Inc., Van Nuys, Calif.; Modern Flying Service, Hollywood, Calif.; North American Skyline, Long Beach, Calif.; Western Continental Airlines, Inc.; Glendale, Calif.; San Diego Flying Freight, San Diego, Calif.; Pacific Overseas Airways, Ontario, Calif.; Transconair, Stockton, Calif.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, this service has been badly needed. Everybody knows that the volume of air transportation service is inadequate. Surplus equipment has been bought from the War Assets Administration and yet the small air lines now face a most difficult problem for the reason that they have to be either nonscheduled air lines in which the restrictions by the Civil Aeronautics Authority are most difficult to live up to or else they have to get "certificates of necessity and convenience" that are very difficult for them to obtain.

What the Gift or Loan to Great Britain Will Cost You

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, Congress has just passed legislation providing for a loan of $3,750,000,000 to Great Britain.

I voted against this loan or gift for many reasons.

This action of Congress will open the floodgates for requests for huge loans from every country in the world. Just this week, negotiations were completed for a $650,000,000 loan to France. Russia has also indicated that she will press her demands for a multibillion-dollar loan.

Before this Nation embarks on a foreign loaning or spending spree, it might be well to consider the plight of our old-age pensioners, our American pioneers.

The present pension payments to the builders of our country are a disgrace.

We squander billions abroad and then pinch the pennies that are doled out to the aged citizens of America. I have repeatedly advocated that pensions be increased before we consider loaning or giving money to foreign countries.

There is another problem confronting this country that needs solving before we so generously distribute our hard-earned tax money abroad. Millions of veterans have returned to their homes and jobs and have successfully adjusted themselves to civilian life. On the other hand, millions of service men and women are very much in need of assistance from the grateful people of this Nation. Congress has already taken action on a part of this program for veterans. There is much yet to be done, and I personally feel that any tax money spent at this time should benefit the veterans rather than be dissipated among the nations of the earth.

If we submit to the pressure brought to bear on us, this country will loan itself into oblivion, chaos, and depression. According to reliable estimates, the present administration intends to loan at least $17,000,000,000 to foreign countries. Add this amount to our present national debt of more than $272,000,000,000, divide it by the number of men, women, and children in the United States, and you have a financial debt of over $2,000 for every individual person in this country.

Minnesota's share of the national debt is already about $5,584,600,000. Based on the per capita obligation, the British "loan" will cost Minnesota's taxpayers another $78,184,400.

The British "loan" or gift will cost the people of the following cities: New York City, $207,637,312; Chicago, $94,644,144; Philadelphia, $54,118,568; Detroit, $44,834,468; Los Angeles, $41,560,680; Cleveland, $24,839,804; Baltimore, $23,940,924; St. Louis, $22,861,748.

The share of the cost to be borne by the people of the various States are as follows:

State's share of national debt and the British loan

Otter Tail	1,489,476
Pennington	361,564
Polk	1,056,548
Red Lake	207,564
Roseau	422,884
Wilkin	293,300

Using the same break-down, the cost to the people in some of the larger cities in the Ninth Congressional District is as follows:

Fergus Falls	$303,744
Thief River Falls	168,532
Crookston	200,508
Detroit Lakes	140,420
Moorhead	265,748
East Grand Forks	98,308
Bemidji	263,956
Breckenridge	76,860

This loan comes along at a time when States and counties have made a good showing on their own government debt. If the Federal Government persists in dissipating the tax money of the people of this country, there will be no incentive for business and industry to progress and develop new enterprises and all citizens will suffer.

I am opposed to bankrupting America in order to finance the world. That is why I voted against the British "loan" and that is why I will oppose a continuance of such foolhardy international finance as long as I am in the United States Congress.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHASE GOING WOODHOUSE

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mrs. WOODHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from Fashion Trades for July 5, by Bernard K. Johnpoll, chief, Fashion Trades, Washington bureau:

It would be talking about spilled milk to discuss the reasons for the price-control fiasco if it weren't for the fact that the garment trade has been one of the chief targets of blame.

Whenever anyone speaks of price controls and the trade the discussion turns to the National Retail Dry Goods Association. It is this association which did much of the effective lobbying that brought about the Congress-passed, President-vetoed bill that made inflation legal.

NRDGA has an answer and from many aspects an honest answer—that it never did propagandize for such drastic revisions. The facts, however, refute NRDGA's position and indicate that the association, whether knowingly or otherwise, was responsible for the bill which President Truman has rightfully called "a booby trap for inflation."

The retailer's association said its sole objective was to kill such obviously iniquitous regulations as MAP and some phases of cost absorption. In that action it had the support of most intelligent retailers in the Nation.

But in its propaganda to get these changes into the price control legislation, it let go with some of the nastiest verbal blasts against OPA and allowed itself to become a rallying point for those whose sole ambition was to get rid of price controls in order to earn some quick money. Because it hid its opposition to OPA behind the shield of reforming the price agency, its propaganda was far more effective than that of the openly anti-OPA National Association of Manufacturers.

NRDGA's "horror exhibits" were used as the basis for the Wolcott and later the Taft amendments, which would have caused a continuing increase in the price of all commodities until OPA would be unable to turn down any price increase request and inflation would be rampant.

NRDGA's propaganda did not end with the "Horror Exhibits." Reputable Congressmen, opponents of strict price controls, have been approached by the association and asked to support NRDGA's position, with implied suggestions that the association wouldn't mind the complete end of price controls.

When President Truman vetoed the bill, and price controls did lapse, it was a simple matter for NRDGA to extoll its members to keep the price line. It had done a good job of starting inflation on its way.

TRADE ASSOCIATION POSITION

The position of the manufacturing trade associations is a different story. Not a single one called for an end to price controls—directly or by inference. The popular-priced dress manufacturers did fight MAP in the open. Most of the manufacturers did give forth with anti-MAP statements.

The apparel trades knew that an end to price controls would mean a sharp rise in the price of hard-to-get cotton goods and rayon linings. This reporter has spoken to at least 50 trade association representatives in Washington on business during the past 2 months. All agreed they would like to see MAP out, but would prefer having MAP retained in contrast to having no price controls at all.

The record of the textile associations is, of course, old. They have opposed price controls from their very inception. The American Cotton Manufacturers Association has spoken out perennially against price controls, the Cotton Textile Institute has persistently been an opponent of OPA, and Arthur Besse's National Association of Wool Manufacturers has made no secret of its position on price ceilings.

In recording the reasons for the demise of OPA, it is well to mention the role of those associations and industries that tried their hardest to end all controls. Despite all the publicity to the contrary, the apparel trade isn't one of these industries.

John R. Kissinger

REMARKS

OF

HON. FOREST A. HARNESS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. HARNESS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial titled "We Salute You," which appeared in the Huntington Herald-Press, Huntington, Ind., issue of July 17.

This editorial is an eloquent tribute to a departed hero whose name will stand forever on the scrolls of brave men who have rendered outstanding service not only to America but to all mankind.

John R. Kissinger, a native of Indiana, and a lifelong resident of the community of Huntington, was the first of the little band of heroic American soldiers to offer his life voluntarily in the epic experiments by Maj. Walter Reed which led to the medical profession's present-day knowledge of that scourge of the Tropics, yellow fever.

At the turn of the century "yellow jack" was a mysterious and dreadful malady that meant almost certain death to its victims. During the war with Spain, it took a far heavier toll than our enemy exacted on the battlefields. In offering himself as a human guinea pig in the Reed experiments, therefore, John Kissinger displayed courage and a love of humanity of the very highest order. John Kissinger, the departed hero, has rendered a service to humanity which can never be properly rewarded, but we in this body and, in fact, all mankind should join his friends and neighbors in this farewell tribute, We salute you.

"WE SALUTE YOU"

John Kissinger has been the subject of comment in this column a number of times previously. Editorials have appeared here praising his courage as a soldier, his civic consciousness as a citizen, his qualities as a friend.

They have appeared in connection with events in John's life, like when he went out to Hollywood and spoke over a Nation-wide radio hookup; the attention he received when the movie Yellow Jack was being exhibited, or the proposal one time that Congress put him on the retirement pay list as a major. And when he and Mrs. Kissinger packed up their goods and moved out of dreamhouse on the Flaxmill road where they had lived for many years, words of farewell to the good couple appeared in this column that were intended to be an expression of the community's good will and good wishes for a happy future.

These remarks were made when John was living and could read them and comment on them, as he often did. We are glad they were written that way, because now that John is gone we find that everything we have to say about him was said in print when he was here to know about it, and not after he is dead and can no longer care.

John Kissinger was a great soldier; the kind of a great soldier that is coequal with the phrase, a great gentleman. The courage he displayed in that army hospital camp in Cuba nearly a half century ago was not the crimson badge of courage that flashes from the heat of violent emotion in battle where the quick whistle of a bullet marks the line between life and death. It was the cold, knowing courage that can lead a man to look upon a slow and torturing death and not be afraid, even rejecting the cash award offered as a prize if death is escaped.

Many things are different today than they would have been if John and his comrades in the uniform of the United States army had not faced what appeared to be almost certain death in that long gone day. Because they dared, the dread yellow fever is no longer a menace and the white man can accomplish his works in the tropics. If yellow fever had never been conquered it can be said safely that there would be no Panama Canal today, a single monument that may stand for many achievements in the American tropics built by the white man's restless empire building.

Returning to the ways of peace John knew adversity and a nation's neglect, and did not lose his spirit. Perhaps the physical ills he suffered from his yellow fever illness never entirely left him. But he fought through to a regained measure of health and with Congress' remembrance of him and the gift of the home on the Flaxmill road from the American Medical society John knew good years of happy association with friends and neighbors in Huntington. John's friends of those years are his sincere mourners now. We remember the valiant Old Soldier as a good friend, who had just gone down to Florida to live a while and who we would see again one of these days. We knew he was not well, but there was nothing like this finality of death that means we will not see and talk with him in the flesh again.

It can be said of few men that they gave so much more to their country than they received from it. It can be said of John. He had some medals to show, letters from the great of the land and other lands, a fame that made him known wherever medicine is practiced; but he had no profit from his bravery, and only suffered because of it. His answer in later years was the answer of the courage of his youth: "If it was to do over, I would do it again."

So John's absence in the flesh will not remove him from memory, and never can his name be erased from the book in which man's great deeds stand written. In this moment of transition we find the words Major Reed spoke to John Kissinger in Cuba in the closing months of the last century yield to paraphrase, and we may say to John today:

"We salute you."

Sidney Hillman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Labor Statesman," appearing in the July 15 issue of the publication the Advance. The article refers to the late Sidney Hillman.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LABOR STATESMAN

Sidney Hillman's death yesterday came at the height of a career of much drama and great achievement. In recent years his political activities have had the headlines. His influence was certainly felt in the 1944 nominations and elections, and if he had lived would have swayed votes in 1948.

Behind the political figure was the trade unionist, who gave 36 years of his life to improving conditions in the clothing trades. Improving conditions meant to him considerably more than raising wages and shortening hours, though the Amalgamated Clothing Workers did achieve these objectives under his leadership. He could fairly be called a labor statesman. He knew that labor could not prosper unless the employer made a profit, or if nonunion shops could underbid union shops. The Amalgamated must have been the first union literally to tell an employer how to run his own business—that is to say, to offer him expert advice which he was happy to accept. When he thought there had to be a strike, Sidney Hillman would fight hard, but he preferred arbitration and the system of impartial chairmen by which strikes could be prevented. He thought in industry-wide terms.

Last May, when he was renominated president of the Amalgamated, he restated his program:

"We want a better America, an America that will give its citizens, first of all, a higher and higher standard of living, so that no child will cry for food in the midst of plenty. We want an America where the inventions of science will be at the disposal of every American family, not merely for the few who can afford them; where it will be possible for all groups, regardless of race, creed, or color, to live in friendship and be real neighbors; an America that will carry forward its great mission of helping other countries to help themselves, not thinking in terms of exploitation but of creating plenty for all everywhere."

These were the ideals for which this Lithuanian immigrant, once a political prisoner in a czarist jail, later a $6-a-week tailor in Chicago, literally worked himself to death. Now that death has removed him from the arena of political conflict we need not discuss his interpretations or his methods. These were American ideals.

Financial Operations of the War Shipping Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE D. AIKEN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "WSA's Floundering Figures," published in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of July 19, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WSA'S FLOUNDERING FIGURES

The War Shipping Administration says there is no evidence of scandal in its books, as if its floundering accountancy were evidence of anything. W. L. Slattery, construction finance officer of the Maritime Commission, has just told Congress that there is no explanation of $900,000,000 in wartime purchases, and that some shipyard auditors were fired because of "their fight for the public interest." His testimony adds to the responsibility of Congress to search WSA down to its plimsoll line.

Even if Government accountants have found no concrete proof of fraud, they have found a record of total confusion. For a year WSA didn't know it owned a California warehouse containing $2,000,000 in supplies. Sometimes it paid contractors twice on a single bill. One of its port officers certified a tanker as seaworthy after it had been torpedoed.

Maybe it wasn't fraud, when WSA didn't "properly process" property removal slips said to invoice $12,000,000. But, as the chief of the accounting office says, "That is false entry. They prosecute ordinary citizens for such things."

Why no prosecution for WSA? The House Appropriations Committee has accused it of "inexcusable laxity." Congressman PLOESER says it was the "greatest mess" he ever saw. Senator AIKEN has charged that "unscrupulous business interests" have and are trying to loot the Treasury. Representative WIGGLESWORTH found evidence that the Government paid 5 to 10 times what a ship was worth during the war, and frequently allowed operating profits 6 to 8 times the prewar price of a ship on one voyage.

How much of the public's money was wasted? Where did it go? Who got it? The answers have been battened down under WSA's mixed-up books and confused figures. But that is what the public wants to know, and expects Congress to find out. Only a deep dive into the mess will show whether the alleged scandal amounts to mere scuttlebutt or actual pirateering.

The Pearl Harbor Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 22 (legislative day of Friday, July 5), 1946

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the following editorials:

An editorial entitled "The Last Word," published in the New York Herald Tribune of July 22, 1946; an editorial entitled "Pearl Harbor Findings," published in the Washington Evening Star of July 21, 1946; an editorial entitled "The Congressional Finding on the Pearl Harbor Disaster," published in the Baltimore Sun of July 22, 1946; and an editorial entitled "The Pearl Harbor Report," published in the New York Times of July 21, 1946.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of July 22, 1946]

THE LAST WORD

Four and one-half years after the event the staggering disaster at Pearl Harbor has now at last, perhaps, been laid away under a sufficient mountain of words, documentation and controversy. The joint congressional investigating committee has submitted its report, in a volume of more than 500 closely printed pages, with the minority report of the two Republican senatorial members adding nearly 80 more. Behind these there lies a record of more than 10,000,000 words of testimony and exhibits; there lie the months of the committee's own hearings, there lie the results of seven prior investigations of one kind or another, there lie the years of bitter controversy and passionate suspicion. Here is the end product of them all; and it must stand as a final word, exhausting the possibilities of this kind of approach to the essential mysteries of historic causation and responsibility.

As a sifting and summation of the enormous record, as a history of the salient facts connected with the tragedy and as an analysis of the principal controversial issues the majority report is an unusually able document. The fact that it was ultimately signed by two of the four Republican members of the committee attests its fundamental fairness and goes far to redeem the committee's work as a whole from the disgraceful partisanship that threatened for a time to destroy all confidence in the investigation.

The report effectually dissipates all the wilder rumors and suspicions. There were no tricks or war plots by the administration; the Japanese were not baited into the attack, and even the minority report by Senators FERGUSON and BREWSTER offers no clear or convincing criticism of the basic course of administration policy and diplomacy. We are left with the intricate story of what happened, upon which all are now substantially agreed, and that story in turn leaves us about where we began 4½ years ago. We have the local commands, taken totally by surprise and in a condition of utter unreadiness; we have the higher military and naval authorities in Washington, whose business it was to weapon, war and guide the local commands, and we have the still higher political and diplomatic authorities and the President, whose business it was to keep policy and military preparedness as much in accord as possible. And we have the long chapter of accidents, oversights, mistakes in judgment from top to bottom which added up to Pearl Harbor.

All that is on the record. Beyond that the issue of responsibility is one for which there is no final answer except in the mind that makes it. The majority places the major responsibility upon the local commanders, a much lesser blame on the Washington military authorities and none upon the political authorities. Representative KEEFE, following the unusual course of first signing the majority report and then adding a statement strongly disagreeing with some of its conclusions, distributes the blame more nearly equally between the local commanders and the Washington military authorities. The minority report follows him in this but extends the blame farther to include the high political authorities and President Roosevelt—mainly, however, on the tenuous ground that they were insufficiently alert in providing the military with their own knowledge of the situation and in warning them of its dangers.

But these are differences of opinion. We now have the facts upon which each can formulate his own opinion of past blames. But besides the obvious lessons as to the dangers of divided command, uncertain intelligence, service rivalries, want of preparedness we have disappointingly little, after all the effort, as a valid guide to the future conduct of both war and diplomacy. The committee failed to produce that searching critique and synthesis for which some hoped. Perhaps it was a hope too high to place on any politically appointed investigation, unavoidably involved in partisan ends.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star of July 21, 1946]

PEARL HARBOR FINDINGS

Although the Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack failed to achieve unanimity in its assignment of blame for the magnitude of the disaster, there was no lack of agreement on what has emerged as the most important finding to be gleaned from the voluminous testimony: That the shortcomings of men, methods and matériel which gave the Japanese their supreme opportunity must never be permitted to develop in an age of atomic weapons. Another surprise attack according to the Pearl Harbor pattern of treachery might well prove to be the last in American military annals.

The majority and minority conclusions as to who was responsible for the conditions which made our Hawaiian base such easy prey for the Japanese plotters are not so important as the lessons to be learned from such a careful study of the tragedy as the committee has given it. The committee has brought the whole confusing picture into proper perspective by its succinct observation that the "ultimate responsibility for the attack and its results rests upon Japan." The corollary question of what individuals or acts or attitudes shared the responsibility for failing to avert the disaster appears to have interested the investigators less than the need for future safeguards.

The majority devoted only two printed pages to its conclusions exonerating high level Washington officials of blame and holding the Hawaiian commanders guilty of "errors of judgment and not derelictions of duty," whereas nearly 14 pages of recommendations for future security were set forth. There is little doubt that an overwhelming majority of citizens have come to a similarly philosophical attitude toward the past and a similarly earnest concern for what lies ahead. For that reason it is not likely that the general public will give more than passing attention to the minority's listing of the late President Roosevelt, former Secretaries Stimson and Knox, Generals Marshall and Gerow and Admiral Stark as officials who, with General Short and Admiral Kimmel, were guilty of "failure to perform" their responsibilities.

The committee's basic recommendations growing out of the December 7, 1941, object lesson are vitally important, however self-evident some of them may seem to be. Some of the reforms already have been instituted and others are in course of being made. Foremost was placed "unity of command," but it should be noted that the committee added the qualifying phrase, "at all military and naval outposts." It will be difficult for advocates of Army-Navy merger legislation to read into the language anything more than the type of unification which prevailed after Pearl Harbor in the field and in the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Equally important—and already evolving—is complete integration of intelligence activities, with intelligence to be regarded as a career rather than a brief and casual tour of duty. There are numerous other recommendations that are well justified by the mass of evidence included in the report.

All in all, the committee handled its difficult task judicially and effectively. Its inch-thick printed report is not pleasant history, but it is a valuable reference work on the perils of complacency in a world not yet freed from threats of war.

[From the Baltimore (Md.) Sun of July 22, 1946]

THE CONGRESSIONAL FINDING ON THE PEARL HARBOR DISASTER

As significant as the majority and minority reports on the congressional investigation of Pearl Harbor was the record, including 5,560 pages of testimony and 14,534 printed pages of exhibits, which was returned to Congress along with the reports. For it is largely upon that record that in years to come historians will base their research and arrive at their ultimate conclusions.

That the facts as revealed are subject to different interpretations is made clear by the two reports. For example, the majority report, signed by eight members of the committee, including two Republicans, exonerates President Roosevelt and the members of his Cabinet from blame. The minority report, filed by Senators FERGUSON and BREWSTER, Republicans, on the other hand, charges the President with failure to discharge the responsibilities ultimately essential to the defense of Pearl Harbor and makes the same charge against Secretary of War Stimson, Secretary of the Navy Knox, General Marshall, Admiral Stark, and General Gerow.

Both the majority and minority reports assign immediate responsibility to Rear Adm. Husband E. Kimmel and Maj. Gen. Walter C. Short, commanding at Pearl Harbor. It is noticeable, however, that the majority report does not follow the Roberts report which charged the two military commanders on the scene with "dereliction of duty," but softens the verdict to "errors of judgment." And General Short is prompt to call attention to the conflict between even this lighter conclusion and the majority report's statement that the War Plans Division of the War Department "failed to discharge its direct responsibility to advise Short that he had not properly alerted his command." In the light of that admission he apparently is willing to let his case rest with posterity.

On the whole, the majority report has that quality of equanimity and restraint with which experienced men are apt to deal with great disaster of the Pearl Harbor kind. For such men have learned that there are few personal devils at work in the world. They know that to err is human and that the frailties of the flesh, while lamentable, cannot justly occasion surprise. The majority assign responsibility firmly, but there is, perhaps, a covert thrust at some of the more melodramatic claims of personal delinquency on the American side in these dry words: "The ultimate responsibility for the attack and its results rests upon Japan."

Aside from providing material for the ultimate verdict of history, the investigation was designed also to find out where the trouble lay and to take steps to see that a similar misfortune will not happen again. On this score the majority report makes various recommendations of which the most important are unity of command in our outposts and the complete integration of Army and Navy intelligence agencies.

No one, regardless of party or personal predilections, has denied that the lack of coordination between the two services at Pearl Harbor was notorious. All the more pity then that, just as these recommendations are published, word comes from Washington that, for the time being, at least, plans for unifying the two services have been shelved.

[From the New York Times of July 21, 1946]

THE PEARL HARBOR REPORT

After months of hearings that generated so much political heat that it appeared doubtful whether the Pearl Harbor investigation would do more than to confuse still further the issues of responsibility for this country's greatest military disaster, the majority of the congressional committee headed by Senator BARKLEY has brought forth a statesmanlike summary that will appeal to the intelligence of the majority of the American people. It not only places the blame for the military debacle where we believe it rightly belongs—on the Pearl Harbor commanders, Admiral Kimmel and General Short—it looks beyond the mere assessment of blame to the fundamental causes of the confusion of military command then prevailing and suggests reforms to guard against a repetition in this age of atom bombs.

Only in the minority report by Senators FERGUSON and BREWSTER, both Republicans, is the deplorable political climate of the early days of the hearings perpetuated. Representatives GEARHART and KEEFE, the other two Republicans on the joint committee of Senate and House, who were no less zealous than their Senate conferees in the early days in attempting to place the blame on the Roosevelt administration and not on the military commanders, signed the majority report along with the six Democrats. This change of heart does them credit. Abandonment of their partisan position should help to win general acceptance for the majority conclusions, which will appeal generally, we believe, as the logical conclusions any sensible American would reach on the evidence.

The attack, says the majority report, was "an unprovoked act of aggression by the Empire of Japan"; President Roosevelt and Secretaries Hull, Stimson, and Knox, instead of provoking Japan to the attack, made every possible effort to avert war; "the disaster of Pearl Harbor was the failure, with attendant increase in personnel and material losses, of the Army and the Navy to institute measures designed to detect an approaching hostile force, to effect a state of readiness commensurate with the realization that war was at hand, and to employ every facility at their command in repelling the Japanese."

Twenty-five recommendations are made in the majority report for organizational reforms in the Army and the Navy and for closer cooperation in Washington among all agencies having to do with our foreign relations. Most of them, as the report says, are simple and fundamental. They recommend unity of command, correlation of intelligence, abolition of interservice jealousies, a scrapping of many of the military shibboleths such as kept subordinate officers on December 6 and 7, 1941—many of whom recognized the crisis—from pressing their views against the inertia of superior officers. This is constructive criticism of the best sort, made by men who had the opportunity to study the causes of Pearl Harbor in more detail and from a mere detached viewpoint than anyone else in the Government.

The Ferguson-Brewster minority findings are almost an exact opposite of the measured, constructive report of the majority. Even facts are tortured in an obvious attempt to prove that all roads of inquiry and censure lead inevitably to the White House. It is a discouring postscript to the investigation and the majority report.

Don't Destroy Our Private Enterprise System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, when the war was successfully concluded the question was and still is, "Can we win the peace and the battle of reconversion or are we to be wrecked on the rocks of inflation or a Government-planned economy of regimentation?"

We have witnessed the planned economy of scarcity, beginning with the killing of pigs; the plowing under of crops; the paying of people for not producing, and the assessing of heavy penalties because farmers raised more precious wheat than the New Deal wanted them to raise, all of which was against the advice of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln and against ordinary common judgment.

We have seen production hamstrung and curtailed through the unwise actions of multiple Government agencies, many created by Executive order, with no long-range program for our economy but rather a program of expediency for the moment, without regard to the future and with a change in program with almost each passing day.

We cannot have prosperity and our American freedom by destroying our system of personal initiative and private enterprise, or by curtailing production so as to create shortages. The government "planned economy" countries had to call upon the United States free, private-enterprise system to supply the manpower and to produce the material necessary to win the war and they are now calling upon this same free-enterprise system of Government to lend them enormous sums of money. If their system of totalitarianism, communism, cr state socialism is a success why do they have to come to our private enterprise system for help?

We should never permit our form of government to be destroyed, either from without or from within. We have saved it from destruction from without, but have we saved it from destruction from within?

We have had 1 year of peace, and what have we accomplished? Domestically, great uncertainty still persists. Under the New Deal many major Government policies have come slowly, but just as certainly, toward complete Government control.

President Truman's latest wage-price policy was a confession of the futility of his earlier policy, which insisted that wages could be materially increased, without accompanying price raises. Later his order provided for material wage increases and that the OPA should promptly provide for increases of price ceilings. This resulted in over 500 OPA price raises between March 1 and June 30, and over 24,000 price increases this year.

The American Federation of Labor openly charged that Communist agents indirectly forced President Truman to issue his wage-price formula which greatly boosted living costs. William Green, President of the American Federation of Labor, said the President broke the hold-the-line policy and then issued his order to deal with the natural consequences of this price raise and that as a result the broken price line would bulge upward and living costs would rise. Mr. Green was right. The President did break the hold-the-line policy. Living costs did rise. Following this we witnessed those in high Government places being unable to reconcile fundamental differences, with the result that conditions grew worse and production of needed goods declined. Unwise OPA action has created most of the shortages we have today. Our economic needs are suffering and no production is sure to wreck the only sane reason for price control—namely, prevention of inflation. There never was a time when shortages did not cause high prices.

In order to conceal the actual cost of living the New Deal resorted to subsidies, amounting to about $2,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money annually. A Government subsidy, as a way of concealing price raises, is the worst of all methods of combating inflation. Prices are not kept down by the payment of subsidies. Subsidies only defer the payment, and add the differences to the national debt, which must be paid by all of us. We do not reduce a family's cost of living by charging the grocery bill instead of paying in cash. Actually we increase the cost, just as we increase the cost of an article bought on installments by adding an interest charge to it. Our Government should protect its solvency; it should not keep on saying, "Charge it" forever, and continue paying interest on the balance as well as on the bill.

Our problems cannot be solved by simply borrowing and spending a few more billions; this only postpones the solution and complicates and makes the actual solution of the problem more difficult, and back of it all rests the preservation of our national security. No amount of artificial devices will save us from the catastrophe of inflation unless the Government gets back to a sound and responsible fiscal policy.

We have a national debt of about $270,000,000,000; we are really living on borrowed money; we are paying about $6,000,000,000 a year interest on our debt, and still the New Deal wants almost unlimited Government subsidies. The fact that we are scraping the bottom of the barrel in an effort to avoid national bankruptcy does not seem to make much difference to bureaucrats. They want to continue to spend and to control.

President Truman has requested appropriations amounting to about $47,000,000,000 for the fiscal year which began on July 1. He has asked for large increases for practically every Government board, bureau, and commission, and the New Deal majority in Congress has passed legislation granting these increased appropriations. Instead of economy the New Deal is giving us added Government spending with its resultant increased waste and extravagance.

It is not surprising that industry, agriculture, and even Government officials themselves, are confused by the sprawling and ponderous New Deal governmental agencies. Many in high governmental positions should be replaced and a few bloodless civilian casualties in Washington among the incompetents would go a long way toward saving our Government.

Ability to get results should be the only test of those placed in charge of governmental efforts. Our work should be directed to saving the United States, and not to saving bureaucrats' faces. We have the resources and productive capacity to save our country if we act wisely. It is high time that Congress insist that government by rules and directives, made by appointed bureaucrats, who have never been elected to office, be stopped, and that we return to a government by law instead of a government by rules and regulations made by bureaucrats.

This was the philosophy of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. It is little wonder that those who believe in this philosophy are getting together in an effort to perpetuate this American philosophy of government.

In announcing that he would not be a candidate for reelection, Democratic Congressman HATTON SUMNERS, of Texas, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, issued a statement based on his 34 years' experience in Congress which furnishes much food for serious thought. Congressman SUMNERS' statement said:

> By ignoring principles and the lessons of history, and accepting the theories of men and political expedience for our guidance, we have made vassals of our States and dependents of our people. By concentration of governmental powers, and drafts upon the Federal Treasury, we have now a financially "busted," great piled up mass of governmental confusion beyond human comprehension, impossible of democratic control, extravagant, wasteful, inefficient, and by its nature the instrumentality of favoritism, tyranny, oppression, and corruption and the destruction of the self-reliance and the self-respect and governmental capacity of the people, qualities without which no people can remain free.

The above-quoted statement of Congressman SUMNERS raises many important questions and demonstrates how near we may be to the precipice of national collapse. To have a sound, stable government is to the interest of all the people. Our very freedom and liberty are at stake. Our property rights are also at stake.

We have over 80,000,000 persons in the United States who own war bonds or stamps. We have over 71,000,000 people who hold life-insurance policies and there are over 17,000,000 people who are savings-bank depositors. All these people have a primary interest in the soundness of their investments, which can be protected and preserved only through a sound, stable government, and anything that undermines or lessens the security of these investments is of grave concern to them.

If inflation increases, if the cost of living goes up, the purchasing power of the dollar goes down. If the purchasing power of the dollar goes down, the value of war bonds and stamps, life insurance and savings accounts goes down in proportion.

If the national debt increases, the threat of greater inflation and the lessening value of securities becomes greater. Therefore the holders of Government securities, insurance policies, and savings accounts are taking a great interest in what goes on in the National Capital and are becoming active in an effort to protect their investments.

The two essentials to protect these investments, as well as our freedom and liberty, are a balanced budget and the production of needed goods so that supply can equal demand. Everyone is adversely affected by governmental waste and extravagance, and conversely, everyone would benefit by rigid governmental economy, a balanced budget, and full production.

Mr. Speaker, after 14 years of complete New Deal control of Congress and all Government policies and actions, it is apparent that the people's investments and liberties and our system of private enterprise, personal initiative, and constitutional government can be saved only by a change in the national administration.

We cannot begin this task too soon.

We should begin by electing a Republican Congress in November.

Time is running, and if we delay too long, we may find that we are too late, and that all is lost.

Remember, that while we have changed riders, its still the same horse and the same stream, and we are still in the middle of it. We should change horses.

Hidden Subsidies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KARL M. LeCOMPTE
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, in the July 16 issue of the Oskaloosa (Iowa) Herald appeared a timely editorial on subsidies that I believe is worthy of publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the comments of Mr. Phil Hoffman, the editor of this outstanding daily paper. We have become so accustomed to subsidies that we frequently make purchases without realizing that the items are partially subsidized with taxpayers' money. Actually, we are paying at the moment only part of the cost of the subsidized item. The remainder must be taken care of by taxes in years to come.

HIDDEN SUBSIDIES

Allowing due credit to the food subsidies for whatever effect they had in helping hold the price line during the war, it certainly is becoming evident the subsidy scheme was one of the most ingenious ever invented for hiding consumer costs.

Now that the termination of the OPA has ended the subsidies, the housewife suddenly has made a discovery. She has discovered that the bonus that was paid to producers to keep up production while food costs were held down, is coming directly from her pocketbook in daily purchases from the milkman and grocery store.

The subsidies were no secret. They have been talked about and written about since their inception. Yet how many housewives when they purchased butter reminded themselves that 12 cents of the cost of a pound was being paid by Uncle Sam through income taxes?

The subsidies were adding a billion or so to the public debt each year. The amount may seem insignificant compared to the total debt of around two hundred and seventy billions. The debt, however, will be with us a long time. When our children become taxpayers they still will be helping pay for the food that we ate during the war.

The Price of Cotton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. McKENZIE
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, last January, when cotton was around 22 cents per pound, Chester Bowles, who was then the Administrator of OPA, wanted to put a ceiling price on that very valuable product of the farm. His idea was that the price should go no higher than 24.09 cents per pound for 15/16 Middling, which at prevailing costs would net the farmer something less than 22 cents an hour for his labor while at the same time workers in industry were getting $1 to $2 per hour. This was just more than could be stood, so I, along with other Members of Congress from the cotton-producing States, strongly protested and opposed any such discrimination against our southern cotton farmers. The result was that no ceiling was placed on raw cotton and today it is quoted at 36 cents per pound. I hope by gathering time it will be 50 cents or even 60 cents per pound, and I shall do everything in my power to get it up to that figure or even higher. Remember, this all happened back in January. It is now almost August and during the past 6 months the price of cotton has gone up more than 14 cents per pound. Where would it have been if we had allowed Chester Bowles and his gang of oppressors to put a ceiling on it?

Being a farmer myself, I know the farmer's problems and I have always maintained that he is the most underpaid man in the world for the work he has to do and for the investment he has to make in land, tools, machinery, equipment, work animals, and livestock, to say nothing about barns, stables, and homes for himself and family. I maintain that any farmer, whether he be a tenant farmer or a land owner, makes less money per hour of work required to do his farming than any other profession or trade in this country. The farmer must be helped and I shall always do my utmost to see that he has no restraints on the price of his products, just as I did in the case of cotton. I repeat, the price is too low, even now, and I hope it goes higher.

Secrets of the Soviet Press

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, many of us have often wondered about news items which appear in the Soviet press, and the motive behind them. Mr. Neal Stanford, writing in the Christian Science Monitor for July 18, 1946, states that he has finally found the answer. I include it as part of this extension and commend it to every Member of this House:

SECRETS OF THE SOVIET PRESS

(By Neal Stanford)

WASHINGTON.—I have finally come across the real key to the Soviet press. It is in the form of a critique the Kremlin recently directed to the 5,600 local papers of the Soviet Union.

Here, in explicit language, the aims of the Soviet press are outlined. Here the weaknesses of the mass of Soviet newspapers are publicly exposed.

The value of this document for Americans lies in its confirmation officially that the Soviet press is but the house organ of the Communist Party. For, understanding that, one can better understand the basis for Soviet press attacks on the United States.

This document can be divided into three parts. The first defines the Soviet raison d'être for a press, based on statements by Lenin and Stalin. The second exposes the flaws and weaknesses of the Soviet provincial press today, mentioning a number by name. The third provides the party line to be followed on domestic and international issues if the press is to justify its existence.

First, purposes of the Soviet press. The document starts off by explaining Comrade Stalin's ideas about the press. "Comrade Stalin," it says, "teaches us that the press is the most important weapon of the (Communist) Party." The press is the party's "weapon of enlightment." It "must eradicate the relics of capitalism in the people's minds." And it must inform the population "correctly" about current events.

After going into detail on these matters, the communique continues: The Soviet press "must stand sentinel for the state interests of the U. S. S. R."; it must "unmask warmongers;" it must "resolutely brand the imperialist policy and practice (of Britain and America) carried out under semblance of showing care for democracy and order" (no reference is made to Russian imperialism and the fait accompli incorporation of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Karelia, Bukovina, Bessarabia, the Polish Ukraine, Carpatho-Ruthenia, or the Kuriles within the Soviet borders).

Lenin's thoughts on the press, even though 28 years old, are next recited to provincial editors as vital and worth remembering, viz., "The press is both mass propagandist and mass organizer; it should link the party to the Government and them both to the masses."

The concluding paragraph of this pastoral letter to the Soviet Union's 5,600 local editors declares: "Party organizations must show more care for papers. The masses cannot be directed without papers. It is the urgent task of the party organizations to improve the work of the papers."

Second, flaws in the local papers of the Soviet Union. Moscow's criticism here centers on international news coverage as well as local news coverage. As for the former, Moscow charges: International events get small space; Soviet foreign policy is not evaluated from the point of view of the interest of the Soviet Union; the imperialism of fascist circles in the United States and Britain is not adequately denounced and exposed.

On the domestic front, Moscow insists: Papers don't write enough about the great creative economic and cultural work of the people; they do not tell adequately about the activity of the party, the Soviet, trade unions; they do not describe glowingly enough Stalin's great new 5-year plan.

Local editors are taken to task for ceasing to publish propaganda articles; for not criticizing boldly and directly the shortcomings in offices and organizations and their heads; for not criticizing lazy workers and bad organization.

Third, the party line. This, too, has both domestic and international angles. As to foreign policy, Moscow informs local editors that imperialist circles of Britain and the United States are stretching tentacles across the oceans; that the press must point out this imperialist expansion and threat to peace, must unmask these new intrigues of monopoly capitalism, must expose these supporters of hotbeds of fascism.

Try and imagine such a document going out from the White House or from Democratic or Republican Party headquarters here and the gulf between American and Soviet concepts of press responsibility becomes more readily visible.

Veterans' Housing in Southern California Bogging Down, Speedy Action Needed

REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON L. McDONOUGH

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, the No. 1 problem in southern California continues to be lack of proper housing facilities for veterans. I would like to read from a report issued by the United States Employment Service whic'. states that the prefabricated house manufacturers are short of materials and cannot sell their product because of their consumers' financing difficulties, the lumber yards are short of material, the Los Angeles County materials manufacturers are affected somewhat by material shortages and some of which are badly in need of key skilled personnel, and outlying building materials companies cannot hire enough labor because the plants are located far from available housing and public transportation.

The general trend is that the veterans' housing program is lagging and that the authority given to Mr. Wyatt through a bill passed by the Congress recently has not resulted in performance to the satisfaction of the people of the Nation, and especially in southern California.

Mr. Wyatt, under the veterans' housing bill, was given the authority to use $600,000,000 in subsidies to stimulate production of building materials, he was given authority to promote and provide training in industry to provide labor. He was given authority to direct and order CPA to grant priorities for materials, OPA to change prices on materials, and ODT to provide transportation for labor and materials, and still the veterans' housing program is bogging down. What more authority does he want? Why does he not use the authority he has been given? Veterans and their families need homes now. Not a year from now.

I have been informed that 30,000 veterans and their families are without decent housing in southern California. Where the need is greatest, that is where Mr. Wyatt should step in and do his job first and best. We built barracks quick enough to train these men for war. Why cannot we now build homes to house them and their families? Many are suffering real hardships. We need efficient action, Mr. Wyatt. What are you going to do about it?

This full report from the United States Employment Service follows:

Plants in southern California which serve the construction industry are not working at full capacity. While difficulty in securing labor is one reason for inability to achieve capacity output, it is by no means the only factor.

These plants can be divided into three groups according to their problem:

Prefabricated house manufacturers which are short of materials and which cannot sell their product because of their customers' financing difficulties;

Lumber yards which are short of material; and

Los Angeles County building materials manufacturers which are affected somewhat by materials shortages and some of which are badly in need of key skilled personnel.

PREFABRICATED HOUSE MANUFACTURERS

The most serious production delays and resultant employment contractions are encountered by the plants manufacturing prefabricated and precut houses. Eight establishments which may eventually employ 1,300 or more workers had only 558 on their pay rolls on May 15.

An analysis of turnover information indicates that labor shortage is not a significant cause of the difficulties. Of the 252 workers who left the employ of these companies in April, 224 or nearly 90 percent were laid off because there was no work for them to do.

Chief causes for these lay-offs are the problems encountered by would-be buyers in financing and building homes. Under present regulations, nonveterans cannot build houses of any kind except in cases of extreme hardship. Most veterans cannot afford to finance home construction by ordinary methods but must rely on the loan provisions of the GI bill of rights. This means that both the houses and the lots on which they are built must fall within specified price limits. Most prefabricated houses meet the Veterans' Administration price requirements but even so manufacturers cannot sell their product because satisfactory lots are not available at approvable prices. Builders of prefabricated houses which are priced above the limits of the veterans' emergency housing program, of course, have the market for their product even more severely limited.

Another factor affecting production at these plants is the generally tight building materials supply situation. Specific shortages reported by individual plants include finish and framing lumber, nails, building hardware, shingles, and other roofing materials, and concrete reinforcing steel.

Despite the unfavorable market for their product, prefabricators do have some job openings. Specific worker needs mentioned by the eight reporting concerns include carpenters and helpers, plumbers, millmen, saw operators, and cabinet makers. There are also some unskilled jobs open which should be attractive to World War II veterans who can join unions without payment of initiation fees. Starting wages for men in unskilled occupations at prefabrication plants range from 87½ cents to $1.25 an hour. One plant operates on a 48-hour week; the other seven work 40 hours a week.

LUMBER YARDS

Establishments which prepare and distribute rough lumber are not as badly off as the prefabricators. They are, nevertheless, restricted in their operations by the shortage of lumber and the severe dislocation of the lumber market. Much of the lumber being used today bypasses the established lumber yards, either going direct from northwestern sawmills to contractors or moving in black-market channels. A survey made in a medium-sized outlying city indicated that 80 to 95 percent of the lumber sold there was sold outside regular channels. In such a market, of course, dealers cannot pick and choose the material they buy. They must accept what they can get and cut and plane it to the specifications of their customers.

All of these difficulties materially affect employment at lumber yards. Nearly 40 percent of the workers who left the employ of seven reporting establishments in April were laid off because of material shortages.

Yard operators are not optimistic about the future. In spite of the fact that demand for their product is virtually unlimited, they expect employment to decline somewhat in the next month and to show a net gain of less than 5 percent in the next 4 months.

Most lumber yards have contracts with the A. F. of L. millmen's and teamsters' unions and do their hiring through the unions and the United States Employment Service. Starting wages range from 85 cents to $1.07 an hour and the workweek ranges from 40 to 48 hours.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY BUILDING MATERIALS PLANTS

Manufacturers of building materials in Los Angeles County are experiencing fewer difficulties than other southern California establishments serving the construction industry. The metropolitan area plants are far behind on their orders and are short of various kinds of materials and classes of skilled labor. The plants are, however, generally able to produce as fast as their present facilities will permit.

Fourteen plants manufacturing a variety of stone, clay, metal, and other mineral products were able to expand their pay rolls 7 percent in the month ending May 15 to 5,734 workers. Despite material and labor shortages there were few occasions on which workers had to be laid off. On the other hand, turn-over of labor is quite high due to the unavoidably hot, heavy, and dirty working conditions in foundries, clay products plants, and similar establishments. Of the 729 workers who were separated from jobs in April (nearly 14 percent of the total pay rolls of the plants) only 5½ percent were laid off. The remainder either quit voluntarily or were discharged for excessive absenteeism or other causes.

Chief materials shortages are metals—steel because of the bituminous coal strike and nonferrous metals because of the work stoppage in copper mines and smelters. Machinery and equipment for replacement and expansion purposes are also very difficult to obtain. Raw materials for stone and clay products are fairly plentiful.

Most severe labor shortages experienced are iron and steel pipe molders and dry process enamelers. One plant is considering an on-the-job training program to help overcome the latter shortages, if the plan is approved, unskilled World War II veterans will be hired for training and eventually upgraded to skilled jobs. Other current labor requirements listed by the reporting plants include combination welders, car loaders, materials handlers, machinists, and sheet-metal helpers. Several plants also have openings for unskilled workers, for both replacement and expansion purposes. Entry wages range from 80 to 98½ cents an hour for a 40- to 45-hour workweek.

Higher Levees Would Protect Rich Farm Land

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I herewith include an article which appeared in the Granite City (Ill.) Press-Record, Monday, July 15, 1946.

In this connection I have requested the Flood Control Committee of the House to adopt a resolution calling on the War Department engineers to survey this situation and make recommendations. It is my hope that early authorization will be given for this work which is so necessary for the protection of several thousand acres of rich farm land in Madison County, Ill.

The Press-Record article follows:

AUTHORIZATION TO RAISE LEVEES IN TWO DISTRICTS SOUGHT—CONGRESSMAN PRICE TAKES UP MATTER; INVOLVES 7,400 ACRES OF LAND

The possibility of improved flood protection in the two small levee districts abutting the proposed Mississippi River navigation channel loomed brighter today when it became known that Congressman MELVIN PRICE is contacting the Committee on Flood Control to initiate the necessary legislative steps.

In a letter to E. F. Wagner, president of the Tri-City Chamber of Commerce, which has taken up the matter at the request of farmers, PRICE pointed out that authorization to raise the existing levees must first be sought since no provision has been made for such work.

Chiefly involved is the Chouteau Island levee and drainage district, which protects approximately 2,400 acres of rich farm land, while the Chouteau, Nameoki, and Venice levee district, which protects about 5,000 acres, is affected to a lesser extent.

In his personal investigation of the problem, Congressman PRICE discussed it with Col. L. B. Feagin, of the United States Engineers, and forwarded to the chamber of commerce, a map and summary of the situation as explained by him.

EFFECTS OF CANAL

Colonel Feagin gave the following description of the canal's effect on surrounding farm land:

"The Chouteau, Nameoki, and Venice drainage and levee district contains approximately 5,000 acres Of this amount, approximately 200 acres in the southern portion and approximately 10 acres in the northern portion of the district will be required for the construction of the proposed canal. The proposed east canal levee will be constructed to a grade and section sufficient to provide flood protection to all lands lying east of the proposed canal, amounting to approximately 4,490 acres, 2 feet above the 1884 flood confined under present conditions. Any changes in the interior drainage facilities of the Chouteau, Nameoki, and Venice drainage and levee district required by the construction of the proposed canal will be made by this office and all costs thereof will be assumed by the Government as part of the construction costs of the proposed canal. That portion of the district lying south of Chouteau slough and west of the proposed canal will retain its present flood protection; moreover, it will be protected on the east by the proposed west canal levee which will be constructed to the same grade and section as the east canal levee.

"The existing Chouteau Island levee and drainage district contains approximately 2,400 acres. Of this amount, approximately 320 acres will be required for the construction of the proposed canal; approximately 380 acres will be protected by the east canal against the 1844 flood confined under present conditions and approximately 1,700 acres will retain their present flood protection. Moreover, this area will be protected on the east by the west canal levee which will be constructed to the same grade as the east canal levee.

"Authorization does not exist and funds are not available to raise the existing Chouteau Island levee. The construction of the proposed canal will in no manner alter the existing flood protection of the Chouteau Island levee and drainage district; therefore, no work could be done on this levee in connection with the construction of the proposed canal."

NEED OF 3-FOOT RAISE

It has been thought at first that the Chouteau Island levee might be raised the necessary 3 feet while the canal is being built, but Colonel Feagin's reply ruled this out.

In neither of these two small levee districts is flood protection adequate for the 7,400 acres they encompass, Wagner said, and Congressman PRICE will seek authorization and funds to prevent further economic waste resulting from periodic floods.

Reactionary Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the New York Times has recently carried several articles by Brooks Atkinson who as a feature writer spent 10 months in Russia. He joins a long line of prominent journalists who now see the danger of Russian imperialism and communistic idealism.

Mr. Atkinson makes the startling charge that Stalin's government is a reactionary one. In the July 16 issue of the Washington Post, Mr. Marquis Childs wrote about the Atkinson articles in a most illuminating manner. As part of my remarks, I include his article:

ATKINSON ON RUSSIA

There are many reasons why Moscow should be angry over the articles written by Brooks Atkinson of the New York Times after 10 months spent in Soviet Russia. But there is one special reason for Russian irritation.

That is because Atkinson says clearly and firmly that the government of the Soviet Union today is a reactionary government. He hits directly at the illusion which many liberals throughout the world have continued to cling to. That is the illusion that the Moscow government must be for the best since it constantly protests that it intends to usher in the millenium for the toiling masses.

It is a hope that dies hard in a world dominated by power, on the one hand, and misery and wretchedness on the other. It is a hope that Americans, with the idealism which is so strong a part of the American character, are peculiarly prone to.

But only those who prefer to be blind can any longer cherish the belief that the government of the Kremlin is anything but reactionary and repressive. Their repressions abroad have become well-known. Atkinson, in his articles, was talking about reaction and stultification at home.

One test he applied was in the arts, a field with which he is familiar through his years as a dramatic critic. He says that the Russian theater is dull, lifeless, unimaginative. This confirms what others have said.

Even in the department in which they excel—the ballet—they lack creativeness. While they have lavish technical resources, they tend to fall back on such hackneyed pieces as Tschaikowsky's Swan Lake. This is in striking contrast with the ballet in this country, which has branched out in all sorts of experimentations—some of it silly, but some of it vigorous and alive.

In literature some good writing came out of the war, on the reportage level, such as Konstantin Simonov's Days and Nights. But this is a long way short of the great tradition of Russian literature, which includes such figures as Tolstoi, Dostoievski, and Chekov, who wrote in spite of the repressions of the czars.

It seems to me that you can apply test after test to show that the regime in Russia is in reality reactionary. Take the position of women, long regarded as the test of the intentions of a society. From the extreme of postcard divorce and legalized abortion, the Soviet Union has swung to the other extreme of repressive laws on birth control and abortion that go along with rewards to mothers for producing many children. The technique used to stimulate population growth resembles in some ways the methods used by Hitler and Mussolini.

When Averill Harriman returned from more than 2 years as Ambassador in Moscow, he reported that never at any time did he attend a function where women were present. Granted the stringencies of the war, nevertheless the atmosphere among the ruling clique seemed to be one of harem-like separation between men and women. Women in the Soviet Union do, of course, the same work that men do; and during the war they fought side by side with men, showing the same courage and resistance.

The most disturbing note in Atkinson's articles did not concern this reactionary quality. After all, we got along with a reactionary czarist regime and we should be able to get along with this regime. The most disturbing statement he makes is that the small group in the Politburo, the governing power in Russia today, suffers from such a complex of suspicion and isolationism that it amounts to group paranoia.

Hitler and the men around him suffered out of fear and suspicion from a paranoiac compulsion to conquer the world. Their pathological suspicions would never let them accept peace on any other basis than total rule. If what Atkinson says of Russia is even partly true, then the world is indeed in a bad way, and any peace must be merely a pause between wars.

Reactionaries here in our own country will be gladdened by this newest confirmation of the flaws in the Russian system. They will probably ignore Atkinson's advice to his own countrymen:

"In competition with Russia, which is a dynamic force in the world, we have to maintain our supremacy by growth that is also dynamic. We have to increase production and raise standards of living on a dynamic scale.

We have a chance such as rarely comes in the history of any people to show what a free democracy can achieve in the good life. Instead, at this moment we seem to be heading toward the old boom-and-bust cycle.

The Spending Goes On

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUBERT S. ELLIS
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the amount of the national debt, $272,000,000,000, the colossal figures involved in lend-lease of approximately $40,000,000,000—50 percent of which was planned waste and made no contribution to the war effort—the British loan of $3,375,000,000 and the loan of billions to other nations, we are inclined to become somewhat confused and overlook what the Truman administration would probably call "small change."

The significance of this program, which has been carried out almost unnoticed by the average American citizen, and the phase I wish to emphasize today is that the people were told through the radio, press, and pictures that the money was to feed and clothe starving people, to which no one objected.

Now, the story is gradually coming to light that the food and material supplied by the "sweat, blood, and tears" of the American taxpayer and worker has been used for various and sundry political purposes by the bandit rulers now riding roughshod over the helpless peoples of the earth.

It is revealed that through UNRRA we have furnished Tito's Yugoslavia textile mills with wool and cotton to make uniforms for the oversized army of between 500,000 and 800,000 soldiers.

We find we have delivered billions of dollars in food and supplies behind Russia's "iron curtain" to be used to feed their communistic friends who are cooperating, while others starve or get along as best they can.

The amazing thing is that the administration leadership in the Congress has stalled every effort to make information available to the people of this country and to have an accounting of the sordid mess. However, the spending goes on at a rapid pace and the clearing office for foreign transactions—Department of Commerce—reported that this country provided $536,000,000 in relief aid to other countries during the first 3 months of this year, which is more than we have spent for veterans' compensation and old-age pensions, and estimated that by July 1, 1947, the total probably would exceed $4,500,000,000.

Of all supplies furnished, 62 percent was food, 15 percent clothing, textiles, and footwear, the rest agricultural and industrial items. It is interesting to note that American farm machinery is available in most foreign countries while our own farmers are denied a sufficient supply.

The United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration sent overseas $371,000,000, or 81 percent of the total; the War Department, $95,000,000; Italian lend-lease, $50,000,000; Italian non-troop pay, $17,000,000; Danish relief, $1,000,000, and the Navy Department, $2,000,000.

Three-fourths of the total relief expenditures went to Europe, principally Italy, which received $570,000,000. Other recipients were the Balkans, $430,000,000; France, $225,000,000; Belgium and the Netherlands, $140,000,000 each; Czechoslovakia, $85,000,000; Soviet Russia, $60,000,000; Austria and Germany together, $100,000,000; Pacific and far eastern areas, $149,000,000.

It is easily understood how this drain on our production tends to make commodities scarce in our markets and consequently drives up prices. To this tremendous burden will be added the $3,750,000,000 in merchandise which was granted to England, and the current press informs us that England is drawing on us immediately for $300,000,000 of the loan, which will be spent in our markets for merchandise already scarce, and likewise, will drive prices higher and continue the scarcity.

To repeat a portion of my statement made a few days ago, this spending will continue until an incensed electorate decides to correct the unholy situation.

Freedom Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANGIER L. GOODWIN
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, there is so much cold logic and common sense in a recent editorial from the Medford (Mass.) Courier, that I bring it to the attention of my colleagues by inserting it with these remarks:

FREEDOM NEEDED

Proponents of OPA tell us that already prices have taken a sharp upward trend. That was to be expected.

Proponents of OPA tell us that OPA should be revived in all of its price controls to prevent inflation. What has caused inflation? Why have prices risen, if OPA statements are true? Why did prices steadily rise while OPA was in full force?

Before we had OPA we had no black markets. We had price fluctuations; articles which were scarce may have risen in cost until supply caught up with demand. Then prices were restored until supply caught up with demand. Then prices were restored to normal.

If it costs more to manufacture an article today than it cost last year, or 10 years ago, we expect to pay the added cost. The consumer pays these increases and always has paid them. If a wage increase is granted the miners, the householders who buy coal pay for the increase just as much as the industry that requires coal to turn out its products. When we raise wages we increase the cost of production and the cost of the finished product to the public.

During the war we thought we were paying top wages and top prices. There was a shortage of manpower and industry was bidding high for more workers. When war ceased and manpower became plentiful, did wages drop back to prewar years? Not at all. Strikes came for higher and higher wages—and many strikes were successful.

There are still far too many persons unemployed despite industry seeking more workers. Our whole economic system is badly out of adjustment. It is wrong to pay men to loaf while jobs are crying for them.

When the Government set prices for commodities and asked the public to hold to those prices, it was not ethical for the Government to go into the market and pay far higher prices for its own supplies.

No, there were black markets before OPA. And there will be no black markets when OPA is definitely out of the picture. There will be sharp price rises—but only temporarily, until supply sources catch up with demand. Under OPA, black markets are bound to continue and shortages of staple goods are certain to continue. People who need and require certain articles of food and clothing will buy in the black market or buy anywhere they can get it. A person whose life or the life of his wife or child, depend upon diet isn't wasting much thought on the price he pays for subsistence. There are few families in which restricted diet does not play a part today.

Where is the milk and the cream and the butter and the bread and the sugar which is needed in every growing child's diet? Why are there butter lines and sugar lines and bread lines?

If our Nation, under individual initiative, has grown to its present position in the world because the common man controls government, why follow in the steps of those countries where government controls the common man? We know what has happened to them and we have given thousands upon thousands of our boys to the end that freedom and liberty shall continue.

Bullitt Attacks Russia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LAWRENCE H. SMITH
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, Frank R. Kent, prominent columnist, reviews briefly William C. Bullitt's book, The Great Globe Itself. Hardly anyone in American life has a better knowledge of Russia and what has been transpiring in that country for the past 10 years. Mr. Bullitt has leveled some devastating charges against the Soviet. His book should be read by all who are interested in Russia and its relationship to other countries.

Mr. Speaker, as a part of my remarks I include the article by Mr. Kent:

In a recent summary of William C. Bullitt's just-published book, "The Great Globe Itself," a foreword says that "unquestionably it will become a major topic of discussion." To even a casual reader this will appear an understatement.

If the considerable number of extremely articulate persons in this country who insist that sympathetic understanding and friendship with Russia is the only means by which we can promote peace in the world and international cooperation become a reality do more than discuss Mr. Bullitt's book, it will, indeed, be remarkable. For as trenchant, documented, and convincing an indictment of the Russian leaders, their methods, and their purposes has not before been made.

Great weight is given the Bullitt charges, first, because they come from a man who not only knows well modern Russia and the men who run that country but who is a student of Russian history and an admirer of the Russian people; second, because the author was the first American Ambassador to Russia after our long-delayed recognition in 1934. He went to Moscow openly friendly to the Soviet experiment.

DISILLUSIONED IN RUSSIA

His disillusionment came while he was there—the result of close personal contact with the operations of the Russian system and personal experience with the Russian rulers. It has been greatly increased by their ruthless and aggressive policies (in clear violation of the Atlantic Charter, which Stalin endorsed) following the end of the war and by their general course in every international gathering from the Yalta Conference on down to the recent meeting in Paris. The chronology of the acts and attitude here presented seem an unassailable basis for Mr. Bullitt's views.

In effect, he charges that the period after a war for the Soviet Government is not a period to make peace but to prepare for war; that the primary, compelling, and unchangeable motive of the Government is the spread of communism throughout the world; that it conceives its own safety is involved in this as it is convinced that Russian communism cannot survive for long by the side of the capitalistic countries; that it is unalterably hostile to foreigners; that it signs treaties and makes agreements not with any idea of keeping them but only because they appear expedient at the time; that Stalin grossly deceived Mr. Roosevelt when he pledged himself not to promote communism in this country; that the Soviet word is not good; that the Russian rulers regard everything, including fraud, deceit, and murder, as justifiable to perpetuate their own power and promote the Communist purpose.

WARFARE ALWAYS

"In the eyes of the Soviet Government," writes Mr. Bullitt, "the Soviet Union is always engaged in warfare, open or concealed, with the non-Communist states of the world. And where it embraces in friendship a non-Communist government, it is always with the ultimate intention of driving a dagger in its back. That is why Stalin is unappeasable. That is why Mr. Roosevelt's 'great design' was foredoomed to failure. That is why, for our own self-preservation, we must face the fact that Stalin, like Hitler, will not stop but can only be stopped."

These are terrific charges, particularly at this stage when such great—though apparently futile—efforts are being made to get Russia to cooperate wholeheartedly in the cause of peace and in the complete control of atomic energy. Certainly, it is true that far greater progress toward these goals would have been made in the past year but for the obstructions offered by the Soviet representatives. Mr. Bullitt is neither an irresponsible nor a reckless man. He presents facts to support his contentions. He is a detached man without a grievance and no cause to serve other than the truth. Such a book by such a man cannot easily be passed over.

SUPERIOR FORCE NECESSARY

Undoubtedly, he will be denounced by those who resent any reflection on the honor and purity of the Russian leaders. Nevertheless, the book is well calculated to increase the number of those who believe as Mr. Bullitt belives, that the only way to deal with the Soviet rulers is by confronting them with superior force.

"The most legitimate use of force on earth," says Mr. Bullitt, "is to gain time to permit the growth of moral ideas. It will take some time for moral ideas to grow in the Soviet Union. There is no way to prevent it from conquering non-Communist states during that time except the hard way of keeping it constantly confronted by superior force."

It is interesting that the series of articles recently appearing in the New York Times by Brooks Atkinson, just returned after a year as Times corr spondent in Moscow, fully sustains Mr. Bullitt's view that friendship with Russia is impossible and that for us to hope for mutual sympathetic understanding is to delude ourselves. It is also interesting that the appearance of the Bullitt book coincides with the recent attack by Attorney General Clark on Communists in this country and his reference to a vicious plot to destroy our Government. For these remarks, the Lawyers' Guild (which has a heavy Communist flavor) passed denunciatory resolutions condemning Mr. Clark as a "Red baiter."

Clergy Praise Secretary Byrnes' Stand for Just Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the Washington Post this morning, July 22, entitled "Clerics Praise Byrnes' Stand for Just Peace," written by Mr. Robert Tate Allan:

CLERICS PRAISE BYRNES' STAND FOR JUST PEACE

(By Robert Tate Allan)

Religious figures yesterday lauded Secretary of State Byrnes and Senator CONNALLY, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, for their insistence upon a just peace settlement.

Clerics referred to the statesmen's speeches of the past week in sermons and in statements. Dr. Gerhard E. Lenski, pastor of Grace Lutheran Church, Sixteenth and Varnum Streets NW., based his sermon on the last paragraph of Byrnes' radio talk of Monday night:

"We do not believe in a peace based on a desire for vengeance. We believe in justice, charity, and mercy. If we act with charity and mercy, those we fear as enemies may become our friends. We must trust to the healing processes of peace and pray that God in His mercy will give peace to the world."

PEACE MUST BE SOUGHT

Preaching at a service broadcast from the church over WINX, Dr. Lenski declared:

"This is a fine, a noble, and an inspired utterance. It sets forth the ideals we cherish for our country and which we seek to realize in world affairs. We are not out to kill, to coerce, to exact our pound of flesh. We are not they who scorch the earth, starve the people, confine them in concentration camps, create a desert and then call the silence 'peace.'

"Peace does not come automatically not even to well-meaning and high-minded people," Dr. Lenski reminded. "It must be sought after, it must be created and made, it must be protected and encouraged."

Dr. Lenski said, "Christians must maintain peace among themselves and build peace into their own daily relationships; must build peace together, by accepting the redemption unto peace which is theirs through faith in Christ."

The three things which Byrnes praised most—justice, charity, and peace—are the truths which the church stands for, the minister said, and added:

"Let 135,000,000 Americans become Christians, working for peace in and through the church, and peace will become a power in our world too strong to be upset by demagog or dictator or demolition bombs."

USES SAME QUOTATION

The same quotation from Byrnes' speech also was used by Dr. Earl Franklin Fowler, minister of the Sixth Presbyterian Church, Sixteenth and Kennedy Streets NW.

"If the peace we so dearly have is only a mere machination of the mind of man it shall fail," said Dr. Fowler in his sermon, "for the law of the universe is that order and vengeance is the Lord's."

Rabbi Solomon H. Metz, spiritual leader of Adas Israel Congregation, joining in the praise of the statesman's remarks, quoted from the Talmud:

" 'Civilization rests on three things—truth, justice, and peace. Without truth, there can be no justice and without justice there will never be any peace.' " He said, "Truth and justice rules out prejudice and vengeance."

The Reverend Maurice Sheehy, head of Catholic University's religious education department, commented:

"Our representatives at the peace conference will be fighting to preserve Christian culture in the world. They will, I am confident, exemplify the spirit of love which is Christianity."

As the Rev. Luther J. Holcomb spoke at Luther Rice Memorial Baptist Church, 5315 North Capitol Street, he held a clipping from the front page of Saturday's Washington Post: "CONNALLY says United States opposes asking crushing reparations."

NEGATIVE RESOLUTIONS DEPLORED

Pastor Holcomb said Christian groups should stop passing negative resolutions and give themselves wholeheartedly to making the world a better place in which to live. "We cannot afford to let historians record that we worked harder to win a war than we worked to win a peace," he stated.

The Reverend Roscoe Brown Fisher, pastor of St. Stephen's Lutheran Church, Lenoir, N. C., and visiting minister at Reformation Lutheran Church, interviewed on the Capital Church Comment program over WINX, said:

"We of the church have a definite interest in the thinking and planning of those who run our Government and shape our international policies, for we do know what they do affects the last one of us directly or indirectly."

ATOM BOMB A WARNING

The cleric termed the statesmen's addresses "thought-provoking and constructive" and said church folks are much concerned with the extent God is brought into national and international affairs.

The Reverend J. Brooke Mosley, director of the Washington Episcopal Diocesan Relations Department, told worshipers at the Washington Cathedral:

" • • • Christian faith must become the redemptive center around which all man's social and national and international life must be planned. It is especially obvious in these days, with the atomic destruction of two Japanese cities in the summer of 1945, a new era began in which men can see more clearly than ever before that the broad path and the wide path does lead to destruction."

Communism Through Screen and Stage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include herein a statement by Frank Fay, the noted actor of stage and film.

The American people are hereby given a glimpse of what is taking place inside the theater world by a well-known actor. People may doubt the charge that communism is infiltrating our population through film and stage but here is ample proof of its truth. This article is from the New York Journal-American for July 8, 1946:

FAY URGES ACTORS TO ACT NATURALLY—STAR TELLS HOW HE GOT HIS START

(By Frank Fay)

The reason for the following résumé of past events, to say nothing of lay-offs, is simply this: Anyone having had my experience would of necessity know with authority when they were in a spot, which I am at the moment in my endeavor to occupy the space of George Jean Nathan.

Seriously, and I am really serious—terrible things are happening to and in our American theater, brought about by the infiltration of communism and its cohorts. Specifically, incompetent performances in shows, plays, and musicals, mostly Molotovian and highly controversial, with the palming off of amateurs as professionals. Much of this is made possible through schools, groups, guilds, leagues, little theater movements—many of which are fostered by Red front organizations and their operators, teachers, and coaches.

In our Actors' Equity Association it is the rule that you must be 2 years a junior member, with no vote, under jurisdiction of the association, with 50 weeks' actual experience on the stage before you are elected a senior member. If you get your 50 weeks of actual experience within 2 years, O. K. But whether it is 2 years or more, you must have the actual 50 weeks' experience before you are a senior and can vote. This is done primarily to protect the public and the seniors who have earned their professional spurs.

Fortunately, most shows with Stalin-steered backing are glorious failures. But the Red backers are not too concerned if the shows are a success or not, as long as they can help their workers get their 50 weeks' experience—and the vote. You will have noticed that many critics in their reviews of late made mention of the fact that this or that show was thickly populated with bit players (small parts).

There is now a movement on foot to cut down this 50 weeks' rule of Equity. If that should ever happen I am sure the vast majority of seniors as well as the theatergoers will insist that casts be at least 75 percent seniors. This is only fair to the public. I am sure no one would pay top prices to see amateur baseball. Then why pay it in the theater for amateurs, amateurs who are working for a cause that has for its aim the overthrow of our country and its Constitution?

Please, however, do not get the impression that any senior is not sympathetic toward the genuine novice or junior. He is and always has been. But he realizes in many cases today that novices in the theater are, knowingly or unknowingly, herded into communism with the promise of a successful career in the theater.

By way of helping the junior, I should like to offer a bit of advice:

I have never cared for drama leagues, schools of acting, voice culture, finishing courses, and the like—particularly if the ultimate hope is success in the theater. Simply because I am an advocate, in the theater at least, of being natural or having the ability to act naturally. Too, it has been my experience since a child (Babes in Toyland, remember) that to appear natural on the stage one must learn under pressure or, in the vernacular, one must "do it the hard way." That, of course, means starting out professionally, taking what you might get, good or bad, "flopping," being "let out," trying again, being embarrassed, hurt, licked, giving up, going back again. But always learning, noticing, and remembering at least what not to do.

This method, of course, seems heartbreaking. But it isn't really, if you will remember with all your efforts, failures, mistakes, and heartbreaks, you are getting experience and skipping grades as a "professional"—asking no quarter and most certainly getting none. Wow! What a battle!

But true theater can be so wonderful. We know there are less opportunities to be an actor. With the result you are lucky if you get a chance to "try," to be "fired," and "come back again," to get experience.

But it can be done, if you wipe out the cliques, intimidation centers, Red schools, groups, guilds, leagues, little theater movements as well as Red theatrical agents and producers. Remember, all this is just part of a hatchery for communism. And even the most devoted Red must admit, communism with its "mass production," "no God," "state," "regimentation," etc., can only blight the art of acting, expression, individuality, originality, and naturalness without propaganda.

This is all obvious truth. To prove it, you have only to stop and check on the really fine artists who have "slowed up" and fallen by the wayside—the Broadway side—in the last 5 years, when they went "pink" and, forgive me, just disgusting. This ilk of actors—and some managers—have opened the way for a lot of talentless and bathless amateurs to enter through the back door, the stage door, with nothing more to offer than a bad breath and a "message"—from Marx.

This, in my opinion, is one of the prime factors for the shrinkage of worth-while theater.

With so many of these misfits using their divided aspiration formula to "get on the stage," any number of really talented aspirants are kept from their goal. But don't let that annoy you in the least. You who are sincere and worthy can, I feel sure, succeed—regardless of any intrigue and spotted favoritism.

So, get talented—work, study, try, and with the theater truly coming into its own again, you who are sincere and worthy can help so much with the "coming." Going about "being of the theater" in the right way will help to quicken the complete and inevitable black-out of communism within our shores.

One thing more: If by chance this article should fall into the mitts of some of the nits of Stalin, let me, as a many-seasoned trouper warn you that nothing in the theater can take the place of talent.

National Petroleum Council and the Antitrust Laws

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JERRY VOORHIS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the American people fully realize that the necessities of war sometimes require overlooking personalities when seeking to secure maximum production. During the war many oilmen served on committees with the Government even though just prior thereto they had been involved in antitrust lawsuits with the Government.

However, looking forward to peace and a return of the competitive system the Government should be most careful in the personnel it picks from industry.

Recently the Department of the Interior announced the appointment of a National Petroleum Council to work with its Oil and Gas Division. I was curious to know who thereon have been involved in anti-trust-law violations, and hence submitted the matter to the Attorney General. His reply is most informative and I submit same for everyone's careful study.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. JERRY VOORHIS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JERRY: I have your letter of June 29, 1946, enclosing the press release of the Department of the Interior regarding the formation of the National Petroleum Council and requesting that I forward to you a brief statement as to the antitrust cases in which the members of the Council have been involved.

In reply to your request I transmit herewith a compilation prepared by the Antitrust Division from our records showing Antitrust and Elkins Act cases involving some of the members of the Council and the corporations with which they are now or heretofore have been connected. Our records fail to disclose any case or cases involving the names followed with the notation "no record."

With kind personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
Acting Attorney General.

Price Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. PRICE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, as I peruse the newspapers which I daily receive in my office from the various cities in my congressional district, I find evidence that the people back home are gravely aware that unless price controls are maintained through these critical months of reconversion the Nation faces a "boom and bust" period leading to an ultimate depression that will dwarf the dark days of 1929 and through the early thirties.

I take this time of the House to congratulate the membership of the Progressive Mine Workers of America for the farsightedness they are showing in these troubled times.

Before a mass meeting of the Progressive Miners held in Springfield, Ill., recently, John B. Marchiando, president of the organization, let it be known that the coal miners stood ready to go all out in a fight for retention of price controls. He called for banding together of labor for an active campaign to preserve the value of "the few dollars the workingman saved during the war."

President Marchiando urged all consumers to take concerted action in a buyers' strike against spiraling prices. He said the removal of price controls was a stab in the back of consumer families. The leader of the Progressive Miners brought out a point well worth the study of Members of this House when he asserted:

> Many manufacturing firms have sufficient supplies, but goods are being held back until the OPA is completely abandoned or hamstrung to permit prices at the highest level the market will bear.

I am happy to see the working people of the Nation aroused over this issue. It is fitting that they should take the lead in the fight to revive price controls, because it will be the salary man and his family who will have the most to lose by premature lifting of controls.

I have been a consistent supporter of price controls since I have been a Member of Congress, and I am proud of the fact that I voted against every crippling amendment to OPA. It was the day those crippling amendments were adopted in the House that the opponents of price control scored their victory. From that day on, the legislation went from bad to worse, until it reached the point that in all honesty it became necessary for the President to veto the so-called price-control bill.

Personally, I join with the action of the Progressive Mine Workers in their fight for price controls, and I am hopeful that shortly in this House I will have another opportunity to cast a vote in the interest of the consumers of America.

Permanent Commissioned Rank for Army Nurse

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, for many long years the Army Nurse Corps has labored under almost intolerable handicaps. In its beginnings it was considered more as a necessary nuisance than as a respected part of the medical division. Incredible as it may seem, it is completely true that at the time we were organizing our Army hospitals for the First World War, the then Chief of Staff announced at a conference that "Women have no place in the Army."

In spite of his archaic attitude and because discipline in the adequate care of the sick and wounded was impossible without a visible sign of the nurse's authority on the wards, a curious anomaly called relative rank was created. It carried with it much responsibility but no privileges nor perquisites, creating a situation in which Army nurses were neither fish, flesh, nor foul. But it was the best that could be wrung from the "brass hats" and the Congress.

World War No. II found us with an imperative need to put the Army Nurse Corps on a plane that would attract the best nurses in the country. Only a recognized and dignified position as part of the Army itself could do that. It was a most tragic thing, Mr. Speaker, that so recently as this crucuial moment in Army history certain members of the Military Affairs Committee of this House were unable to set aside their out-moded prejudices reminiscent of 1917—that women have no place in the Army—and so would agree to giving them only temporary status as commissioned officers while the emergency was on. Even then a promise was held out that long before "the duration and 6 months thereafter" should be over legislation adequate to the situation would be forthcoming. Before and since that legislation passed the Congress, knowing the gravity of the situation that will arise immediately upon the cessation of hostilities, I have done all possible to bring the matter to the active attention of the Secretary of War and to others in authority.

I have also insisted to the Surgeon General and the Chief of the Army Nurse Corps that action had to be pressed for. Both the Surgeon General and Colonel Blanchfield have been making every effort to fulfill their obligations to the sick and wounded under their care and to the splendid women who have done such magnificent service during the war, as well as to those who must take their places.

The fantastic course of this vitally needed legislation is an illustration of what is difficult to describe except as "inexcusable delays reaching proportions of maladministration" on the part of those in high places.

Let me trace for you the course so far taken by this important legislation:

After most careful study on the part of the Medical Division, the proposed bill left that office on the 16th of November 1945 for the commanding general of the Army Service Forces. Almost 2 weeks later—November 29, 13 days to be exact—it arrived at G–1. Nothing further was heard of it until December 10 when it reached the general staff division—G–3—for comment. Knowing that it was of great moment in the whole program of the care of our armies, I have followed it as closely as I could.

Not until January 8 did G–1 have a conference with the various members of the Office of the Surgeon General to request additional information and justification of the lieutenant colonels, majors, captains, physicians, therapists, dietitions, and occupational therapists working on the proposed legislation. On January 29, 1946, these justifications were submitted to G–1 by the Surgeon General.

Nothing further happened for another 3 weeks. Then on February 18 G–1 held a conference with the representatives of the Adjutant General's Office and the Surgeon General's Office regarding such matters as retirement benefits, marriage, the use of the sliding scale for integration purposes, and so forth. Differences relative to certain retirement and age matters were adjusted on February 26.

Again the legislation disappeared. Questions on my part elicited only evasions and one or two amazing refusals to acknowledge the very existence of any proposed bill. I finally found that General Paul, G–1, and General Kirk, Surgeon General, conferred on March 16.

Six weeks of complete darkness followed their conference. Then suddenly the bill mysteriously reappeared in another conference of G–1 and the Surgeon General's Office—a sequel to their conference of February 18, 2½ months earlier.

Not until June 1 was the bill available to be taken for oral approval to General Eisenhower, nor was it moved on from there in its course by G–1 until June 12, 1946, on which date it finally left G–1 on its slow course to the Legislative and Liaison Division for what I find is called "processing to the Congress." It is difficult to imagine the devious path it had to travel to keep it from reaching the Bureau of the Budget until June 26.

Inquiries made at the Bureau of the Budget at first elicited complete ignorance of its existence, then an attitude that a mere Congressman had no business asking such questions, then great boredom and complete lack of interest in the possible disintegration of this vital part of our armed service.

Finally, I was informed that the bill was received by the Budget on either June 25 or 26 and that further justifications had been asked for. Two more precious weeks had passed during this last period of G–1 responsibility.

I am now informed that on today, July 22, this imperatively needed proposed bill was again returned to the Army but that it is promised that it will reach the Military Affairs Committee late this afternoon or tomorrow. As yet I have no actual confirmation of its receipt by the Legislative and Liaison Division nor of its having been checked in by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, it would seem a gross piece of negligence and maladministration that a bill upon which the future status of the Army Nurse Corps depends should have left the Medical Department with unanimous concurrence on November 16, 1945, and at this late date should not have reached the Military Affairs Committee, which has signified it will consider no further business. Obviously it is too late to be thoughtfully considered by the committee, granted a rule, and acted upon by this body.

What the results of failure on the part of the Army to expedite the preparation of legislation to insure to one of its most vital corps, which for more than 50 years has been an integral part of its structure, a dignified, respected, and self-respecting position is impossible to estimate.

I am bringing this to the attention of the House in order to have it clear to the nurses of the corps itself and to nurses who would gladly join up if their status were assured that lack of action at this time is not due to negligence on the part of the Surgeon General nor lack of action on the part of Congress. If it is due to archaic methods of procedure in the War Department and the Army, these should be changed forthwith.

United Mine Workers Expose OPA Mistakes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, at this moment the House of Representatives is concerned with some more proposed OPA legislation. The propaganda factories have painted OPA as a friend of the common people and some of its policymakers have been pictured as literally without sin.

It cannot be denied that the United Mine Workers is a militant labor organization which has for its primary purpose the welfare of the men who labor in the coal mines. It is rather noteworthy when the United Mine Workers Journal comments editorially on the OPA situation, as it did on July 15, 1946. Mr. K. C. Adams, the editor, in that issue, in discussing the mistakes of the OPA, has this to say:

DON'T BE DECEIVED!

The OPA is dead for all practical intents and purposes. The OPA was killed from within, not from without.

The bill passed by the Senate, and which likely will be accepted by the House, is phony in concept—impractical of application—and will provide few benefits outside of rent control to consumers in the working and middle classes. The exemption of livestock, poultry, eggs, dairy products, fats, oils, grains, feeds, tobacco, petroleum and its products means that 60 percent of the cost of living of the working classes will be left to open running and will enjoy free marketing until price spirals force buyers' resistance, resulting in natural economic forces restoring normality.

The price increases on food products during the past 2 weeks have resulted from a three-way process:

1. The end of Government subsidies on meat, dairy products, and other foodstuffs.

2. Anxiety of the consumers to purchase the meats and other foods they have been unable to buy.

3. Greed of the profiteers to raise prices and reap profits to the level of the black market.

It was a foregone conclusion of those in the know that when President Truman entrusted the management of legislating the continuance of the OPA, unimpaired for another year, to Chester Bowles—probably the most despised by consumer, distributor, and manufacturer, to say nothing of congressional hate, of any man in Government service—that the OPA was on the road to certain death.

As might have been expected, Bowles bowed out, leaving President Truman holding the bag. Bowles quit his job but didn't quit his gab. He continued in the role of a yelping, bluffing bigot, evidencing unmatchable egotism at every turn of events. Maybe, in the end, the price the common folks will have to pay for Bowles' riddance will come high but, generally speaking, we believe the people as a whole will feel that the Bowles departure is good riddance.

Bowles knows nothing of productive work. He is destitute of understanding as to how the economic production and distribution machinery of the Nation revolves. His life had been devoted to the shifty business of an advertising agency, living on 15 percent commissions from newspapers, magazines, and radio. Bowles was typical of the unrooted pavement parasites who live like orchids in hot air.

The idea of entrusting price control to phrase carpenters, word jugglers, and paper shufflers is the symptom of what's the matter with America today. What the country needs is big men on big jobs who have had grease on their hands and sweat on their shirts. Only this kind of men know how to make a country click.

Bowles, himself, granted more than 400 price increases since VJ-day. An investigation of the OPA's leaking seams during Bowles' administration whereby favoritism was played in granting price increases would, if the facts were fully developed, shock the country.

Let's take the case of the coal-town company stores. In January 1945 as a result of a perfectly executed double play in which two OPA divisions were outwitted and stymied, the Koppers Coal Co. and the Island Creek Coal Co. were permitted to lift their company store ratings from the No. 3 margin bracket to No. 1, in which category these company stores would enjoy the highest retail margin of profit allowed under OPA price controls. Forty-two stores were involved. The increased net margin of profits resulting averaged between 5 and 12 percent.

The applications of these two coal companies were rejected by the local board and regional office of OPA in Cleveland, Ohio. In the Koppers Co. case the rejection was based on the disclosure that over-all net profits amounted to 7.69 percent, which the regional board declared "is substantially above the minimum required to continue operation." The findings of the board showed that tricky bookkeeping methods were practiced. Even the Washington office of OPA found that the Koppers Co. had prematurely put higher prices into effect and refused to furnish necessary factual information to permit determination of its application upon its merit.

But, despite all these facts, the OPA permitted these two companies, as well as others, to lift their classification to higher profit margins which resulted in plucking millions of dollars from coal miners during the past 18 months.

The Journal on several occasions endeavored to interview Mr. Bowles, as did other representatives of the mine workers to ascertain why this skulduggery at the cross roads was permitted. Mr. Bowles declined to see anyone representing the UMWA. Until this good day, Bowles has never offered an explanation of this infamous act.

Despite Mr. Bowles' refusal to be interviewed, the Journal has an idea of how the increases might have come about. Both the Koppers Co. and the Island Creek Co. have paid representatives and good political contacts, as well as friendly Congressmen in Washington.

There are said to be hundreds of individual coal-producing companies, lumber companies, and individual companies in practically every line throughout the Nation which have chiseled price increases for their products in a like manner during Bowles' administration. Thus, it isn't any wonder that thousands of consumers and business competitors, as well as a majority of the Members of Congress, had concluded well in advance of the date of the expiring life of the OPA that price control under Bowles was a transparent fraud.

Minneapolis Grocers Holding Price Line

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of July 17, 1946:

CITY GROCERS HOLDING LINE, CHECK SHOWS—95 PERCENT OF ITEMS SELL BELOW OPA PRICES, TRIBUNE SURVEY BARES

(By Larry Fitzmaurice)

Since commodity price control terminated June 30, Minneapolis housewives have had a stabilizing influence against price inflation of grocery-stone items, a survey indicated Tuesday.

The Minneapolis Tribune made a spot check of prices in effect on so-called market-basket items in effect in the average grocery, chain stores, and independent supermarkets, compared them with the last ceiling prices posted by OPA and here are the results: There has been no noticeable mark-up on the standard items sold in the average store.

Ninety-five percent of staples are continuing to be sold at retail prices below those in effect when OPA was still operating.

Not more than a dozen staples has risen beyond OPA listings.

The corner grocery, the chain store manager, or the supermarket proprietor will tell you that Mrs. Consumer has been watching him like a hawk since OPA ended.

COMPETITION FEARED

For the first time in several years grocers are getting afraid of competition, they admit.

The Tribune submitted an OPA community price list, which was in effect during the closing days of price control, to representative grocers in the four group classifications for a comparison with price tabs across their shelves Tuesday.

There have been some price increases.

On the other hand some fluctuating items have been reduced in price.

A check of the 500 to 1,000 items a store carries would indicate that the average over-all prices still range between 5 and 8 percent below what OPA was authorizing when price control on foods ended.

EXCEPTIONS CITED

Meat, butter, cheese, milk, canned seafoods, salad dressing, sirup, jams and jellies, canned and fresh fruits were the principal exceptions.

The grocers were candid enough to concede "some gouging" has been done on scarce articles.

Housewives have been on their toes for weeks over a projected price rise in coffee.

Under OPA the price range for the popular brands of coffee was 33 to 36 cents ceiling. You could still buy the best coffee in town Tuesday at 34 and 35 cents.

The same could be said for tea. Under OPA the community ceiling was about 30 cents for 4 ounces. A popular brand was available in most stores Tuesday at 27 cents.

Among the highly competitive brands of cereals, baby foods, canned vegetables, bread and soups, Mrs. Consumer can still get a bargain at almost any store she trades.

During the present transition from price control to free and open competition the grocers said there is hardly a reputable storekeeper among their number who is willing to risk the hazards of charging too much.

The small independent stores are "shopping" their neighborhood competitor, the chain stores' professional shoppers are scouting each other and the independent supermarkets are shopping all of them.

All admit a fear customers will think the grocer is taking advantage of the situation.

Eggs are a good representative example of what's happening in the average grocery. For weeks prior to the termination of OPA the fresh, large grade had a ceiling of 50 and 51 cents a dozen. A half a dozen different class stores in widely separated parts of Minneapolis Tuesday were selling the grade at 48 and 49 cents.

Soaps, despite the scarcity, were selling not only within reason but also within former OPA prices. You could buy any one of the advertised popular brands of granulated soap for 26 cents a package, which was about ceiling under OPA.

Wheat and Corn Bonus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES R. ROBERTSON

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. ROBERTSON of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my own remarks in the RECORD I include a statement made before the Committee on Agriculture by Mr. George H. Hoople, president of the North Dakota Fair Deal Wheat Association, of Hoople, N. Dak., on H. R. 6283, which is legislation dealing with the retroactive features of the wheat and corn bonus question.

Mr. Hoople is an outstanding farmer in the Red River Valley in eastern North Dakota, a man of many years of experience, whose testimony is of tremendous value.

Mr. Chairman, I am a farmer from northeastern North Dakota where my son and I operate a 320-acre farm, which in that district is about the average small or which might be termed average size family farm. Our two major crops are potatoes and wheat. We plant about an equal acreage of each, 80 to 125 acres.

At this hearing I represent an organization known as the North Dakota Fair Deal Wheat Association. The original purpose was and the primary object of this organization still is to protest and disclose the injustice of a bonus of from 30 to 45 cents on wheat and 55 cents on corn being paid only on that portion of these grains marketed between April 19 and May 25, 1946, and to promote and support by legitimate and honorable means legislation to remedy and correct the injustice done by the payment of a bonus on only that portion of these grains marketed during this period.

Without the assistance of any paid solicitors or organizers this association has forwarded to our United States Senators and Representatives petitions asking for legislation to make the bonus payment retroactive to apply to the entire 1945 wheat and corn crops signed by between fifteen and twenty thousand North Dakota farmers and businessmen. I am not officially appointed to represent the North Dakota Farm Bureau; however, since arriving in Washington I have received the following telegram:

FARGO, N. DAK., July 17, 1946.

Mr. GEORGE HOOPLE,
Washington, D. C.:

Members North Dakota Farm Bureau 100 percent behind you in request for a fair deal for wheat farmers. Farmers, that could least afford to, took the Government at its word and sold upon appeal to deliver wheat prior to bonus plan. We do not favor subsidies but do not consider living up to a contract a subsidy. Billions have been available for consumers subsidies, packers, and millers.

W. A. PLATH,
President, North Dakota Farm Bureau.

I also received a telegram from the president of the Pembina County (N. Dak.) Farm Bureau Association endorsing Congressman ROBERTSON'S bill which you have before you for consideration.

I also desire to offer for your records a copy of a resolution, passed by representative members of that North Dakota State organization May 1, 1946, at Fargo, N. Dak., in which it is resolved that the bonus should be made applicable to the entire 1945 wheat and corn crops.

I was not officially appointed to represent the North Dakota Farmers Grain Dealers Association. However, I wish to offer for the record a letter from Mr. C. H. Conaway, executive secretary of that association, dated May 14, 1946, in which among other things he makes the following statement:

"It was my privilege to attend a meeting of the North Dakota Fair Deal for Farmers Association in Lakota Friday. The Fair Deal for Farmers Association, formulated Statewide at Lakota, may not get fair-deal legislation to collect the 30-cent bonus on all 1945 wheat marketed but the fact remains that 95 percent or more of them believe that they have it coming from the Government. The Government let the farmer down in 1918 when it removed the guaranteed price for grain and it appears now that farmers are victims of broken faith and confidence again. Farmers did not go on strike this spring but may decide to hold their grain off the market this fall until all Government controls are taken off the market or until a definite and conclusive policy of government is established. They are tired of playing snatch and grab it."

Signed by C. H. Conaway, Fargo, N. Dak.

I have also received a telegram since coming to Washington from H. T. Quanbeck, secretary of the Farmers Cooperative Elevator Co., at McVille, N. Dak., approving Mr. ROBERTSON'S bill.

I also desire to call to your attention the fact that Mr. ROBERTSON received a lengthy telegram yesterday from our State Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor, Mr. Math Dahl, endorsing the bill you have under consideration.

I presume you are familiar with the order issued and made effective April 19, 1946, by the Economic Stabilization Director, Chester A. Bowles, under authority of the Stabilization Act of 1942, directing and authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture through the Commodity Credit Corporation to pay a bonus of 30 cents per bushel for all wheat delivered to the Commodity Credit Corporation on or before May 25, 1946, and that you are aware of the fact that a bonus of 30 cents, which was later increased to 45 cents per bushel, was paid on wheat delivered to the Corporation between April 19 and May 25, 1946.

We have never heard or seen any statement to the effect that this bonus was ever asked for by any farm organization. It is my opinion that if an intensive campaign similar to the Red Cross drives or scrap-iron drives had been initiated about the time that the bonus payment became effective, the farmers would have delivered their wheat and corn without the payment of a bonus.

I am led to this belief by the fact that throughout the war years whenever the farmers were called upon to perform any patriotic duty they responded wholeheartedly. For instance, with many of their boys and girls away in the service, with the shortage of hired help, unable to obtain new machinery or repairs for their old machinery or equipment, they managed somehow to plant more acres and harvest more crops than ever before. The idea of the bonus, I presume, was to offer an incentive for the farmers to get out their wheat and corn as quickly as possible to be used for famine relief.

There were several factors contributing to the somewhat slow movement of grain during the fall and winter, especially out in North Dakota and Minnesota. In the fall there was a boxcar shortage and in the winter the weather was exceptionally severe and road conditions exceptionally bad, which made it very difficult to move grain with wornout trucks and truck tires and a shortage of labor. However, the latter part of April conditions were improved by milder weather and by roads becoming passable and help becoming more plentiful due to many boys returning from the service. However, the ceiling price of wheat and corn, even with the bonus added, was not too high compared with the price of other things the farmer buys when he can get them, and when increased living costs and increased cost of production are taken into consideration.

It is true the farmer has been paying off his mortgages and is as close to being on a cash basis as he has ever been. He is paying his way as he goes and in some instances he has put away a little cash, but this condition was not brought about by the price per bushel he received for his wheat and corn, but was brought about by the exceptionally high yields.

Nature has been exceptionally good to us during the past 6 years. Areas in our State which according to the AAA produced during a period of 10 or 15 years prior to World War II yields of 10 bushels or less, for the past 6 years have been producing wheat yields of from 25 to 45 bushels per acre. We cannot expect these yields to continue. Poor-yielding years will return again. Good-crop years and poor-crop years seem to run in cycles. We have been working our land hard. Much of it should be and will be summer-fallowed in the next few years.

Another reason the farmer has some cash is due to the fact there have been and still are many things he needs in the line of equipment such as tractors, trucks, machinery, building repairs, etc., which he has not been able to obtain. When these things again become available, he will have to replace his old worn-out equipment, machinery, tractors, trucks, cars, etc., and repair and paint up his run-down farm buildings. He will want to have the old telephone lines fixed up and his phone put back into operation. With rural electrification lines being constructed and extended through the country, he will want some of the luxuries the city family considers necessities, such as electric lights, running water, and a bathroom, and before his needs are all supplied he will have exhausted his surplus cash and will have to slap a mortgage back on the old farm.

As a typical example of the way the bonus deal worked, I will cite the way it worked out in our own individual case. As soon as we felt we were in a position financially to purchase a combine we began in search of one, but to date have not been able to find one suitable for our farm. Therefore we hired a neighbor's combine to do our threshing. By the time his combine was available our elevators due to the boxcar shortage were plugged. We therefore had to store our grain, having about 100 acres of potatoes to harvest.

With wages for hauling and handling at $1.25 per hour and potato pickers being paid at the rate of 12 to 14 cents per bushel, our entire potato crop having to be put into storage due to the shortage of refrigerator cars, we needed a little money to take care of potato and grain harvesting expenses and pay living expenses until we could complete the red tape in connection with securing a potato loan. So we made a Commodity Credit Corporation wheat loan.

Our wheat loan contract did not expire until April 30, 1946, but early in the winter we received a letter from our county AAA office reminding us of the fact that wheat was selling at ceiling and interest was accumulating, therefore as there was nothing to be gained by holding our grain until expiration date, it would be to our advantage to market our wheat under loan and redeem our note as soon as possible.

We had been reading about the starvation conditions existing in Europe so I told my son that we might as well get busy and haul out our wheat and make good fellows of ourselves, especially since wheat could go no higher and therefore it would not cost us anything. So we shoveled the drifts away from the granary doors, got a snow plow to clear a road out of the yard, hauled our wheat, except seed, sold it, and redeemed our note.

Then on April 19 my boy said to me, "Dad, you didn't know what you were talking about. I just heard over the radio the Government has put a 30-cent bonus on wheat." "Well," I replied, "we have about 150 bushels left over from cleaning seed. We might just as well cash in on the 30-cent bonus on that small amount anyway." So we did haul and sell it.

That night I attended a Fair Deal Wheat Association meeting and the next day my boy said, "Dad, we had better go out and start organizing the boys who sold their wheat on the 30-cent bonus into a Junior Fair Deal Wheat Association. I just heard the bonus has been increased to 45 cents."

We farmers feel that paying a bonus on only that wheat and corn marketed between April 19 and May 25 is especially unfair to the farmers who in most cases were more in need of a bonus than the farmers who received the bonus. The farmer who sold his wheat prior to April 19, was the farmer in most instances who could not afford to hold his wheat from year to year. Much of the wheat on which the bonus was paid was grown and stored prior to 1945 and had been held by farmers who could afford it, with the expectation that at some future date it might advance in price. The small farmer who had to sell his wheat before the unexpected bonus became effective not only lost out on the bonus payment, but he also has to contribute in the form of taxes to the bonus paid his more wealthy neighbor.

Farmers were appealed to last year for wheat for famine relief and many of them responded generously and patriotically to the appeal. These farmers should not be dicriminated against. Part of the grain marketed before the bonus payment was offered and became effective was used for famine relief, and had it not been for the grain that was marketed early, the famine situation in Europe would have become acute much earlier than it did. The grain that was marketed early was worth as much on the market and was worth as much for famine relief as the grain delivered during the period the bonus was being paid.

Congress has many times passed legislation making retroactive payments. Just the other day I heard from one of our rural mail carriers that he had received a check from the Government in payment of an increase in salary retroactive back to January 1, 1946.

If loans can be made to foreign countries with the idea in view that the money will be spent in this country, thus stimulating trade, it seems that a bonus on wheat and corn which would bring the price of these grains up to nearer what they should be worth should also be justified. Certainly the farmer will, if he receives this bonus, spend practically 100 percent of it in the United States.

I hope your committee will realize a mistake has been made and that you will endeavor to rectify this mistake by unanimous vote recommending the passage of Congressman ROBERTSON'S bill, H. R. 6283, or some similar bill.

Minnesota Sets a Record for Family War Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD C. HAGEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. HAGEN. Mr. Speaker, we who hail from Minnesota point with pride to the part our boys played in winning the war on the fighting fronts and to the job of production accomplished by the citizens of Minnesota at home.

In the July 4 issue of the Blackduck American, an excellent weekly published at Blackduck, Minn., in my district, I read a story last week about seven brothers who had arrived safely home from active wartime service. Their pictures were also published. Their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Mike Feriancek, are naturalized citizens and they were born in Czechoslovakia.

I hereby challenge any Member of Congress to equal or surpass the record made by this one family from near Blackduck, Minn.

Following is the article published in the July 4 issue of the Blackduck American.

SEVEN FERIANCEK BROTHERS ARE SAFELY HOME FROM ACTIVE SERVICE

With the return of Pfc. Frank Feriancek from Germany last week, the seven Feriancek brothers who served with the United States armed forces around the world in World War II, all have returned safely to their home in Blackduck. With an average of better than 38 months of service to their credit, the total length of service of the seven brothers adds up to 22 years and 2 months, not figuring the extra days in each man's record.

They are sons of Mr. and Mrs. Mike Feriancek of Hornet township, naturalized Americans who hailed from Czechoslovakia, coming to the United States in their early teens. Not many parents can boast of having sent as many sons to war, and better yet, boast that all of them have returned safely. Only two of the seven were wounded, and one who served in the Navy was rescued when his ship was sunk in Kula Gulf.

Michael, 34, now a resident of Minneapolis since his return home, served as a radioman second class in the Navy from August 1942 to November 1945 in the Pacific theater. His ship, the U. S. S. Strong, was sunk in the battle of Kula Gulf, but Mike was rescued. He saw action at Guadalcanal, New Georgia, New Guinea, and Kula Gulf.

John, 33, of Blackduck, served in the Signal Corps from November 1941 to August 1945 and saw service in India. His rank was T/4.

Donald, 30, Blackduck, saw service from December 1941 to August 1945 with a tank division with a rating of T/5, and saw active fighting in Africa, Sicily, and Italy. He was wounded in combat in Italy.

Andrew, 28, Blackduck, served with the Medical Corps in England and France as a T/5 from June 1942 to February 1946.

Matthew, 24, Blackduck, was discharged a staff sergeant after service in Alaska and the European theater, with the Army engineers from September 1942 to December 1945. He was wounded in action in Holland.

Frank, 23, Blackduck, who was just discharged at Camp McCoy, served in the infantry after 17 weeks of training at Camp Robinson, and served in France and Belgium, and took part in the fighting in Germany from the Ruhr to the Rhineland. He served from July 1944 to June 1946.

Edward, 22, employed in Minneapolis since his return home, served as coxswain in the Navy and saw active service in the Pacific theater, serving from June 1943 to February 1946.

Three younger brothers and one sister, besides the seven who saw service, comprise the Feriancek family.

Whose Inflation Is It?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Daily Tribune of July 12, 1946:

WHOSE INFLATION IS IT?

Former Governor Landon, speaking to the young Republicans of his State at Newton, Kans., tossed up some sharp facts about inflation which Mr. Truman, Mr. Bowles, and Mr. Porter ought to be required to answer, even if it distracts attention from their current hysteria over the OPA.

As Governor Landon pointed out, it is not a lapse of the OPA that carries the greatest threat of inflation; it is the inflationary policies which the New Deal itself has followed and encouraged almost from its conception which now threaten the country with skyrocketing prices and impossible rents. As Mr. Landon said, price fixing alone is like pulling down the window shades to conceal what is happening inside the house. It treats the symptoms, which are high prices, instead of treating the disease, which is loose fiscal policy and the discouragement of production.

"Where," asked Mr. Landon, "were these fellows who are now shedding crocodile tears about the evils of inflation during the 13 long years when deliberate deficit spending, and buying votes from pressure groups from public funds, were consistently undermining the value of the American dollar? I don't remember their backing me up 10 years ago when I was warning the American people of the impending danger to America and the world inherent in the Democratic fiscal policies. Government deficit spending has done more to cause inflation than anything else.

"The very articulate administration mouthpieces who are now shouting from the housetops about the evils of inflation, themselves participated in that crime against the American people. In fact, they invented a weasel word, 'permanent deficit spending,' to cover up what they were actually doing. They said the Government had controls to prevent inflation. I said no administration, especially as politically minded a one as the Democratic coalition, would have the guts or the ability to use these controls in time, that American economic life was too big and too complex for a hodgepodge of conflicting Government bureaus to plan efficiently for its management."

This is an indictment to which the New Deal party must plead, not merely in defense of the discredited OPA, but in defense of its policies in the elections this fall and in 1948. There is, it is true, a terrible danger of inflation in this country. It is a danger that has to be met whether we have an OPA or not, and will, obviously, be met more successfully if the hampering restrictions of the OPA are removed and industry is left free to achieve the production that alone can meet demand and force prices down.

The New Dealers bred inflation and they have shown themselves completely incapable of dealing with it. Mr. Landon said at Newton that it is obvious that the Republican Party will win this year's elections. Certainly the people who got us into the mess are hardly the ones to be trusted to get us out of it.

Tax Reduction Next Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

DORSEY, COLMAN, BARKER,
SCOTT & BARBER,
Minneapolis, Minn., July 18, 1946.

Hon. HAROLD KNUTSON,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KNUTSON: During the past 2 weeks I have read statements by the President, Secretary of the Treasury John W. Snyder, Acting Director of the Budget Paul H. Appleby, and Senator WALTER F. GEORGE, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, declaring the present administration is opposed to any reduction in personal-income taxes for 1947. The Secretary of the Treasury intimates taxes may have to be increased next year. As senior Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Reprcsentatives, where tax legislation must originate, please advise me what your attitude is toward possible reduction in personal-income taxes for 1947 in the event the Republicans win control of the House in November and you become chairman of the committee.

Yours very truly,

LELAND W. SCOTT.

Mr. LELAND W. SCOTT,
Dorsey, Colman, Barker, Scott & Barber,
Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR MR. SCOTT: If the taxpayers elect a Republican House in November they will be voting themselves a 20-percent cut in personal income taxes for 1947, as well as the elimination of some and a reduction in other Federal consumer taxes. Under the withholding system for personal income taxes, the deductions from pay envelopes would also be cut 20 percent.

Estimates of expenditures for the current fiscal year range from $42,000,000,000 to $47,500,000,000. A Republican-controlled House would cut that 50 percent and 10 percent of the saving would permit the 20-percent reduction in personal income taxes for next year. It is possible to pass a tax bill during the forepart of 1947, making it retroactive to January 1, 1947, with adjustments in withholdings made July 1, 1947. This meets any arguments that a reduction in personal income taxes would be inflationary because this country will be at maximum production levels by mid-1947.

The people have learned that excessive government must be paid for in taxes so with Republicans in control of the purse strings we will not provide all the frills in Government bureaus we were expected to enjoy when the New Deal was in its heyday and its policy was to "tax, tax, tax—spend, spend, spend—elect, elect, elect." Under the New Deal our highest prewar peacetime Federal Budget was $9,000,000,000. Even if we accepted this very high figure as a base and add $4,000,000,000 for increased cost of servicing the national debt, $5,000,000,000 for veterans and step up our defense expenditures $3,000,000,000 over prewar, we get a total of $21,000,000,000. That is why we can reduce current Federal expenditures by about 50 percent and still have all the government we need, effect tax reduction, balance the budget and have a surplus to apply on the debt.

You refer among others to a recent statement made in behalf of the President by Paul H. Appleby, Acting Director of the Budget. That was his statement of July 12, after appropriations were made and in which the various departments were requested not to spend all the money that had just been given to them. Of course, it was just a futile political gesture and it was not intended for the bureaucrats to heed it. The only way to cut bureaucratic spending is to cut the appropriations. If the administration was sincere in thinking of economy it wouldn't be spending $17,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000 on the War and Navy Departments (some $5,000,000,000 of it on more munitions) in the second year after the war. I believe a grand total of $4,000,000,000 is sufficient for defense in a peacetime year and that is $3,000,000,000 above the 1939 figure of $1,200,000,000. There can be no possible explanation for the ordinary departments of the Federal Government to be spending twice as much in the current fiscal year as they did in 1939 unless it be a cruel indifference to the men and women who provide the money through taxes.

A Republican-controlled House in 1947 is the only answer.

Yours very truly,

HAROLD KNUTSON.

The Cost of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 22, 1946

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, a news item in the Times-Herald for this morning, July 22, tells rather vividly the way the experts figure the cost of war. Whoever wins a war loses in the long run because war has as its aim the science of destruction. War is waste. Civilization cannot survive very many episodes such as World War II, the dollars-and-cents figure of which is expressed in the news item above referred to as follows:

UNITED STATES SPENT TRILLION FOR WAR; ALL PROFITED EXCEPT UNCLE SAM

Nearly a trillion dollars was spent in this country during six defense and war years.

The exact amount, as computed by Treasury analysts, was $987,000,000,000—expended during the calendar years 1940 through 1945.

The Federal Government, carrying the burden of arming and fighting costs, spent $365,000,000,000—about three-eighths of the total.

State and local governments—cities and counties—spent about $50,000,000,000.

Individuals and corporations spent the remaining $572,000,000,000—putting up $517,000,000,000 for consumers' goods and services and $55,000,000,000 for production equipment.

When you take them as whole groups and disregard cases of individual persons, corporations or governmental units, all came out ahead but the Federal Government, which went deep into the hole.

Here's how the Treasury Department analysts figure they fared:

The Federal Government while spending $365,000,000,000, took in but $156,000,000,000 in taxes. So it had a deficit of $209,000,000,000.

The State and local governments took in $58,000,000,000 in taxes but spent only $50,000,000,000. So they wound up about $8,000,000,000 ahead.

Individuals and corporations came out $201,000,000,000 better off, because their income was $773,000,000,000 after their taxes were paid, and their other expenditures were $572,000,000,000.

In fact, the $8,000,000,000 surplus piled up by State and local governments and the $201,000,000,000 surplus accumulated by individuals and corporations exactly equaled the Federal deficit of $209,000,000,000.

I am prompted, Mr. Speaker, to comment on the foregoing news item because just the other day the Bureau of the Budget announced that they were really going to have the different Government agencies indulge in the practice of economy in the operation of their departments. That pronouncement was indeed a noble sentiment. Too often it is the case that Government activities waste money rather than otherwise.

We should bear in mind in our postwar economy the fact that curtailment of expenditures sometimes does more harm than good. There are many cases where money can be expended and the expenditure will result in dividends. Not all efforts to save money amounts to real economy. In connection with the development of our rivers and harbors, Congress has always adopted a penny-wise and pound-foolish program. That attitude was thoroughly demonstrated the other day when there was up for debate the propriety of allocating or appropriating some more funds for the improvement of the Arkansas River. When we consider how many billions have been wasted in the war effort, this little debate about spending $100,000,000 for something worth while for America made me think of a shadow-boxing contest.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND POWER PROJECT

One of the projects which should have been built years and years ago is the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. People who know the transportation needs of this continent, and people who know the need for electric-power development, will universally testify that the potential wealth of America is being wasted in the failure to deepen the channel in the St. Lawrence River from its present depth of 14 feet to a depth of 27 feet. This will permit ocean-going vessels to traverse the Great Lakes. If it is a good thing to give a hand-out of $3,500,000,000 to Great Britain to promote trade and commerce, then the arguments that the Great Lakes and the Midwest Continent might be ruined by commerce, look like the ravings of an imbecile. Certainly such a silly argument cannot be advanced in good faith. It is just a cloak behind which the selfish interests that seek to prevent doing something for the wealth of America will hide.

Incidentally, the statement was made in 1941 before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House of Representatives that $1,000 worth of electric power, the share which would be allocated to this country, is going to waste every hour that the power resources on the St. Lawrence River are not utilized. This little sum of $24,000 a day is probably not much to the people who want to deny such benefits to American citizens. However, in the interests of our domestic economy, this amount of money represents a waste which ought to be conserved for our own country. This St. Lawrence seaway and power project is one of those developments that would represent a real economy because of its savings and benefits to the American people. While we are wasting billions on destructive war purposes, the times cry for some sort of leadership—and it does not have to be of a very high order—that will give to the American people the benefits of developments such as the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. It is true that administration leaders have used a lot of idle words and have become eloquent about their anxiety to develop this St. Lawrence seaway. However, it is significant that they have stopped right there. They have never seen fit to make good on their promises. Excuses for delay will never build the St. Lawrence seaway and power project. What we need is some evidence of action.

AVC Convention Address by H. L. McCarthy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 19, 1946

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent, I include in the RECORD the address of H. L. McCarthy, executive director of the New Council of American Business, before the first national convention of the American Veterans Committee—AVC—in Des Moines, Iowa, June 14–16.

As a Member of Congress deeply interested in the problems and attitudes of veterans, I have followed the recent convention of the American Veterans Committee—AVC—closely. Along with millions of other citizens without necessarily agreeing with every detail I was delighted to read of the progressive, farsighted program adopted by AVC.

Among the speakers at the convention was H. L. McCarthy, executive director of the New Council of American Business. Mr. McCarthy's organization, like the AVC, believes that the national interest comes before that of any special group. As Mr. McCarthy phrases it, "what is good for the American people is good for American business."

This idea that there should be a pressure group working not for private, selfish interests, but for all of the people, is not the unique contribution of the AVC. But it must be said that it has been AVC which in the last year has taken the lead in giving this democratic ideal real meaning. It is both important and significant that this movement should come from a group of World War II veterans. These veterans have both the drive and the know-how to make this implementation of public opinion successful. I look forward to the AVC continuing its activity with the same courage and tenacity it has already shown. I believe and hope that in the years to come both AVC and the movement it has sponsored will become the progressive young organization of this war.

The address follows:

I come before you as a representative of a group of businessmen who believe that what is good for the American people is good for American business. They have organized themselves under the name of New Council of American Business and have set for themselves a series of objectives which they believe are in their own best interests, as well as in the interest of all sections of our economy. For the most part they are small- and medium-sized businesses although even among some large businesses we have found enlightened men who have joined with us in this great fight against monopoly.

These independent businessmen, both small and large, really believe in a competitive system of private enterprise. They have given up emotional economics and are doing some hard thinking about the place of independent business in this economy. We have watched the growth of monopoly power on the economic front and on the political front. Just this week the Senate Small Business Committee issued a report which has been long in the making, and that report cites developments which indicate that big business will emerge from the reconversion period stronger than ever.

Some facts:

1. Sixty-three of the largest manufacturing corporations now have more working capital than all listed manufacturers had in 1939. With these huge reserves, these corporations "could purchase approximately 71,700 smaller manufacturing corporations * * * which represent 94 percent of the total number * * * in the United States."

2. Big business will receive a greater share of war-built factories than will small business, "regardless of whether economic conditions are prosperous or depressed." It thus will be able to dominate "the manufacturing economy through the sheer weight of its productive capacity."

If options held by big corporations on Government-owned war plans are exercised, the facilities of corporations controlled by five great banking groups—Morgan, Rockefeller, Mellon, Du Pont, and the Cleveland group—"would be equal to nearly half of all manufacturing corporations in 1939."

3. Big business will get "first crack" at wartime technological improvements because the bulk of scientific research and development was conducted in big industrial laboratories. Furthermore, these industries were given ownership of most new patents.

A "sharp rise" in mergers and acquisitions by big corporations is cited as proof "that big business actually will use its war-increased strength * * * to improve its position and power." Mergers, which touch all phases of the economy—including food, drugs, and clothing—were at the highest rate in the last quarter of 1945 of any period in 15 years.

The concentration of such power on the economic front is a threat to all independent business and if this private enterprise system is to survive we must find some way of combating this concentration of power because we must maintain the opportunity for any individual to go into any business he wants to. The chance to go into business for oneself is a fundamental part of the American process of free enterprise. But what chance has the small man with meager resources to compete if every area of business enterprise is occupied by the giant octopuses of monopoly?

The rise in concentration of monopoly power is the greatest threat which independent business faces. It has been accompanied by a rise in the political power of the monopolies. We have just seen a great demonstration of their political power. There is great glee in the camps of the monopolists tonight, because they have seen their wishes carried out by the Senate as well as by the United States House of Representatives, in wrecking the OPA.

In the fact of a storm of protest from the great bulk of the American people, in the face of a mounting wave of protest from small and independent business all over the country, in the face of demonstrations by every organized group which represents the people, all of this was of no avail and the Senate and House bowed to the demands of the organized big-business lobbies who represent not only a minor fraction of the people of the country but a minor fraction of business itself. The methods and tactics through which they have achieved their goal are familiar to all of you.

They have not hesitated to use the full weight of their tremendous economic resources, their lush treasuries, to influence political decisions. For years they have been on the march in opposition to every piece of progressive legislation which the people have wanted and they have progressively increased the number and extent of their victories. They have been opposed to the child-labor amendment, increase in the minimum wage; they have opposed free collective bargaining processes. They have been for tax exemptions which will swell their profits. They have been against the expansion of the social services and social insurances—and they have succeeded in greater or lesser degree in all these issues. They are now girding themselves for further attacks upon the interests of independent business and the interests of the veteran, and the interests of the whole people.

Make no mistake about it, the future of the veteran in the American economy will depend upon what we do from now on about the growth of monopoly power in this country. Let us take a single instance. The big business lobbyists have already affected the future of the veteran by their success in scuttling OPA. The average veteran who wants to go into business for himself typically has small capital. He must acquire commercial space in which to operate, he must acquire equipment, and he must acquire stocks of raw or finished materials. The veteran's task was hard enough when he found himself faced with the necessity of paying greatly increased prices for commercial rents because commercial rents never were under OPA control. But as of July 1 and thereafter he will find himself having to pay skyrocketed prices for all of these business costs. The mortality rate among new businesses will skyrocket along with the increase in prices and the chance for the veteran to go into business for himself will progressively diminish as the months go by.

The only hope the American people have now is that there will arise new forms of fighting organizations to throw themselves into this battle. It is a battle between two systems—one, a system of monopoly which drives straight toward fascism, and the other a system which will preserve independent competitive enterprise as an essential part of the democratic process. These new forms of organization are already appearing on the scene. The New Council of American Business and the American Veterans Committee represent the rise of groups which will pit action against reaction. We have much in common. The spectacular growth of your organization is evidence of a great vitality among the great mass of veterans which can be used for the common good of all of us.

We are encouraged, too, at the discovery that there are many thousands of businessmen in this country who are willing to join in the New Council's fight against monopoly. We have set ourselves some specific objectives and we intend to back legislation to achieve these objectives, with all our strength. We will support—

Effective control of monopoly, to avoid stifling business initiative.

Full employment measures, to expand buying power.

Equitable tax programs, to stimulate independent business.

Technological aid to independent business, to strengthen its competitive position.

Higher statutory minimum wages, to help stabilize buying power and avoid unfair competitive chiseling.

Maintenance of orderly collective bargaining, to improve management-labor relations.

No discrimination in employment, to help promote industrial peace.

Cooperative world trade, to help keep United States production at a continuously high level.

But let us not forget that this is a two-front war. We must fight with every resource the growth of the economic power of great concentrations of capital and we must fight together on the political front. We must learn how to use all of our resources and all of our skills in such a way as to strip the big business lobbies of the power they have so long enjoyed. That is the No. 1 problem of businessmen and veterans alike. It may well be that we will never have at our command the financial and technical resources available to our enemies. But if we can coordinate our actions so that each segment offers strength and timely support to every other segment as we start our attack, we can achieve an economy in which the common man, the businessman, and the veteran can live in peace and security.

Civilian Versus Military Control of Atomic Energy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, July 20, 1946

Mrs. DOUGLAS of California. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a series of eight articles by Mr. Alfred Friendly on Civilian versus Military Control of Atomic Energy, which appeared in the Washington Post.

The Washington Post had this study made by Mr. Friendly.

Included in these articles are irrefutable facts as to why atomic energy should be under civilian control.

Member after Member on this floor today complained they were confused about the subject of atomic energy. The only way to clear up that confusion is to become acquainted with some of the facts.

The articles follow:

NEW AGE WITHIN GRASP—ATOMIC ENERGY "STANDSTILL" DEPLORED BY ITS DEVELOPERS

(The proper control of atomic energy is a question of paramount importance and interest to the Nation. The Post is therefore presenting a series of articles by Reporter Alfred Friendly, analyzing the controversy that now rages on this issue and the solutions to it which have been suggested. The first article in this series appears below.—Editor's note.)

(By Alfred Friendly)

"Since the surrender of Japan the scientific and technical development of atomic energy has practically come to a standstill."

This statement is from the congressional testimony of Prof. Edward Teller. He is one of the most gifted and prominent of those laboratory wizards who brought the atomic age into being.

His declaration has not been denied. It has been confirmed repeatedly in testimony before Congress, in public and private statements of the top scientists who developed the atom bomb. Its proof is only too evident.

The fact is that those scientists and the hundreds of younger men who labored with them are no longer working in the huge Army atomic project, the Manhattan engineer district. Neither are these men continuing their studies in nonmilitary laboratories, because present military secrecy regulations do not make such work feasible.

Of the leading scientists whose names are found in the Smyth report (the official Government document on the bomb's creation)—names such as Fermi, Szilard, Oppenheimer, Urey, Bethe, Wigner, Langmuir, Teller, Smyth, Pegram—only a corporal's guard has remained with the project.

USUALLY FOLLOW THE MASTERS

Many of the younger research men are still employed, but their future course appears to be clear unless the leading figures in their field return. For under a system which operates in most learned professions, the gifted and ambitious young men follow the masters, not so much for prestige as for the opportunity to study and develop under the leaders.

Just as there is no controversy over the fact that there is practical paralysis in the most important field of science, so is there no argument over what this standstill portends. Whether you think in terms of war or peace for the United States, the danger of stopping the "chain reaction" in atomic research is as great as the danger of starting the chain reaction in the bomb itself.

Nuclear scientists who have looked in the direction of peacetime uses of the tremendous new discoveries believe that we stand on the doorstep of what can be made into the greatest age of man.

They refuse to say that a cure for cancer is around the corner or that the mystery of plant growth will be solved next year or that atomic power plants are at the blueprint stage. But they have said that they have begun the unfolding of what they know will be as fruitful as the discovery of electricity, the invention of the steam engine, and the construction of the microscope, all rolled into one.

ACHIEVEMENTS STILL POTENTIAL

But the achievements they look for are still potential. They can be realized, the scientists remind us, only as all great scientific achievements have been realized—through unrestricted, painstaking, passionate research.

Except that the picture of hope is changed to a picture of terror, the nuclear scientists who have looked at the wartime applications of atomic energy paint a similar landscape.

Dr. Irving Langmuir, Nobel prize winner, reflected the views of his fellow scientists when he testified:

"In any unlimited arms race, we may confidently assume that there are going to be discoveries made in this (atomic) field. They may be made 4 or 5 years hence. They may be made 10 or 15 years hence."

But, he added, it is "almost certain" that there will be atomic bombs "a thousand times as powerful as those that now exist by means that are now undiscovered."

Implicit in his statement, of course, is the assumption that there will be research to reveal the "means that are now undiscovered."

At the moment we are able to make bombs of a certain type and at a certain rate. To increase the efficiency of the bombs, or to make them at a higher rate, requires research, with the full cooperation of the best scientists.

At the moment, it is generally agreed, no potential enemy of this country has the atom bomb or the means to make it. Major General Groves, head of the Manhattan district, has stated that it will take Russia 20 years to reach the position we hold today. But the scientists on the bomb project have estimated from 3 years to a maximum of 10.

The most carefully reasoned analysis of this question appears to be that of Drs. Frederick Seitz and Hans A. Bethe, both stellar figures in the production of the bomb. In the anthology on the bomb and its problems, One World or None, published last week, Seitz and Bethe estimate 6 years elapsed time for bombs to become available to other nations.

And they add, "It is entirely possible that a foreign nation will be ahead of us in 5 years." Their estimates assume no further disclosures by the United States on our accomplishments.

There is an overwhelming body of scientific opinion, in books, public statements, and congressional testimony, that what we have done in the way of the bomb can be done by any sizable civilized country in a few years, without the further disclosure by us of a single additional bomb "secret."

And if their scientists work on atomic energy for war and ours do not, they cannot only reach us, but will certainly surpass us.

Whichever the view, hopeful or desperate, looking toward peace or to an atomic arms race, the present situation is intolerable. The scientists, it is agreed, must continue to explore the most tremendous force now available, whether for building the country or for protecting it.

The immediate question, then, is, Why have the scientists left their research work under the Army?

General Groves testified that the project was daily losing key people because of he "current uncertainty," meaning the absence of a national policy for the control of atomic energy. Being the most vocal proponent of military control of atomic development, it can be assumed that he expects that a decision for military control will reverse the trend and keep the scientists on their jobs.

But the scientists themselves may be accepted as more accurate witnesses than General Groves on what their own motives are.

One of them, himself a key man in the development of the bomb, and one of America's foremost nuclear physicists, referred to Groves' argument in these words:

"It would be more nearly the truth to say that the only reason any scientists are still in the Manhattan district is because of the uncertainty. I mean that it is still not definite that Army control is to be continued. As soon as that is definite, the rest of the boys will leave."

Almost to a man, the top scientists state that they have left because of military control as it operated during the war and as it continues to operate. The Federation of Atomic Scientists, which claims to represent 90 percent of the research scientists who worked in the Manhattan district gives the identical explanation. (The scientists' specific objections to military control will be discussed in later articles of this series.)

War Department officials and others properly concerned with maintaining our military effectiveness answer the scientists' explanation by raising another question, somewhat as follows:

"Atomic energy has been made into the most powerful weapon of all time. The armed forces use and need weapons. Do the scientists, or anyone else, propose that the Army and Navy shall have no participation, no voice, no decisions on this, the most potent and decisive military force in the world?"

So far, there has been no answer. Or at least no answer has been converted into a decision which will induce the scientists to resume their atomic research and which at the same time satisfies our armed services that their legitimate interests and requirements will be met.

EVERYONE WANTS IT—DEBATE OVER ATOM CONFUSED BY CLAMOR FOR CIVIL CONTROL

(By Alfred Friendly)

The most confusing aspect of the controversy now raging over civilian versus military control of atomic energy is the fact that all of the disputants say they favor civilian control.

For example, there is the case of Senator VANDENBERG (Republican, Michigan).

The most important bill now pending in the Senate is that proposed by Senator MCMAHON (Democrat, Connecticut). It would establish an exclusively civilian commission to direct atomic research, development, and applications. Senator VANDENBERG proposed an amendment, which was adopted 10 to 1 (Senator MCMAHON dissenting), in the Senate special committee considering the legislation. The amendment provides for a military liaison board to work with the civilian commission.

The vocal opponents of the Vandenberg amendment do not take the position that the armed services should be frozen out of the atomic picture. Regretful as the fact may be, they admit that the reality of the situation shows that at present the dominant aspect of atomic energy is its use as a weapon. Therefore the Army and Navy should be guaranteed direct participation and full flow of information on all military phases of the problem.

VANDENBERG METHOD THOUGHT WRONG

But they insist the Vandenberg amendment is wrong in method. They contend that its broad wording gives the armed services domination over every aspect of atomic energy. More important, they claim that the proposed military board would have what amounts to veto powers over the civilian commission. This would put the commission in the spot of being accountable and responsible for everything that happens but having no real authority. The result, they say, is an administrative monstrosity.

But Senator VANDENBERG does not see it this way. He says his amendment is strictly in line with President Truman's policy of civilian control—that, in fact, it merely translates that policy into legislation.

Another example: The Army has generally been credited with leading a fight for military command over atomic matters. But Secretary of War Patterson, citing a long and imposing record of statements and reports, asserts that the Army took the lead in urging civilian direction.

ARMY AGREES WITH TRUMAN

Even before the atomic bomb was tested, he reports, the Army advocated divesting itself of control. That was its policy, still is its policy, always will be its policy, he says. He, too, insists that the War Department stands foursquare with Mr. Truman's ideas on the subject.

And even Major General Groves, head of the Army's atom bomb project, and the man generally considered to be the No. 1 advocate of military domination, declares he favors civilian control. Even in urging that military officers be appointed to the Control Commission, he has plumped for having civilian members in the majority.

But despite the statements of Patterson, Groves, Vandenberg, and the 10 members of the Senate Special Atomic Energy Committee who supported his amendment, an opposition group contends that there is a concerted and determined drive to vest control in the military.

Despite the Army and congressional denials, the controversy still flourishes. Partisans of civilian control allege the denials are lip service only. They say this is not a mere case of splitting hairs over words, but that the Army actually is seeking complete control while pretending to ask only for participation in matters relating to the bomb.

This is the record they cite:

After VJ-day the first legislation on the subject of atomic energy control was drafted in the War Department. It was introduced in the House by Representative MAY, Democrat, Kentucky, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee. In the Senate it was offered by Senator JOHNSON, Democrat, of Colorado.

It provided, among other things, for a part-time commission of nine men and a full-time administrator and deputy administrator. The bill contained explicit exemptions from the laws passed since 1870 barring military officers from civilian jobs. Thus, in appointing the commissioners and administrators under the proposed act, the President would be permitted, though not compelled, to name Army and Navy officers.

There is a unique provision in the bill. It declares in effect that the administrator is obliged to keep the deputy administrator informed at all times of what he is doing.

One explanation given for this apparently superfluous provision is that there was a deal between the Army and Navy to obtain the latter's support to the Army bill. An Army officer, presumably Groves, would be urged on the President as administrator, and a Navy officer would be recommended as his deputy. But the Navy, frozen out more often than not in cooperation with the Army, apparently was writing its insurance in the bill itself.

FOUR OR FIVE DAYS OF HEARINGS

In the House Military Affairs Committee, Representative MAY attempted to close hearings on this bill after only 5 hours. He actually succeeded in closing them after 4 or 5 days, only one of which was given to opposition witnesses.

Dr. Leo Szilard, the father of the discoveries in this country which made the bomb possible, attempted to prevail upon MAY to reopen the hearings.

MAY told him, "Judge Patterson won't stand for any delay—I phoned him."

The man who stopped the May-Johnson bill, it is known, is one Harry S. Truman. Taking cognizance of the national storm of protest and the vigorous work in opposition to the bill by the young Federation of Atomic Scientists, the President convened a series of White House conferences on the subject.

He made his decision in flat opposition to the bill and to the principle of military control. It seems clear that he made his point of view known to congressional leaders, including Representative MAY. There are indications that he told the Army, in sharp words, to cease support of the bill and conform to his decision. He made his opinion public on February 1 in a letter to Senator MCMAHON.

In his letter the President endorsed the policy that control of atomic energy should be vested in an exclusively civilian commission.

Despite the public and private statements of the Commander in Chief to this effect, there has been the unprecedented circumstance of a high Army officer, General Groves, publicly speechifying for military participation on the Commission. He also testified to this effect as a private citizen before the Senate special committee. How a Regular Army officer can become a private citizen for 2 hours, on demand, has not been explained.

With the May-Johnson bill temporarily stifled, and full hearings being held in the Senate committee, public support of the civilian control McMahon bill began to grow.

But about a month ago, coincident with the resurrection of Army complaints against civilian control, there began a series of events the result of which was to stir up sentiment for military regulation of atomic energy. The sequence of these events and their timing appear to be more than mere coincidence.

1. A Russian spy scare in Canada was broadly publicized. This was unusual in itself, since detections of this sort are made fairly often by all governments and are rarely released publicly. Besides there is some indication that the situation, whatever it is, had been in the same status for some weeks or months before it was made public.

GROVES CHARGED LEAKS

2. General Groves stated that there had been more leaks on secret atomic information in the past month than in the whole history of the bomb project. The implication was that either the McMahon committee or the scientists on the project were responsible for the leaks. They were presumably the only ones who had the information to leak.

Groves and Patterson both denied to MCMAHON that they had the Senate committee in mind. But, in newspaper parlance, the reports from high Army officers persisted that the committee was the culprit.

Mr. Truman, incidentally, is known to have taken sharp exception to the reflection on the integrity of the scientists who made the bomb.

3. The House Un-American Activities Committee revealed it had traced a Russian spy link to the great Oak Ridge establishment in the Manhattan project. So far nothing has been made public on the nature of the evidence.

LIE DETECTOR USED

4. It was disclosed that the Army is giving lie-detector tests to Oak Ridge personnel. In an official statement, the Army declared that the tests were merely experiments to find out more about the lie detector. But again, reports persisted that the object was to uncover possible subversion among the employees.

5. About this time the Vandenberg amendment was offered and promptly adopted by the Senate special committee. It provides that the liaison board of Army and Navy officers may appeal directly to the President any action, or lack of action, which in its judgment concerns the Nation's common security and defense.

ATOMIC ENERGY PROBERS FEARS ITS POSSIBILITIES

(By Alfred Friendly)

It is hard to find anyone who has looked into the problem of atomic energy who is not frightened. And the more he has investigated the situation the more frightened he becomes.

The fear stems from two apparently contradictory reasons. The first is that there will be an atomic bomb war and that the war will therefore be more horrible than can be imagined.

The second fear is that if an atomic war comes America will lose it for lack of superiority, either in numbers or quality of atomic bombs.

The basis for this conclusion is the fact, as pointed out in the first article in this series, that scientists competent to develop more and better bombs (if the word "better" can be used in this connection) are not working on atomic weapons. They are not even working to any extent on any phase of atomic research.

The biggest names in this scientific field, as well as the hundreds of younger men, explain that they are not working on this subject because they cannot work on it under the military control which now operates in the Army's Manhattan district project.

WISH TO INCLUDE MILITARY

They add that the same situation will be true under any arrangement where the military makes the basic decisions on the course of atomic research and development. They do not assert that the armed services should be deprived of voice and participation in the military applications of atomic energy, i. e., bombs. They ask, indeed, that the fullest military participation be assured.

But they say that work even on atomic bombs—leaving aside work on all other phases of nuclear power—is impossible if the ultimate domination is by name or by fact military.

One of America's foremost scientists, who came into the bomb project early and stayed late, makes this summary:

"It all boils down to the impossibility of working under dogmatic dictatorial regimentation under bosses who do not know what the subject is about."

Or, as it is put by Edward U. Condon, Director of the Bureau of Standards, scientific adviser to the Senate Special Atomic Energy Committee and himself a leading figure in the bomb project:

"The atom bomb has brought United States scientific men under strict military domination * * * (This is) a severe detriment to our scientific development. * * * Science simply will not go forward under domination."

EXPLANATIONS BY SCIENTISTS

The scientists' own explanations of why this is so are presented below. The arguments relate exclusively to the problem of producing bombs at a faster rate and of a more devastating nature. They are made on the fearful assumption that the United States will become involved in an atomic armament race.

1. The scientists will do research toward the making of more deadly bombs if their country's safety depends on it. But they will not work on this problem on the basis of a decision made by the military services alone. They want a decision first from what they feel are the proper agencies entrusted with the Nation's security—the Congress, the President, the State Department, the people, as well as the Army and Navy.

2. Even working on atomic bombs, under the Army, the scientists believe they will not be allowed to do the research necessary to accomplish the greatest results.

The Army has promised opportunities for full and free research. But from their experience with the Manhattan district the scientists don't believe it.

Prof. R. R. Critchfield, mathematical physicist at George Washington University, who worked at Los Alamos, commented on the offer by saying:

"I didn't take it up. You notice I'm here (at the university)."

3. The scientists interviewed by this reporter, including many of the top figures in the atomic field, say that the Army is openly contemptuous of them and does not understand what makes them tick, or how they must work. It is therefore impossible, they add, for the Army to give them direction.

FEELING AGAINST GROVES

With a few exceptions, they say, Maj. Gen. Leslie R. Groves and his staff, the operators of the Manhattan district project, were not only contemptuous but ignorant of what the work was about. The bad feeling between Groves and the scientists is scarcely disguised.

The collection of Groves stories is reaching large proportions. The one that scientists relate with particular bitterness has to do with a conference at the University of Chicago section of the project during the war.

While waiting for the conference to start, Groves made what the scientists present considered patronizing statements approving the mathematical formulas on the blackboard. But the formulas had nothing to do with the bomb project. They were problems in freshman physics used by the class which had just vacated the room.

The scientists hold the Army in general, and Groves in particular, responsible for the destruction of the cyclotrons in Japan. It is beyond possibility, they feel, to work under persons who would commit this outrage against the principles of science.

ARMY SECURITY REGULATIONS

4. Army security regulations simply make it "too d—— risky" for anyone to work. An unauthorized disclosure by a scientist to a fellow worker, in the process of trying to get some information, is subject to prison sentences and fines which would bankrupt the notoriously poorly paid researchers, and mere dismissals would ruin a scientist's future career.

One of them told this reporter:

"We simply can't take the chance of working on atomic energy under these rules. We'll study the pigmentation of butterfly wings instead."

5. One of the luminaries in the bomb project expressed his opinion of a major deterrent to working under the Army in two words, "the terror."

Scientists believe that their phones were tapped, their letters opened, and that they were shadowed. They add that these measures, possibly justifiable in war, have continued in peace. The evidence they give off the record—because they admit they are too frightened to state it publicly—appears convincing to this reporter.

HOW MAN WAS DISCHARGED

One distinguished physicist tells of a young man who was discharged from one phase of the Manhattan district without being told the cause. The researcher asked the scientist for a job and was about to be employed on a project having no relation to atomic work.

But before 2 days had elapsed Army security men pressured the scientist in a vigorous fashion not to hire the man. That they knew he had applied for a job can be explained only through opening letters, since the matter was conducted entirely by mail.

Dr. Enrique Fermi, discoverer of some of the basic facts about uranium which led to the bomb, once discovered in his own mail boxes an Army instruction sheet about the opening and inspection of his letters. A clumsy Army security officer had put it there by mistake.

[From the Washington Post of March 23, 1946]

SCIENTISTS RESENT ARMY'S IDEA THEY ARE NOT PAID TO THINK

(By Alfred Friendly)

The compelling reason why atomic scientists believe they cannot work under overall military control, even in the research necessary to develop newer and more devastating atom bombs, is that the "Army way" does not permit effective accomplishment in the field of science.

This is the reason, they say, that almost every one of the major scientists who created the bomb have left the Army project, the Manhattan engineering district, and why they are being followed by the hundreds of younger researchers.

Yesterday's article in this series mentioned a few of the specific complaints against the Army way—the risk involved in unwittingly violating regulations, the Gestapo methods, the lack of a national decision that more and bigger bombs should be made, the mutual distrust and contempt between the Army officers and the scientists.

SECRECY STIFLES PRODUCTION

But the bigger, all-embracing factor, they say, is the way that their production is stifled through unworkable secrecy regulations and through the traditional Army method of compartmentalization—dividing the work into small cells. Each cell is given only a part of the job, and most important, only a part of the information it really needs.

This system, which may or may not be the best way to run a division in battle, simply won't work in the field of science, it is argued.

Here are some of the remarks on the subject:

Charles F. Kettering, director of General Motors research laboratories: "If you lock the doors of a laboratory you lock out more than you lock in."

Dr. Irving Langmuir, Nobel prize-winning associate director of General Electric Co. research: "Any such secrecy as we had during the war under military control would stop nearly all progress in those (atomic) sciences."

REGULATIONS VIOLATED

"Even during wartime the secrecy regulations in matters of fundamental science were not lived up to. Most of the scientists working on the atomic-bomb project frequently had to violate the regulations to exchange information with one another in order that the work could get ahead effectively.

"In peacetime such regulations would be completely unworkable, for any attempts to enforce them rigorously would drive all able scientists out of the field."

Dr. Hans A. Bethe, director of theoetrical physical research during the war at the Los Alamos laboratories of the bomb project: "Like any kind of pure research, research in this (atomic) field can only be done successfully if it is free from restrictions on subjects to be investigated and on publication of the results."

Dr. Harold C. Urey, Nobel prize winner, one of the earliest discoverers of the possibility of atomic bombs and the director of a large phase in the bomb project: "There has existed and there now exists almost a mania for secrecy * * *. My own belief is that it was, and is, largely unnecessary and that it did, and will, impede the progress of the work on atomic energy.

"This subject is one which may frighten us but it should not lead us to apply methods which all experience shows will stifle development, drive the best men from the field and shift all rights to knowledge to those with the least experience in the application of that knowledge."

The scientists do not deny the need for secrecy concerning atomic weapons. In fact, as will be discussed in a later article, they claim to be the "inventors" of secrecy on the whole bomb project. They voluntarily decided to set up a secrecy system of their own, which operated without a leak from the beginning of the discoveries in 1939 until the Army took over in mid-1942.

Their complaint is simply that by the nature of things only a physical scientist can tell what is a "secret" in the atomic field, even from a weapons or bomb standpoint, and what is not.

The personal opinion of Dr. Ross Gunn, director of a division of the Naval Research Laboratory which pioneered in the whole field of nuclear physics, is expressed this way:

"SECURITY ASPECT MISMANAGED

"The security aspect of the Manhattan project was handled by amateurs, and therefore it was mismanaged. Everyone who had anything to do with it knows it was mishandled and needlessly so. The mistakes came from ignorance of technical matters."

Gunn testified before the Senate Special Committee on Atomic Energy how compartmentalization delayed the adoption of a most important process in the bomb project by some 18 months.

By December 1942 Gunn and Dr. Phillip H. Abelson of the Carnegie Institution had perfected, in a pilot plant, a method of separating "light" uranium, U-235, one of the two known atomic explosives, from the "heavy" nonexplosives, U-238. Since U-235 is found in nature only in combination with U-238, and only in the ratio of 1 part in 140, this separation was one of the most essential processes in the whole project. It was extremely difficult.

GROVES VISITED PLANT

Maj. Gen. Leslie R. Groves, chief of the Manhattan project, but not himself a scientist, visited Gunn's pilot plant in December 1942. Gunn also wrote full reports of what had been discovered and sent them to the Manhattan project.

Nothing happened. Gunn was later told that scientists in the project had heard nothing of what the Naval Research Laboratory had accomplished.

After a long passage of time, word of the process was brought by the Navy directly to Dr. R. J. Oppenheimer, one of the kingpins in the project. Then, knowing already what was in the reports, he formally requested General Groves to be supplied with them.

The final result was the construction by the Manhattan district of one of the major plants at Oak Ridge, the S-50 plant which produced U-235 by the Gunn-Abelson method.

EIGHTEEN MONTHS ELAPSED

But, as Gunn pointed out, 18 months elapsed between his reports and Groves' inspection of the pilot plant, and the taking of official action on the matter by the Army in June 1944.

One side-issue was the fact that about 100 physicists wasted more than 2 months at the University of California on research which was rendered needless by the Gunn-Abelson work. The waste would not have taken place had the security regulations been in the hands of scientists who knew the implications of the material that passed before them.

Rear Adm. William R. Purnell, the Navy's principal officer in the atomic project, testified that the flow of information from the Naval Research Laboratory to the Manhattan district as a one-way street.

He said he was led to understand that any information which the Manhattan district had which would be of value to the laboratory would be passed down to it. But he told a Senate committee, "I never got any."

WE WERE EXCOMMUNICATED

Gunn's own description of what happened to his laboratory, a pioneer agency in studying atomic power since early 1939, is that when the Army took over, "We were excommunicated."

Dr. Langmuir has testified to one of the ridiculous aspects of "over-control" of secrecy by the Army. In May 1945 he accepted an invitation to a scientific conference in Russia. He had had only a small connection with the bomb project, but the day before he was to leave America, two Army officers asked him to decline to go.

He refused and demanded that the matter be taken up with the State Department. When the War Department "was made to realize how little I knew of the atomic energy project, I was finally allowed to go," Langmuir said.

Once in Russia, he heard that eight British scientists who had accepted the Russian invitation had had their passports canceled after they reached the airport to fly to Moscow.

BRITISH WERE INCENSED

"All the scientists and the whole of the British delegation were much incensed at these tactics." Langmuir continued. "They believed that the passports were canceled because these men had worked on the Tuballoy project, which is the equivalent of our Manhattan project."

"I also heard the opinion expressed that this action must have been taken at the request of the American Government, because no one outside of the American Army could be so stupid."

The man whose experiments led to the whole atom bomb question being taken up with President Roosevelt in 1939 is Dr. Leo Szilard. He has summed up the problem of secrecy and compartmentalization in this sentence:

"The most important answers are answers to unrecognized questions."

FREE INTERCHANGE OF IDEAS

The fruitful questions, he has explained, are those which can be discovered only in the free interchange of ideas among all scientists. One scientist, not knowing even of the existence of information that another may have, cannot see how it may or may not fit the work he is doing. He does not think to ask for the information for he has no way of knowing that it exists.

Some scientists have gone so far as to say that the bomb would never have been made had the Army, with the secrecy regulations it later imposed, entered the project in 1939, rather than in 1942.

They point out that every important and basic discovery had been made by the time the Manhattan district was created. At that time the chain reaction—the essence of an atomic explosion—explosion—was a theoretical certainty.

The first chain reaction took place on December 2, 1942. General Groves had been appointed to the job some 2½ months before. Scientists working on the problem do not believe that he was the catalytic agent which made the chain reaction possible.

Many declare, instead, that the result of Army regulations was a great delay in the production of the bomb.

ARMY "CELLS" STIFLE WORK, SCIENCE SAYS—SECURITY SYSTEM CUT RESEARCHERS OFF FROM FACTS THEY NEEDED FOR ATOM BOMB

(By Alfred Friendly)

"The cellular system of security—where one cell doesn't know what another is doing and therefore can't build its work in relation to that of others—is the most damned inefficient way I know of for getting things done."

The remark is that of Dr. Ross Gunn, of the Naval Research Laboratory, one of the first men in America to make important discoveries in the field of atomic power.

He was referring to the Army system of compartmentalization—a roundabout device to achieve secrecy by telling each unit only a part of the whole picture.

This cellular or compartment system was used by the Army in the Manhattan district engineering project, the outfit which produced the atomic bomb. It provoked one of the biggest and most bitter complaints among the scientists who did the job.

IT STIFLES RESEARCH

If the Army retains control of future atomic work, many scientists expect that the system will be continued, since it is a traditional Army practice. If it does, they declare, research will be stifled, whether it is for a cure of cancer or the making of the much more dreadful atomic bomb we will need if we get into an atomic arms race.

The system is not only crippling to research, the scientists claim. In a field as perilous as that of the atom's insides, it constitutes a mortal danger.

There is the case of a plant at Oak Ridge, Tenn., which was separating "light uranium," U-235, the explosive variant of uranium, from U-238, the common or garden variety which does not explode and therefore is not used directly in the bomb. U-235 is found in natural uranium in the ratio of 1 part to 140 parts of U-238.

Now it is the curious property of U-235 that it explodes, of and by itself, if it is in sufficiently large chunks. The volume at which an explosion takes place is called the "critical size." The atomic bomb could be detonated by bringing together swiftly two or more blocks each below the critical size but which joined together are above the critical size.

A MILITARY SECRET

The critical size, which is a military secret, had been computed by the physicists in the Manhattan district who worked in the University of Chicago and the Los Alamos, N. Mex., laboratories. They knew what it was in various mixtures, compounds, and solutions.

But it was decided—by a nonscientist—that some or all of this knowledge was "none of the business" of certain groups doing some of the separation at Oak Ridge.

Blissful in their ignorance, some of the Oak Ridgers were proceeding to separate U-235 from U-238 through one of the three or four enormously difficult and complicated processes which are available.

They were doing very well. The U-235 which they obtained was being stored by them in liquid form in tanks.

By accident, or possibly by foresight—since there were very foresighted men there—someone at Los Alamos figured that the Oak Ridge people must be producing quite a bit of the explosive. They wondered how it was being stored. It was strictly none of Los Alamos' business, but nevertheless, one of its top men was dispatched to Oak Ridge on an inspection trip.

A CLOSE ESCAPE

He discovered that they were proceeding on a direct route toward making Oak Ridge into a premature Hiroshima.

Compartmentalization might be fatal in another way—if it stops the production of more bombs or more powerful ones in the event we are faced with an atomic war.

"Just around the corner," as a leading nuclear scientist puts it, are vastly improved methods for the production of plutonium, the explosive used in the Nagasaki bomb. In an atomic arms race, swifter production of plutonium may be essential.

But the improved methods will not fall like manna from heaven. Scientists insist that they can be achieved only through determined research—through the same sort of free research that took place from 1919 to 1940, when the mysteries of the atom were explored.

By no means "just around the corner," but in the opinion of scientists entirely possible are atomic explosives 1,000 times more powerful than the present bombs. The bombs we have derive their force from splitting uranium or plutonium, both very heavy elements. But release of huge amounts of energy could come—as happens in the sun—by combining atoms of some of the lighter elements.

One eminent physicist used these words to describe how research toward a big goal can be frustrated.

"The real damage is done in the early stages of the problem through failure to follow up promising avenues. A good scientist is what he is by reason of his perspective and judgment on which course to follow. He needs a bird's-eye view to give him the opportunity for decision on which are the best methods to pursue."

If research decisions are imposed on the experts by nonscientists, it is argued that failure will be assured.

One of the most fantastic examples of the cellular system's blocking one scientist from telling another what he knew had to do with the production of "heavy water" in the bomb project.
